As the body weakens and gets old, there is a light, the light of consciousness that can shine through. And then you find certain old people who, as the body weakens, the light increases of consciousness and the ego is completely gone, and there's just a beautiful presence left. That's the, at the latest, as you grow old, that's your last opportunity.

But if you've missed it for the first 75 years of your life, because you were too concerned with doing all the time and acquiring and becoming, I don't know whether you can still find it. I think if you fall ill or something like that happens to you, yes, you can. It's preferable not to wait until you're close to death to look for the being dimension, because you might not find it anymore because you're so absorbed in the doing and in time that you won't even look for it.

If you had no interest whatsoever throughout your life in any of this, it's a bit late. That's fine. The universe is abundant and patient and every life has a purpose.

We'll talk about that some other time. Time, you see. We can't get away from it.

This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 2] (2:55:36 - 2:56:23)
The essence of this is to join in the state of presence.

[Speaker 12] (2:56:28 - 2:56:35)
So it's not the words, it's the stillness.

[Speaker 1] (2:56:45 - 2:57:10)
It may be helpful, and this is why we are doing this, to look at me or the image of me on the screen because I'm not, except in the moment when I speak, I'm not thinking.

[Speaker 2] (2:57:12 - 2:57:31)
And so somehow, I don't know how, but somehow that state of pure awareness or presence kind of transmits itself if you're open to it.

[Speaker 1] (2:57:39 - 2:57:51)
When you look at somebody, when you are with somebody who is in that state of presence, then it's easier for you to be present.

[Speaker 2] (2:57:52 - 2:58:06)
When you're with somebody who is immersed in thought activity, identified with thinking, then it's more challenging for you to be present.

Still possible, but then the danger is that you may be pulled into the same vibrational frequency, so to speak, of identification with thinking and lose yourself in it. It's just amazing that it's not yet common knowledge that such a state of consciousness that we call presence or awareness, that it even exists or is possible, that it is the secret dimension of consciousness because very few people seem to know about it and it's not in the mainstream culture. All that's been there in the teaching of the ancient spiritual teachers, it's the essence of their teaching and yet misunderstood.

So if I could just put it in a nutshell, just in one short, one brief sentence, what this is all about is to be here with me and all the others who are joining us here. We're all connected at a deeper level of the collective consciousness, human consciousness, to be here and to enjoy being aware, fully aware, fully awake without needing to think, conceptual thinking, inner dialogues, monologues, interpretations, viewpoints, past, future, regret, anxiety, all produced by unconscious identification with thinking, unnecessary thinking in many cases.

If thoughts come in while we sit here together, don't follow them, just let them dissolve.

[Speaker 1] (3:01:51 - 3:02:13)
Don't follow them with your attention. Every thought wants to grow and says, give me attention, but you just let it drift away like a cloud. The sky is blue and occasional clouds may come.

[Speaker 2] (3:02:13 - 3:03:26)
The blue sky is the awareness. The clouds are the thoughts. Now, I'm here to help you free yourself from unconscious, compulsive thinking.

And then you can do some real thinking that is effective and when it's needed. So in essence, you are the sky, the cloud, the vast, empty, spacious sky, thinking of the movement of clouds in this analogy, but it is a good analogy.

[Speaker 1] (3:03:32 - 3:05:10)
Now, if there were so much thinking in you that we could compare it to a sky that is totally covered in clouds, then you would not even know what it is I'm talking about right now. There needs to be in you at least a small opening, an interval between two thoughts, a brief, a small opening, the tiny bit of blue sky that you see as the clouds separate for a moment and there you sense a spaciousness, a stillness. And then you know what it is that I'm talking about.

And then you can begin to become comfortable with it and then actually realize how deeply enjoyable or satisfying that dimension of consciousness is.

[Speaker 2] (3:05:23 - 3:07:18)
It frees you not only from compulsive thinking, which is a dreadful affliction, it frees you also, and perhaps even more importantly, from a sense of identity, a sense of self that is created by identification with compulsive thinking, a sense of identity that is derived from thought. And then you tell yourself and others who you are, that is connected with your life story, a narrative in your mind, which is a story of me,

[Speaker 1] (3:07:19 - 3:07:41)
whatever it is that it consists of, whatever you identify with, whether it's possessions or achievements or non-achievements or successes or failures,

[Speaker 2] (3:07:49 - 3:08:06)
whether you are proud or ashamed of yourself, it all comes down to thought forms

[Speaker 1] (3:08:09 - 3:08:14)
that you confuse with who you are,

even material possessions.

Of course, the only way you can experience a material possession or anything in the outer world is as a thought form.

[Speaker 2] (3:08:37 - 3:08:46)
It gets translated, your sense perceptions get translated into a mental formation.

[Speaker 1] (3:08:50 - 3:09:10)
So you see a big house there, and then the visual perception gets coded into nerve impulses that are sent to the brain and the brain decodes in some way.

[Speaker 2] (3:09:12 - 3:09:21)
And then you end up with a thought form and that says, my house.

[Speaker 1] (3:09:23 - 3:10:05)
And then you identify with a thought form of your house, which may add to your sense of who you are for a while. But there are many thought forms that you can identify with, positive or negative. You can have a thought form that you are, you have no house and you have no car, and perhaps you don't even have a bed.

[Speaker 2] (3:10:09 - 3:10:18)
Does that free you from self-identification?

[Speaker 1] (3:10:21 - 3:11:38)
Well, it frees you from self-identification with a certain type of thought form that corresponds to physical things, but it does not necessarily free you from identification with thought, because you could have the identification with the thought of yourself as someone who has transcended identification with possessions, is therefore spiritually superior to all these unconscious people who live in their big houses and drive their big cars.

You have risen above it. A subtle form of, also of fictitious self, a subtle form of ego, you have to be very careful, of any kind of conceptual identity.

[Speaker 2] (3:11:39 - 3:12:41)
It's always derived from thought, whereas your true identity is non-conceptual, cannot be found in any thought that you have about yourself in the same way that you cannot find the true identity of anybody else through conceptualization, thinking about them.

[Speaker 1] (3:12:53 - 3:14:49)

The art of living is to be able to function in the realm of thought and function as well as possible without looking for yourself in the realm of thought. And usually that means looking for a stronger sense of identity through thought, which for example, you create by having a hostile or antagonistic attitude towards other people or situations, to make them into enemies, so to speak, that strengthens your conceptual identity. Even being angry with somebody strengthens it.

You can see how the ego can get inflated when you're angry with somebody or you observe somebody who is angry. So, this is all part of a live event.

[Speaker 2] (3:14:50 - 3:14:56)
Can't cut it out and that's good.

[Speaker 1] (3:15:10 - 3:15:31)
So if you can use thought, but knowing always who you are, that you are not anything that can be defined by thought, that you cannot know yourself as thought or a bundle of thoughts.

[Speaker 2] (3:15:45 - 3:16:05)
And so we are here to deepen your knowledge of yourself as awareness, as consciousness. And that's nothing to do with conceptual knowledge.

[Speaker 1] (3:16:05 - 3:16:17)
You can't break it down into bits and pieces. Knowledge may not even be the best word to describe it.

[Speaker 2] (3:16:19 - 3:16:23)
Perhaps a better word would be knowing, knowing yourself.

[Speaker 1] (3:16:53 - 4:21:04)
Whereas meditation, true meditation is not a doing, but it's the realization of being. And there's no time in being. Simple realization that you are.

This is why I, some techniques are fine. Eventually, every technique you have to let go. Like a raft, Buddhism has the image of the analogy or the story of a raft that you use to cross a river.

You use a raft to cross a river. When you've crossed the river, you don't take up the raft and carry it around with you. So the raft is a technique or the teaching that can take you there perhaps.

But once you're there, you realize you don't need it. So whatever technique you use in meditation, eventually it is to be transcended or you can transcend it right now without any technique. This is why I don't call this a meditation because if I, again, I love meditation, but there's another possibility, and that is at any given moment to invite this awareness into your life, this dimension to see there is a possibility of awakening, simply realizing that you are in this moment and so that awareness of awareness, the realization of being.

And in that, then, as this deepens, again, this is time to talk about something timeless, and that becomes your identity, the being, not the personality or any achievement or whatever it may be in your past or future. That's fine. You manipulate, you hold, you handle your life consciously.

It will actually improve when you are rooted in the unconditioned consciousness, because that's what it is. Then if you are rooted in the vertical dimension, things begin to actually also improve in the horizontal dimension because that consciousness flows into your life, not that it ever becomes totally free of challenges. The challenges continue, but the challenges will then only take you deeper instead of making you more unconscious, which is what they often do for many humans.

So that is, there's an ancient word, self-realization. You can use that expression. That's who or what you are beyond the personality.

And then that is what Jesus calls when there's a parable about him. He tells a parable about a man who builds a house and the house is built on sand. And when the storms come and the floods come, the house is swept away.

And then there's another man who, before building a house, he digs deep, he digs deep until he reaches the rock, which is deep. And so he reaches the front, after he digs deep and finds the foundation. And then he builds a house on the rock and the floods come and the rains come and the storms come and the house is not swept away, it stands.

This is an analogy about states of consciousness, the state of deep connectedness with being, the vertical dimension, and the state of being trapped only on the horizontal dimension, when life becomes actually suffering, to use a term of the Buddha, frustrating, suffering, and then you can resent it all and so on. So this is the, now your mission is to invite, this into your life throughout the day. Don't miss an opportunity.

Yes, you still go about your normal activities, but allow yourself to become aware of the vertical dimension as much as possible. It seems at first there's a current in you that doesn't want that. There is an, the egoic self will tell you that this is not the time to be present.

You have other, I've got so much on my plate, I can't be present now, don't talk to me about this. Look what I'm dealing with here. And you want me to be spiritual?

Just, I'll be spiritual when I'm, when I've solved all that. And then I'll find a nice place, a retreat center in Bali, and then I can finally... Of course, life does not stop challenging you, so don't wait.

Have your life interspersed with that brief moments, initially brief, brief moments of spaciousness, brief moments of spaciousness. One conscious breath is already something. Let's say you are, you're on your computer.

Okay, one conscious breath. You look away from the screen. If you can, look away at the sky or a plant, anything natural, or close your eyes.

But if you close your eyes, then your screen will still be there. You'll still see the computer screen, awful. So you look at the screen.

One conscious breath. A little bit of spaciousness has opened up. And during that time period, which if you measure in time, it would be like maybe 10 seconds, whatever.

But that is a little bit of spacious consciousness you have suddenly experienced. And you might even want to take a second conscious breath. Follow the breath with your attention.

And maybe even a third, although your mind says, yeah, I don't have time for this. But it's only one minute. So don't believe every thought that comes in and says, I have to deal with this first.

I have to do this first. That's another parable in the Gospels where you're invited to a wedding feast. People get invited to a wedding feast and everybody says, well, let me do this first.

First, I need to sell my cattle. No, I need to do this first. Let me do this first.

There's always something. Don't believe your mind when it says, no, no, can't do it now. There's nobody who does not have one minute to be aware of their breath, unless it's an emergency.

You have to get to the hospital now. Okay. Get into your car.

Every time I would recommend you close the door and stay just a moment of spaciousness. I suggest half a minute to one minute, but don't measure it. Just feel it.

Okay, I'm going to do one minute now. Okay. And then you're just internally already trying to get to the end of it.

You have to be there. Anytime you're waiting for something, be present. Use, if you cannot just be present, this ability may arise a little bit later when you can just decide, so to speak, not the right word, to just be free of thinking, but just be aware.

So that comes a little bit later, just the ability to just have that space. Somebody asked me some years ago, what's your greatest achievement in life? And I said, well, my greatest achievement is I don't think when I don't have to think or don't want to think.

I don't need to think. That's my greatest achievement. But it's not really an achievement, is it?

It wouldn't get me a job. I'm applying for a job in my, what are you going to see? The resume can be free of thinking.

So it's not an achievement. Again, it would be a misperception to just call it an achievement because that discovery, this realization, that dimension of consciousness has already always been there. In that sense, it's not an achievement.

I have made it. No, you didn't do anything. You just became aware of being, which is not a doing.

It sounds like a doing when you talk about it. You become aware of being, not an achievement because being is the essence of who you are. And to know the essence of who you are is not an achievement.

And so, wow. First level of being aware of the present moment is to be aware of your sense perceptions. That brings, it's the first step into the present moment.

Then perhaps you're aware of your breathing and your inner body, and sense perception at the same time. So first you become aware of where you are, what's around you, or what you're doing. And then you go deeper into the present moment.

And the essence of the present moment is you. So the essence of what we call the present moment is consciousness. And consciousness is the space in which everything happens.

Consciousness is the one thing that never changes is the present moment. It's always now. It's always now.

And what is the present moment in essence? In essence, the present moment is not what happens in the present moment. The deeper essence is the present moment is the space for whatever happens.

And there's the space, like the canvas, however you want to call it. So you are aware of yourself ultimately as the present moment. And this realization that ultimately you are the present moment, those words had not come to me when I was writing the power of now.

So it never got into the book because the words came to me after I'd already written the book. Said, oh, I should have put that in. Oh no, why didn't I put that in?

Oh, you're no good. You're good. I didn't do that.

So you can, you sense the essence of what present moment really means as consciousness. The one thing that is beyond any doubt that you are right now conscious. And that's not the right way of putting it.

If I say you are conscious, you are consciousness is better. You are consciousness. Today I may just answer some written questions.

This is only a very small selection out of several hundred. It's hard to choose. It's only almost random choice, not totally random, but almost.

But before I do that, perhaps just a few words, and this will take between five minutes and one hour. Don't. When you want to strengthen the physical body, what do you do?

You exercise. But what is that actually when you exercise? What do you do when you exercise?

One way of putting it is to say that you create difficulty for the body. You create obstacles for the body to overcome. There it is, running on the track with a lifting weight.

It's when you're creating a difficulty for the body. Any exercise is making life difficult for the body. That's a way of looking at it.

That's not a normal way of looking at it. You take the body out of its comfort zone, although there is a stage where the body, once it gets going, the body may enjoy the energy of it. But until that flows, there's a discomfort.

And that's the only way the body can get stronger. If the body stays in its comfort zone, then, well, you will be lying on a sofa or on a deck chair. It's very nice, but the body doesn't change.

So that's an interesting, almost an analogy for something that happens to humans, because it seems that life for everybody creates difficulties. So it's not, one would have thought, if I were God, I would make life easy for everybody. And you would then see most likely, if you did that, most likely there would be, no evolution would ever have happened, or no further evolution if you do it right now, because it's only, it seems, both on the physical level and beyond, it's only through facing difficulties, which you could also call challenges, which you could also call problems, if you like, which you could also call one damn thing after another. The strange thing is, only by encountering these challenges do we grow in consciousness and generate energy. It awakens us eventually.

Now, if you overdo physical exercise, you put too much strain on the body, you could kill the body, you could kill yourself, and this has happened to people who were so obsessed with physical exercise that they overdid it. I've read, for example, whenever it was one or two years ago, a man who wrote about the incredible benefits of jogging died of a heart attack while he was jogging, and he wasn't that old, so you can overdo it, and then instead of the body getting stronger, it dies. And you could also say, when you look at life and humans, life on this planet, probably many other planets, you would say, well, it's all very well.

Sometimes it seems to work that through facing challenges and problems, we grow. We grow out of identification with mind. We grow out of the ego.

We transcend our conditioned state of consciousness, and a new consciousness arises. And if I know, not actually speaking for myself, without facing difficulties and challenges, there would not have been any growth in consciousness and no awakening if I had had a, what's the word? For example, a trust fund, where you know from a very early age, your parents have already looked after your security.

And you know from an early age, if you don't want to work or anything, you don't have to, you can have a comfortable life without ever doing anything. There are people like that. There may even be one or two here, but if you are here and you are a trust fund baby, then other things must have happened to you that created difficulties.

It wasn't financial, but there were other things. And even eventually to a trust fund baby, other difficulties will happen. But for quite a while, it could be that this person remains stagnant or might enjoy certain activities or is indulged in sensory, pleasures until it gets too much.

It's no longer satisfying and then it reaches a critical stage. And sometimes there was a man in, I met him many, many years ago. I was taken to a kind of cocktail party.

I didn't move in those circles, but it just happened accidentally that I ended up there. And somebody took me and says, you must come and look, this is where you're going to meet the sixth richest man in England or something. Somebody, a friend of mine who was impressed by these things.

So I met this man who became rich apparently because he invented one little thing. One, he had one idea and became a billionaire. This is not uncommon these days, by the way, with the internet.

But this was before the internet. He had one idea and that's called Tetra Pak. The drinks that come in a carton and it has a carton that has a particular kind of, opens in a particular way so that you can pour out the liquid.

It's called, it's a patent, Tetra Pak. So he came up with that and he became a billionaire. And I've talked to him briefly and then I forgot about many, many years past and forgot about it.

And two or three years ago, I happened to read in the paper that his son, who was by now, he was probably 40 years old, was a drug addict, seriously addicted to drugs and lost completely control of his life, was adrift completely. And he was, they arrested him. He was driving under the influence of some drugs.

And when police entered his house, they found in one of the bedrooms in big house in Belgravia, London, they found his wife, the dead body of his wife had been in that bed for several months. And he just couldn't, he hadn't killed her, but she probably died of a drug overdose and he just couldn't face dealing with it. So he just closed the door and there was a dead body.

This can happen to the extreme cases of trust fund dysfunction. So in other words, when life gets too easy for you, things can quickly deteriorate, but that's your opportunity then because first life gets too easy. Then because it gets too easy, it deteriorates and you lose more and more consciousness.

And then it is possible that you encounter so much suffering that then finally experience the difficulty of life. And then there's a possibility of growth. So this could happen to this man too.

Now, there's always the possibility of awakening. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

And of course, so you see your life, your so-called life crumbling and it's painful. And it's would be, we're not denying that. That's not saying it's not painful.

It is painful, but it is a chance. It's an opportunity for people to go deeper and realize a foundation, something what you could call true sense of safety or security that has nothing to do with the externals of your life. And it seems that it's necessary for many people to experience adversity in the form of loss to be driven there voluntarily.

They don't go there. And not everybody who experiences adversity will go there. Some get trapped in a reactive movement and become deeply either angry, say it's not fair, shouldn't have happened to me, or be despondent, can't take anymore.

Or you cry for the next five years. You get stuck in a reactive movement. And so you're even more deeply stuck in a rigid pattern.

But there is a chance that you can go deeper and let go of seeking to identify with any form in your life. And suddenly something arises from deep within that is peaceful. You can't name it.

And so you've touched suddenly something that you didn't know existed in you. I sometimes call it the formless. Could call spirit because spirit is the formless.

And suddenly you have the peace that passes all understanding because you can't explain it. Well, I'm trying to explain it. But it's hard.

So it seems to me there's a general pattern at work that it is inherent in the nature of physical existence of life forms that challenges an essential ingredient of their lifespan here. And part of the way through which they evolve. But when they say they evolve, what it means is the one consciousness evolves, awakens into this dimension through the different life forms in different ways.

And it awakens only because we are being challenged. And that is quite a relief to realize to be challenged doesn't mean there's something wrong. There's something wrong with my life that shouldn't be.

If you believe or act as if this shouldn't be happening, then you get really unhappy. Then the challenges become transformed into unhappiness inside you. If it's not unhappiness, it's resentment.

If it's not resentment, it's anger. It's self-pity. It's complaining.

It's despondency. So for the simple reason that you are misunderstanding the very purpose of life and expecting something that your mind has come up with, it should be different. What you are looking for is something deeper.

What every human is looking for is something deeper than the world can give you. The world can only challenge you, give you challenges and adversity so that you awaken. The world cannot, as I said, it cannot make you happy because it's not here to make you happy.

But it has another purpose. It is here to make you conscious. That's how it operates.

Also, that means whatever arises in the present moment is just right for this moment, for you at this moment. But if you are stuck in the mind, the egoic mind, then you will completely ignore or even continuously dislike the present moment. And it is an amazing way to live.

It is dreadful. But millions still live like that without knowing it unconsciously. They live for the next moment until they get very old.

Then they know there's not much time left. Then the past becomes more and more important, the happiness of the past. Oh, oh.

So living for the next moment is, for most people, unconscious and quite normal. They live hoping that at some point they are going to achieve fulfillment. And little fulfillments come here and then.

There's nothing wrong with that. It's wonderful when you achieve things. It's even wonderful when you fall in love.

Enjoy it. Falling in, it's not going to last, but enjoy it. So that's great.

It's not, but there's always, I've met in the, fortunately been able to meet over the years quite a few people who are in the eyes of the world highly successful. They've got everything. They've got fame.

They've got money. They've got everything. They have got their private jets.

They can go anywhere at any moment, can have anything, any pleasure. And they've told me that after they achieved fame and fortune, there was an initial time period when there was elation and they were on a continuous high, but then gradually, more and more, they experienced a very deep low in their mental, emotional state, including depression and wanting to, not wanting to live anymore. They had everything, but, and some had to go to drugs to make life bearable, had everything.

Wasn't enough. It wasn't enough. And then you can't fool yourself anymore when you have everything.

You can't fool yourself. When I achieve that, I'll be happy. No, you have achieved everything, but you're not happy.

So the worst thing would be for you to achieve, to get everything that you want, and then you can't fool yourself anymore and look to the future for some fulfillment, and that's really dreadful. So that is the human condition, and it all is connected to who you sense yourself to be, your identity, your identity as who you are, your sense of self. That is the foundation for your life, your sense of self, and everybody is concerned with identity.

From childhood onward, the identity becomes very important. Of course, every human needs shelter and food, and sustenance, shelter, and one can say almost the next thing, well, the next thing is, as a human grows up, needs some kind of love or affection, but that's already bound up with identity because if you don't get love and affection, then you already have a deficient sense of self that developed in early age. So identity refers to your sense of self, and where does your sense of self come from?

What does it mean to be you? And usually, most humans, especially those who are not awakening yet, they look to their sense of identity through a narrative that is connected to their past. So I call that sometimes the story of me.

So everybody has the story of me. I call that, well, it's a narrative, and people call it, this is an interesting expression, they call it my life. So you think about my life, let me think about that.

Well, it's a mixture of good and bad. It's been all kinds of weird things in the past. And certainly, almost everybody says, it didn't quite go the way I had imagined it to be when I was 18 or 17.

And many people have a feeling something went wrong somewhere. Strangely, many people have the feeling they haven't started to live yet. And it's almost like I'm still, I'm hoping at some point I'm going to start living soon.

I'll start, I just need to meet the right person. I just need to get that job. I just need to find this or that possession, or if people would only recognize my worth or recognition of one kind.

It's an unconscious process. The longing, my life hasn't actually started yet. And some people have that throughout their life until finally they are surprised that they reach retirement.

And they're still, but just maybe a few years before retirement, you can look to your retirement as the liberation. Then I can start living. Now I know when I retire, then I can start living.

Okay, two more years, one more year, six months. And then the moment comes, you sit in your office and the clock reaches five o'clock, it's my last day. And then off you go.

And the first few days and weeks are great because you go to the golf course and then sit around. If you have sufficient funds, you can have your cocktails. You may not have sufficient funds these days, so that's another problem.

And so a few weeks pass and you sit there and you take a trip and you come back. And then you move to a better climate because you don't, let's move to Florida, okay. And then you sit in Florida, just looking at the sun and then you play another game of golf.

And then a kind of fatigue sets in and then the mind says, and now what? And nothing, who am I now? I had this title, I had a job description.

I was the vice president of this company or whatever. And now I'm no longer a vice president. And a great part of my identity was derived from the concept of vice president of the company.

And suddenly the concept has dissolved and who am I now? Without that, well, that's weird. I get this weird feeling of not being nobody anymore.

And so you're retired. And it's a strange thing that it is not uncommon for people to die just two or three years after retiring because there's nothing there anymore to live for. They were looking towards retirement for some kind of a solution, but that's not it.

So it's not, everybody's looking where it cannot be found. It cannot be found in the future. That what you're looking for cannot be found in the future because, don't tell anybody, but there is no future.

There is no future. There just seems to be a future. And you are aware, just as I'm aware of what's around me, you're aware of what's around you.

You're aware of my voice. You're aware of what you see. And you may be aware of feelings or thoughts that are still coming and going.

And the all important question is, in addition to being aware of these things, are you aware that you are aware? That is the, or we could call the transcendent dimension. That is inner space opening up and that is going beyond form in your life because everything is form, sense perceptions, thoughts, thought forms, emotions, emotional formations.

And the challenge is not to get trapped exclusively in the world of form, which includes your form identity, which consists of whatever's going on in your life and primarily the thoughts and thought patterns and emotional patterns that you, the memories and so on, is all thoughts that you identify with as yourself. That's a very small, limiting sense of self that easily gets frustrated, upset, anxious, reactive. And why do you always get, not you personally, why, if one is trapped in that narrow sense of self, why does one get so easily upset, anxious, reactive, lost in all kinds of mental formations, identified with viewpoints and opinions so that other viewpoints and other opinions held by other people make those people into enemies, all those things that bring enormous limitation into your life, but that's normal. Almost everybody lives like that, except those who are awakening.

And awakening, just as you are, awakening means a dimension is coming into your life that is beyond form, and that's why we are here. So when I asked at the beginning, whether you are, in addition to being aware of whatever is going on and even of my voice, the image on the screen, in addition to all that, are you aware that you are aware? That's the dimension of depths, because suddenly you realize there's a depth to who you are that's formless.

And one could say unknowable, so what you know about yourself is very little. And what you can know, if you undergo whatever psychoanalysis, examine your psyche, repressed memories, hidden desires, what you can know is very small, but beyond that, there's a vast depths. If you are not aware of that, then it's almost as if it wasn't there, it's not there for you, you're not in touch with it.

But that depth is where the person is transcended and connects with something that is infinitely vaster than the person. And that is a source of true intelligence, of aliveness, of all life. And it, being in touch with that, knowing, sensing it within yourself, frees you from being only the little person.

And from that depths emanates love for yourself, loving kindness that can only emanate when you're not trapped in form, which needs to protect itself, enhance itself. So when you're trapped in form, you're always looking out for where the next threat is coming from, or try to solidify your form identity, enhance it, strengthen it. And then, so then no, there can be no real outflow of goodwill, loving kindness, love, if you want to call it that, goodness arising, a goodness that is deeper than good and bad.

For those of you for whom perhaps this is a new thing, a new realization, you may still be asking, being aware that I'm aware, what do you mean by that? And what does it mean? Well, what does it mean is it means that you're aware of yourself as consciousness and not just aware of yourself as this person.

Now, the person is not separate from consciousness. It's a form that consciousness has taken like a wave on the surface of the sea, a temporary form, but the wave is not separate from the depths of the sea and the ocean, it is part of it. So that's what that means.

And if you still don't know how to be aware of yourself as consciousness or to be aware of awareness, one way to give you a taste of it is, and that's why it's an ancient meditation method, is to be aware that you're breathing. You're always breathing, but usually not aware that you're breathing. To be aware that you're breathing is to be continuously aware of the breath flowing in and out like now.

And so it's not just one moment, oh yeah, I'm breathing. No, it's a continuous awareness of the breath flowing in and out, sensing it. And for a moment, let's say, feel that the air that surrounds you and that you're breathing in is consciousness.

That it's conscious consciousness, the essence of all life. So you're breathing in consciousness and now it's also inside you. So it's within and without.

Consciousness cannot be analyzed, dissected, cut into smaller pieces. So you can't know really anything about it, but you can sense it, be it, know that you are it, essentially. So breath awareness opens up that inner space of awareness.

So at first you're aware of breath, of breathing. So it still seems that you're aware of something, but breath is something that is not clearly defined in form. It's almost formless, just as your breath is formless, has not a clearly defined form.

That's why, as I said before, in various places, breath is often equated with spirit. That is the formless consciousness. And at the beginning of the Old Testament of the Bible, the beautiful myth, before form comes into being, the world is described as formless.

And the breath of God or the spirit of God is hovering, it says. So by being aware of your breathing, you also become aware of awareness. So after a little while, you can forget about breathing.

And the awareness of breath has become the awareness of awareness. Awareness. And so that awareness, you're rooted then in something timeless, eternal, very deep.

And you don't get anxious and upset anymore about all the changing conditions of your life and what other people do or fail to do or have done or shouldn't have done. All that absurd littleness that makes up most people's lives. And that makes life so miserable and frustrating.

That's what the Buddha called dukkha, which means misery, which means suffering, which means unhappiness, which means happy one day, unhappy the next. And this has often been described in spirituality as dying, the kind of deaths that you die, which happens to some people spontaneously when their sense of self, form-based sense of self, perhaps due to intense suffering, crumbles. And then that which is deeper and formless suddenly is there, and that's the death and the rebirth.

But the fact that you're here means that probably you've had enough suffering to have reached this point where you no longer need to be pushed or forced into the kingdom of heaven, which is one expression that an ancient teacher used to describe the formless dimension. And the fact that you're here now means you probably don't need to be forced into the kingdom of heaven through intense suffering anymore because it's already emerging in you, through you. So you've suffered enough.

However, if you should need just a little bit more, then that's fine, you'll get it. The world gives you what you need. Ultimately, the world is not here to make you comfortable, not here to make you happy, you might have noticed.

But to bring about, paradoxically, to bring about the transcendence of the world. And you spend a long time becoming a person, lifetimes, in order to eventually transcend the person. So first the egg forms, and it has to become a nice egg.

And then it starts cracking. The shell cracks open and something miraculous emerges. And with this comes the ability also to be comfortable with just being when doing is not required.

You don't need to run around all your life continuously doing. There can be a balance between doing and being. And it's wonderful if you discover in yourself the ability to just be like now.

Not trying to get anywhere or do anything, but just sense your own depths. And from that depth, you look around and you will find a lot of aliveness and beauty with that before you overlooked.

[Speaker 2] (4:21:32 - 4:21:41)
There is a moment of spacious awareness. You haven't interpreted it yet because you did not have enough time to interpret it.

[Speaker 1] (4:21:41 - 5:14:08)
So there was a timeless moment of pure perception. It frees you very briefly from the egoic self. So you can continue to function without going totally insane.

Awareness is rising above thinking. And I'd asked you before to become aware of gaps between words. And this is the secret, the entry point is there.

By becoming aware of gaps between words, for example, you become aware that in those brief moments you are actually not thinking. This is the key to the evolution of human consciousness is realizing the possibility of, let's put it like that, of becoming familiar with that space of pure awareness where you are able to think, but you don't have to think. This is rising above thinking instead of falling below thinking.

Rising above thinking, there's an alertness to it. This is the opposite of what happens when you take in certain substances. There's a decrease of alertness.

You become less conscious. When you rise above thinking, and I would suggest to you that as we talk about it here, that it's not just the words, that become aware of your state of consciousness right now when you listen to these words and realize that in order to understand and recognize the truth behind these words, you don't have to think. You don't have to figure out in your conceptual mind whether what I'm saying is true or not.

At a deeper level, you know it's true, but how do you know that it's true? Because you experience, if only briefly, here and now, you experience that beautiful space of pure awareness or presence. Wow.

So there are moments when you're actually, you're not thinking like now. I can stop speaking now for 10 seconds. Now, when I stop speaking now for 10 seconds, do you need to fill that space by adding thought to it, or are you able to just be with that 10-second space without adding any thought to it?

And then I'll ask you a question after that, but right now, I would stop speaking for 10 seconds and I will just do something that certain Zen masters do in order to remind their disciples of the state of alert presence. They go like this. One Zen master never gave any other explanation when he was asked to explain the essence of Zen.

All he would ever do is raise his finger and look at you. Please, can you explain the essence of Zen to us again? We didn't understand it yesterday.

So for 10 seconds, I'll raise my finger and please don't count the seconds. Now, when you're not, did you disappear when you were not thinking? When you're not remembering your problems, when you're not remembering whether your life is a big success or a big failure, to take two extremes, if you think your life is a big success, you're in a state of temporary delusion.

And just wait a little. So it's amazing that, now you may also find, because that sometimes in your daily life, you have moments when there is pure awareness, but you don't even know it. Throughout your daily life, you have brief moments when you're actually not thinking, but they may be quite short, but you have brief moments without wanting them whenever you look at something, especially if it's something natural, like this might be the sky or a flower or a dog, but not necessarily even natural.

It could be almost anything that does not immediately stimulate conceptualization like something written. So you look at something, let's say, especially you just step out of the building, you open the door or you come into the building and you open the door and you step, and for a moment, something new enters your perceptual field. Now, if you're very alert, in the first two or three seconds, you have to take it in and you're not thinking.

Then the mind kicks in and calls it something. It says, oh, this is that, this is that, whatever the mind has to say about it. It identifies it.

It gives you, it attaches a label to whatever it is that you are perceiving. But in the first few moments when something new enters your perceptual field, there is a moment of spacious awareness. You haven't interpreted it yet because you did not have enough time to interpret it.

So there was a moment, a timeless moment of pure perception. And the more you have that in your life, the more it frees you very briefly from the egoic self. So you can continue to function without going totally insane because you have these moments, these brief moments of awareness.

Now, there are humans who almost never have them, but they are in a very serious mental state of mental dysfunction. So if you're not completely insane yet, and of course, all of you here have gone far beyond all that already. If you're not completely, continuously trapped in dreadful unhappiness, that means occasionally you experience these brief moments of awareness, but you don't even know it.

You might think, oh, this is caused by, let's say you witness something beautiful. Let's say you witness a sunset. And you go, oh, and you're really looking at that sunset.

And for quite a while, the mind doesn't say anything. There's a pure perception, and there's a stillness behind the perception. But all you're aware of is the perception itself.

So when you then interpret it, you say, I felt so good because that sunset was so beautiful. Another example, you might be engaged in strenuous physical activity, perhaps even dangerous physical activity. You might be surfing, or you might be climbing a mountain wall, or whatever it is, some dangerous or strenuous physical activity, and you feel so good, you feel so alive.

You only feel alive when you're engaged in that activity. So you get addicted to that activity. Why?

Because it frees you from yourself temporarily. And what does that mean? It means while you're engaged in that activity, you are not thinking, you are just present.

And so, but you don't know that. You confuse the activity or the contemplation of the beautiful sunset. You confuse that with what caused that sense of being intensely alive.

What was the cause of feeling so good in that moment? Well, you say, well, the sunset made me feel so good. Or when I engaged in surfing, I feel so good.

The surfing makes me feel good. That's not entirely true. The deeper reason why you feel good is you are free of yourself in those moments.

And what arises is intense presence. In that intense presence, you experience self-transcendence. You are in touch with being.

Ah, and then people get addicted to certain activities. And if they're dangerous activities, then you never know how much, anything could happen. Now, the good news is, of course, if you enjoy certain activities or enjoy beauty in nature, it's wonderful.

Just go into nature with all your senses alive and take in. It frees you. It can also, if you're alert, it can free you from the problematic thinking mind, can free you from yourself.

And you take in the incredible aliveness that's all around you. And you go in a state of astonishment and wonder. I think it was Plato, or was it, well, Plato or Socrates who said, philosophy begins with wonder or astonishment.

You go, oh, and what is wonder or astonishment? Wonder or astonishment, you're not thinking, and you're not even trying to think. You're just aware, and you're aware of it.

There's a depth. You're not just aware of what's on the surface of sensory perception. You're aware of something that is deeper than sensory perception, the intense aliveness that's behind all phenomena, all phenomena of nature, but ultimately all phenomena.

Whatever we perceive is a surface dimension of reality. There's something far deeper hiding behind the surface dimension of reality. So you take in nature and you go, wow, oh.

So nature can free you temporarily. If you don't mistake the thing that you think frees you, it's not it. It frees you from your mind, and because it frees you from habitual or obsessive compulsive thinking, addictive, obsessive compulsive.

These are three good words to describe most people's mind activity. Addictive, obsessive, compulsive, dreadful. It frees you from that, and because it frees you from that, you suddenly feel good.

Now, how do you feel good? What does it mean? There's a deep sense of connectedness with, ah.

Let's return for a moment to the ripple because we forgot about the ripple. I hadn't come to the end of the story of the ripple yet. Because so far, the ripple is unhappy because it lives on the surface of the ocean.

At some point, the ripple becomes so dissatisfied with what it can find on the surface of the ocean, it comes to a stop and it goes, ah. And it suddenly becomes aware there's more to it than it had thought. There's more to it than meets the eye, so to speak, because what meets the eye is the surface phenomena of reality.

Sensory perception is there. So there's more to it than meets the eye. The ripple suddenly becomes aware that, oh.

But it cannot define what this more is. It goes, oh. It begins to realize that it's actually forever connected to and one with the ocean.

And that's an enormous realization and liberation for the ripple. Wow. And then perhaps the ripple is able to remain in connectedness with that sense of beingness or presence, even when it continues its ripple existence on the surface.

It still operates as a ripple, and yet no longer in the state of continuous fear, anxiety, dissatisfaction, regret, irritation, and all the things that make up people's lives and life situation very, very unsatisfactory, not pleasant at all. And it can then begin to even enjoy its ripple existence on the surface of things, because the neediness is gone, the neediness of needing some kind of satisfaction, ultimate satisfaction on the level of surface reality of the surface of the ocean. And the strange paradox is, or irony, is that once you, because you are the ripple, once you find the connectedness with being, the surface existence of the surface I becomes a more satisfying experience, because the neediness is gone.

You do still do things, create things, you are active, you still acquire new things, you learn new things, new skills, more knowledge, you have experiences, you have relationships, you travel, you experience a new place, you continue to explore the sensory realm, but it becomes a much more satisfying place because you are not looking to it for ultimate satisfaction. That's a wonderful liberation. And you realize ultimate satisfaction is inseparable actually from the present moment.

I find it impossible to find inner stillness and peace with the prospect of genocide in mind. How can one remain at peace knowing genocide, torture, and kidnappings have happened and will keep happening? Could I truly remain at peace if my family members were being tortured by some military army?

The last part of the question, could I truly remain at peace if my family members were being tortured by some military army? We cannot answer that here because as far as I can tell from your question, your family members are not being tortured by some military army. So the question does not arise from an actual situation, but from thoughts in your head, you imagine what would happen if.

Now it is beyond doubt, and we all know that these things have happened and are happening, as you say, all over the planet. Therefore, you find it difficult to be at peace or to find inner stillness knowing that these dreadful things are still happening all over the planet. That seems understandable, but is anybody being helped, you or anybody else, by your unwillingness to find peace?

Within. It's not the case that you actually go out into the world in order to alleviate the suffering or to stop all the genocide and kidnappings and torture, as you put it. Now, if you did feel called upon to go to some corner of the earth where violent or dreadful things are happening to alleviate suffering, that's another matter.

If you look at human history, you can see that these things have happened thousands of years ago already. They continue to happen throughout history. To the extent that, as I sometimes put it, reading history of humanity seems like reading the story of insanity with a few lucid moments here and there, and in particular, the 20th century, a place of incredible insanity and suffering inflicted by humans.

On other humans. Now, once you see that your unwillingness to embrace spiritual awakening, because so much unconsciousness is happening all over the planet that is the cause of the violence, that doesn't really make sense. Does it?

Your mind is saying, I'm refusing to invite the spiritual dimension into my life or to enter the awakening process because so many people on this planet are unconscious. Therefore, I refuse to become conscious. It's a convenient excuse for the egoic mind to stay in charge and to keep running the show.

And while it does that, it can complain, of course. It's lovely, isn't it? The complaining about all the dreadful things that are happening.

Does that help anyone? No. No.

Did the Buddha, who taught 2,500 years ago how to go beyond suffering, did he say, I'm not telling you how to go beyond suffering because so many humans on this planet are still suffering. Let's wait for them to come to an end of suffering and then I'll tell you the secret and then we can all become enlightened. Doesn't work like that.

It doesn't start with, let's wait for the rest of the universe to become enlightened and then we can enter the spiritual dimension. It has to start from you. Any change on the planet, in order to be true change and not just a variation on the same theme, must entail a change in consciousness because whatever humans produce, whatever they manifest externally arises and corresponds to, arises out of their state of consciousness.

If that state of consciousness is dysfunctional, disharmonious, negative, fearful, angry, and millions live in that state, identified with their ego, then you get huge collective egos fighting other collective egos and that's the insanity. Change, we both agree that change is necessary, but it doesn't come from out there. It would also apply to your own life.

There's some people who come to me and say, I have to sort out various outstanding matters in my life. The big problem still in my life is my business situation and my living situation and this, I don't really have time to go into all this spiritual stuff because there's too much for me to deal with at the moment or as the expression goes, I have too much on my plate to have time for spiritual awakening that has to wait, I have to sort these things out first. And if you do that, of course, you will find that the time never comes because there's no end to the problems that arise out there.

Jesus told the same story in the parable of the wedding feast. People are invited to a wedding feast and each person has their particular excuse why they cannot come to the wedding feast. One person says, oh, I've got to have some business dealings to do, just have to sell my cows and sheep and need to do that.

Let me first do that, maybe I'll come then. The other one says, oh, my father has just died, let me first bury my father. Every excuse starts with the words, let me first do this.

And that shows the prevalent attitude of believing that something out there needs to change before I can, or in your case, before I feel justified in looking for inner peace. But that is a fallacy. The external peace can only come when humans, or at least a sufficiently large number of humans, embrace inner peace.

And you can't wait for the torture and killings to stop and then embrace inner peace. Change happens from the inside out, not from the outside in. So, yes, knowing that at this very moment, every second, every minute, dreadful things are happening on the planet.

Of course, it's always been like that. At this very moment, somebody is being murdered. Perhaps bombs are exploding, people are torturing, kidnapping others, warfare between armies or groups.

Or gangs. Of course, it's happening every moment. Does your anxiety help that situation, your non-peace?

No. But if there's a shift in consciousness, there may be a change. And that starts with you.

So don't believe what your mind is telling you about the undesirability of inner peace. Because the world is so mad and so violent, that does not make sense if you look closely. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. This is not a conventional meditation. I may be speaking most of the time, but there are also gaps in between the words, which of course are always more important than the words.

And if you're aware of the gaps, as much as you're aware of the words, then you're already entering the state of meditation without having to go through any preliminary technique. Not that there's anything wrong with techniques. So it's actually quite lovely to be aware not only of the words, but also the stillness that's there.

The space, one could say, between the words, even underneath the words. And the miraculous thing is when you're aware of that for a brief moment, whenever you're aware of the space, you're not thinking. So the more you're aware of the space or the spaces, the less absorbed you are in the stream of thinking and not being absorbed in the stream of thinking, not identifying with the stream of thinking, is meditation.

And of course, the aim of meditation is that eventually it becomes your normal state of consciousness, in which case you may still want to practice so-called formal meditation because you like it, or you may not. Now, usually, in your daily life, things constantly arise in your field of awareness, demanding attention, situations, people, things that need to be done. And sometimes things are pulling at you from various directions, demanding your attention at the same time.

And when you no longer know where to put your attention, you're beginning to experience so-called stress because stress means one thing is pulling this way, another thing is pulling that way, and so you get stress. And as long as you're unaware, unconscious, spiritually speaking, the world around you determines where your attention goes, people, situation, events, your electronic devices that go ping when the next text message comes in, or whatever sound it is, or go pong when the next email arrives, and immediately your attention goes there. And then somebody else, somebody, oh.

So I call that losing oneself in the world. And then, of course, there's your thinking. Every thought that arises seems to say, give me more of your attention, follow me to where I want you to go.

And so when you're unaware, then whatever thought comes into your head has this enormous pulling power. And so you identify with the thought and you're completely in it, and it takes you this way and that way and leads to a whole succession of thoughts. And so on the most primordial level, it's thinking, really, that absorbs your attention, your mind, because even external things have to be transformed into mind stuff before you can experience it so that you can experience it.

And all external objects, before you can be aware of them, have to be taken in through sensory perception, then transformed into nerve impulses, and then reassembled somewhere to make up this picture of external reality. But it's ultimately all you ever experience is your mind. So that's really what we need to look at.

So most people are continuously aware of something, and they are at the mercy of whatever arises in their mind that has this power to pull in their attention. One thing you learn in meditation is you have a choice. You can direct your attention to one thing, and then you can see if you can keep your attention on one particular mind object, which could be becoming aware of your breathing, or it could be a mantra that you repeat in your mind, one mind object, or an external object, the candle flame.

So you begin to realize that you can actually direct attention. You don't have to be at the mercy of whatever comes into your mind. So as we sit here, for example, you can direct your attention.

Your attention is, of course, in auditory perception and visual perception. But in addition, you can also have some of your attention on your breathing, for example. You're aware even as you listen and as you watch, if your eyes are open, you can be aware also that at the same time, you're breathing, you're choosing to have some attention there too.

That's a very calming thing. And you become aware that your body is alive on the inside. You can become aware that there's a sense of aliveness inside your hands.

Another ancient meditation method to do it more methodically, you become aware that your feet are alive on the inside, your legs, your entire body. There's a field of aliveness. You become aware of that.

You can then choose to put your attention on that rather than on something else. Where it would habitually go. So gradually, you become aware of your own power.

You're not at the mercy of events and things, your thoughts, ultimately. There's a deeper dimension in you, deeper than thinking, and getting in touch with that, accessing that, realizing that that is the essence of who you are. That's why we're here.

The purpose of this is to get in touch with that deeper dimension within yourself, deeper than thinking. And what is that? We could describe it as the feeling or the sense of being you at the most fundamental level.

What does it feel like to be you? Now, usually, when you speak in terms of I, let's use the first person, what does it feel like? What's it like to be you?

What does it feel like to be me? What is that sense of identity, the sense of self? Usually, you refer then to certain things in your mind, your history, your conditioned mind, the history of me, the story of me, me and my problems, me and my situation, me and this and this and this.

So there's always, on that level, your feeling of being yourself is really to be identified with certain things that arise in your mind. But here we are attempting to go deeper to a more foundational, a more real sense of what is it that underlies all that? What is it that makes the story of you, that most people tend to be who they are, what is it that makes the story of you possible?

What is the space, the light in which it appears? There's something deeper without which there could be no story. And yet it's not separate from it.

And that's always the same. There's a deep sense of beingness or presence in you that is prior and deeper than anything that happens in your life or in your mind. So I'd like you to get in touch with that and get this sense of being you at the deepest level.

What does that feel like? And it's a very strange question. So I'm, usually then your attention is directed to certain things, objects in your mind.

What we're attempting to do here is to ultimately becoming aware of that attention itself, which is awareness. So when I ask you, what's it like to be you? I'm really asking you to become aware of your own awareness.

And that is not an object. You can't say, ah, there it is, I've got it now. You cannot have it because you are it.

It's the essence of who you are. You cannot describe it because it has no form. You cannot talk about it in terms of past or future.

Because there's no time to it. It is a timeless dimension. And this, their sense of beingness, that, if that becomes the foundation for your life, so to speak, if you could not lose touch with that, in other words, not lose touch with the most essential dimension within you, then the way in which you experience this world would change.

Because you would be continuously aware of that which is deeper than whatever arises in this world or in your mind. And to feel that within yourself brings about a sense of trust in life. It is as if something were carrying you, something vaster than the little man.

You are me, and you are connected with a vastness there that goes far beyond you as the person with a history. And to sense that within yourself, you can feel there is a power there that is the power of life itself. And if you don't know that, all that's available to you is a trickle of that power.

But as you become aware of it, which really means become aware of awareness, become conscious of consciousness, which again, when we speak, when we use words, it's never quite right. Because the moment we construct a sentence, we create duality, subject and object. And you say, I am aware of consciousness.

That you have a subject and an object, which isn't quite right. Because there is no I apart from consciousness. So you'd have to qualify it and say, I'm aware of consciousness as myself.

Then you undo the original error that is semantic. That brings about a sense of, you can say rootedness in being and brings about a trust in life. In other words, what is trust, which in other spiritual traditions have other words for it, faith.

It's the absence of fear. That's really what trust is. So when you're in touch with that within yourself, the world is no longer perceived as a fearful place.

And there's a detachment that comes in, especially in your relationship with your mind. Thoughts, of course, still come. You can use thought.

In fact, use it much more effectively. And yet you don't become identified anymore with every thought that comes into your mind. So you're detached from thought, although thought can operate.

It doesn't draw you in totally. There's always some of you remains spacious beyond thought, and then thought happens. It is possible, even if for the time being you are in a job that you would perhaps not choose to do for the rest of your life, but even there to make the first step towards opening up is to let go of resistance to what you're doing and give it your fullest attention.

And sometimes then life takes you away into something else because you have opened yourself up so you can give of your best. If you, let's say for the past few, three years, you disliked working at this restaurant and everybody somehow, even though you smile, but everybody can feel that you don't really want to be there and the customers can feel it and your colleagues can feel it. And if you then shift and you do it with fullest attention and you honor every moment, every person that comes into the moment and the way you put the plate on the table, there's attention there.

So what changes then is not sometimes what you do but how you do what you do. And I would say, I don't know if you've looked at that, the first step towards finding something more satisfying can be to change, not to look for what, I don't know what, but change the how in what you're doing already and bring full presence to what you're doing. And then perhaps somebody notices how present you are, a customer at a restaurant and says, oh, what's your name?

And suddenly that leads to something else. Either you open your own restaurant and suddenly people come in and they feel good in that presence that you create, an energy field of presence or whatever it may be. So have you looked at that to changing, initially perhaps to change the how rather than necessary because otherwise if you're trapped in negativity, it may be much more difficult to break out of that.

I agree absolutely with that. It seems to me one of the things that makes us human, because in most respects we're like the rest of life on earth, our lives are short and organic and dependent. But you ask, well, why have human beings suddenly come to dominate the planet in the way that we have?

And part of my answer anyway is to say that human beings uniquely have extraordinary powers of imagination, the ability to bring into mind things that aren't present. We can look forward, we can look back. We can enter other people's consciousness virtually, which is what we mean by empathy.

And if we imaginatively engage with somebody else's consciousness, if we're empathetic, then we broaden our own lives. And it's always interesting to me that in times of war and conflict, the first thing that we try to suppress is our empathy for the people that we're rising up against. And it's only when we suppress our empathy that we can do things that are literally unimaginable.

And the reason I say that is from that power comes all the powers of practical creativity. And there is a literal sense, I think, which is clearly in what you've just said, that as human beings, we create our own lives. We create our own realities.

We compose our lives. And we can recompose them. We can recreate them.

We can see things differently. We can choose to see it differently. We can see it this way, or we can see it that way.

And often the most dreary circumstances can be transformed, not by the circumstances changing, but by our attitude to the circumstance changing. And that in due course may change the circumstance.

[Speaker 1] (5:15:49 - 5:36:13)
And that in itself, that perhaps is the, the ultimate creative act is that. It's the ultimate creative act, not necessarily create something, but to create, not to be a reactive entity, but to create your own life. Yes.

Find death before death finds you. There was a spiritual teacher, philosopher in early 20th century from Gurdjieff, from Russian area, I remember that. He later moved to France and taught there.

He had an interesting, he was a, he said, people have a personality and essence. And he said, many people have a strongly developed personality and virtually no essence. And it's very rare for people to have more essence than personality.

It was an interesting way of looking at it. And that's, of course, how it is, that I'm now elaborating. He only, there's only a little bit of that.

And then he dropped the whole matter and then he didn't talk about it again. So the essence, there is, there are two dimensions in your identity. There is the form identity, the you as form, with your physical form and your name and all your knowledge and education and abilities and your past, whatever happened in your past, that's all connected.

And it all makes up your, who you are on the level of form, who you perceive yourself to be and who others see you. And there is a connection between how the world or other people see you and how you see yourself. And when you are trapped exclusively in a form identity, so you only know yourself as a form identity, then how other people see you is of extreme importance to you because it contributes to how you see yourself.

So you might become self-conscious and see the self-conscious in English means that you're very much aware of how you're being perceived. And you feel always a little uneasy because you feel observed and people are judging you and you say, and you want to appear in a certain way. And there's a natural tendency in humans to emphasize their form identity to the world.

It's a natural thing. So I'm not, you can't tell a little child when the little child begins to say, or says, you're observing that one child says to the other child, look, I can do this. You can't do what I can do.

I can do this, but you can't. Or the child says, my dad has a bigger car than yours. You can't say to the child, don't do that.

You're emphasizing your form identity. But you know, that's what's happening. It's a natural tendency in humans to emphasize.

It could be a possession. I have more than you. It could be my body is looks better than yours or is stronger than yours or bigger than yours or taller than yours.

Or it could be, I have an ability that you don't have. Children start with that. And it's, let's, I can play the piano.

What can you play? I play the ping pong machine. Okay.

So the emphasize form identity is a natural thing. It can be, there is a point where this should come to a natural conclusion. I would say in a more evolved humanity, the emphasis of form identity as a person reaches adulthood a little bit after is replaced.

At the moment, this is not what's happening, but can be replaced by something more genuine and deeper. And that is finding your essence identity that's underneath your form identity. And that is spiritual dimension, finding the spiritual dimension in yourself so that who you think you are is no longer, you still have a form identity.

Yes, that level is still there. Undoubtedly, you have certain abilities. You're good at this.

You're not good at that. You're better than the other person in this thing, but not as good as in the other thing. That remains, but it no longer gives you your sense of who you are.

And that can only happen when something else arises that is deeper than the form. And that's the presence. And when the presence arriving in you, which has no form and is not tangible, it's there pervading your entire being, then suddenly you realize and you feel who you are essentially has nothing to do with what you possess how your body looks, your abilities, what you can do, or what you know.

That's another one. That's form identity with what I know. I know more than you.

So then comes the realization who you essentially are is nothing to do with possessions or looks or physical or mental abilities or other abilities. But it comes from a much deeper place. And that deeper place no longer operates through comparison.

Your essence identity does not deepen because it's stronger than somebody else's essence identity. You don't compare yourself anymore to others in order to find out who you are. And that's such a liberation from only knowing yourself as that particular form because with that comes a lot of suffering.

A lot of suffering comes when your, who you are is derived from the form of you. Because at some point, let's see if you have good looks and then your, who you are is based mostly on that. And you feel superior to most because you look so much better.

Then you look down on all these other people who are not good looking at all. And then you even emphasize it. So you buy, you look even greater with the wonderful things you wear.

And then as the decades pass, you look in the mirror and there's something wrong slowly. And you notice that the mirror is becoming, seems to be becoming defective. It no longer shows you the beauty of who you are externally.

And then you need to pay for repair jobs. But even there, it's just postponing the suffering that inevitably comes when what your identity was based on begins to collapse. And that's awful.

Or it could be an ability. You are very good at something, but then at some point something happens and you are not good at it anymore. Or somebody else suddenly comes who is so much better than you.

One could give many examples. Knowledge, perhaps your mind doesn't retain the knowledge anymore or it becomes redundant. And having an encyclopedic mind is no longer a great thing because the internet is always better, Wikipedia.

So sooner or later, if it's strengths, then eventually you can't compete anymore. You get arthritis, can't jump high enough anymore. But all these things, sooner or later, when your identity is based on form, then you begin to suffer.

So it's vital to have both, but it's not easy because your form identity has its own kind of momentum. And that's the ego. The ego is anything you identify with as yourself becomes part of your ego identity.

So form identity is ego. The ego is a formation, an energy field, an energy form in you that is quite, refuses to go. It wants to survive as this particular form.

It wants to defend its form. It wants to strengthen its form. So although there may be, and the evolutionary impulse of the universe may be at work in you, which wants something else to arise, there may be the ego trying, not wanting it to arise.

And so you get scared of stillness, of inner peace. Can't sit still. You don't want to stop thinking because you think I'm going to disappear if I stop thinking.

And you want to continue to have opinions about who you are, the old opinions about who you are. And there have been spiritual teachers and spiritual masters and mystics throughout the ages have realized form identity, essence identity. And there is a whole stream of spirituality that is based on de-emphasizing your form identity.

And of course, St. Francis is part of that stream of de-emphasizing form identity. Not saying, look at me, I'm so good at this or that. But it says, basically, I'm nobody.

I'm nobody in particular. That can go too far where it becomes another form. So you have to be very careful when that happens because when you say I'm the most miserable sinner, then you've, that's not quite it.

That's because that's a big, another form identity that can be even stronger than to say, I'm the most saintly person there's ever been. I'm the most miserable sinner, so dreadful. But to de-emphasize form identity can be a wonderful thing.

Once it requires enough presence so that you already can sense that which is beyond. And it starts with a little thing like in a discussion, you're able to drop your particular viewpoint because it makes no difference whether you are right or wrong anymore. And you just let it go and feel quite liberated.

It makes no difference whether who is right, he or the other person or you, who cares? That's, and suddenly you feel there's a peace that comes there when we don't need to be right anymore. That's because to be right is one way in which people will emphasize the me, the me make the other person wrong.

So that's one way. Another, it can be very beneficial for some people who have been afflicted with some kind of suffering or disability, which may be physical disability or whatever it is that makes it difficult for them to develop a, well, to have a well-developed form identity. Let's say somebody who is physically disabled and so they can either seek refuge in some other area and become very focused on identifying with their mind or whatever.

It can also happen that if there's one major thing that seems to interrupt the full development of your form identity, it can more quickly lead you to the realization of your essence identity. That is, there have been philosophers in the past or spiritual teachers who had disabilities and it's because of their physical disabilities, they were able to let go of identification with their unsatisfying form. So if the form of you is unsatisfying, strongly unsatisfying, it can be an opening, an early opening into essence identity.

The same thing happens when somebody loses all the things that they had identified with in their lives through some disaster that suddenly happens in you. Things are removed that you had considered to be an essential part of who you are and life takes them away and suddenly you're faced with that nothingness or emptiness. You don't know who you are anymore because life has taken away all those things that you identified with and then it can happen if you don't go into a contraction and quickly form another victim identity that it opens up into the formless, the essence.

That is the peace that passes all understanding as it's called in the New Testament because how can a person who has lost everything suddenly feel so peaceful? It can happen, it doesn't happen always, perhaps only in a small percentage of cases where people lose everything. Potential, the potential is there whenever there's great loss in your life, the potential is there for the arising of the essence identity and that is grace.

You can call that grace, the grace that is hiding on the other side of every disaster, it's hiding there, you just need to recognize it. But there is no need to wait for disaster to happen to you but, and this is why we are here now, we don't want to wait for disaster because that might be too late, it might not happen for a while. It will happen eventually, disaster will come to all of you because, well, yes, oh, that's because you're going to die.

The body is going to die, old age will come and then that'll be it. As well, as somebody said, each one of us has already been diagnosed with a fatal illness leading to death, it's called life on the surface level, of course it's. So therefore, the ancient dictum of spirituality is find death before death finds you.

Because death is going to find you, it's just a question of time. Now, what does it mean, find death before death finds you? It means find that in you which is beyond death.

So the death that you find refers to the death of the ego, the egoic identity in you, which when you discover the essence identity, then the ego identity begins to die. And that's a wonderful thing, but not to the ego. It doesn't mean that the forms disappear, but identification with the forms is no longer there.

So you still have the same things as before, but the identification doesn't happen anymore. Traditionally, this is a very painful process, finding death before death finds you without a strong spiritual energy that you come into contact with in one way or another, it's painful. The only way you can find death before death finds you is for life to knock you so hard that the ego gets knocked out of you.

Hi everybody, welcome. Welcome to this special Eckhart Tolle Foundation online event. I'm so glad that you're here with us.

Thank you. My name's Tammy Simon. I'm the founder of Sounds True, and I have had the great joy and honor of working with Eckhart Tolle since 2001.

And I'm also on the board of the Eckhart Tolle Foundation and have been on the board since its inception. And it's a great joy to be your host for this special online event. During this event, you'll be hearing more about the Eckhart Tolle Foundation.

Perhaps for some of you, this is the first time you'll be learning more about the foundation's history and its activities. And we're also going to introduce you to a New Earth Youth Initiative, which is a new program that the Eckhart Tolle Foundation is sponsoring. And it brings Eckhart's teachings and the experience of presence to young people who very well would otherwise not have access to these teachings and the experience of presence in Eckhart and Kim's presence.

And you're going to be learning more about that. Also as part of this online special event, we have two surprise videos. Not going to say much more about it, except that these videos are from some celebrated visionary humans who are expressing their support of bringing Eckhart's teachings to young people.

Most of all, I want to thank each and every one of you for being with us. There's a kind of ripple effect that comes from us connecting together in this way with a shared intent to bring presence to more and more people without financial barriers to access. So it is so wonderful to be with you and to have this experience together.

Oh, and of course, as part of our time together, you're going to hear from Kim and Eckhart. Did I forget to say that? Yes, indeed.

That's going to happen too. And now I'd love to introduce you to someone who is the president of Eckhart teachings and the co-founder and board chair of the Eckhart Tolle Foundation. This is someone who's very special to me personally.

I've known this person for more than two decades now and watched her grow into her role with such beauty and dignity and the power of a generous heart, Erin Jacobson. Erin.

[Speaker 6] (5:39:51 - 5:46:19)
Thank you, Tammy. And thank you all for joining us tonight. I just wanted to spend a few moments and tell you a little bit about how we started and some of the inspiration for the foundation.

I've been working for Eckhart teachings since it began in 1999. And our mission has always been the same and that's to share Eckhart's teachings with as many people as possible. Of course, back in the early days, we did not have a big team.

We basically did everything by hand. You know, there's almost, it was the early days of the internet. And I can still remember like it was yesterday folding paper flyers in the living room and packaging audio and video cassette tapes, being in charge of duplicating the audio and video cassette tapes.

I was the one taking all of the phone fax and snail mail orders, packaging them up and walking several blocks to the post office every day. In fact, our very first covers were actually black and white photocopies that we made at Kinko's. As you can imagine over the years, we have received a lot of feedback from people who have been impacted by the power of now and a new earth.

And some of the most impactful feedback that we've received have been letters from people in prison, writing to Eckhart and expressing their gratitude as well as telling their stories. And we have been so impacted by these letters and Eckhart keeps every single one. And even though we were impacted, it still made us think about all the communities with very little access that, and we were wondering like, how can we help them?

And giving back has always been a part of Eckhart teachings. And we've been doing so by giving those that can't afford to pay event scholarships, access to online courses. We have a lot of teachings available for free on YouTube and other streaming platforms.

And even though that we've been giving individuals help, we still wanted a way to be able to focus and give back to underserved communities. So in 2016, we launched the Eckhart Tolle Foundation and we chose to support incarcerated people, hospice patients and the underserved youth. We've had a couple of large conferences where all the proceeds went to fund the foundation.

We've been giving tens of thousands of books away to prisons, hospices and the underserved youth. We've brought the youth to learn directly from Eckhart and Kim in person. And we've been donating, we've given grants to these communities.

And we also recently partnered with Adovo and they are providing tablets and access to Eckhart and Kim's teachings to over 250,000 people. And we're also planning for Eckhart to speak in a couple prisons soon in person. And tonight we're highlighting the underserved youth because they need mental, emotional and spiritual support and not only for their own personal wellbeing, but because they represent humanity's future and this world needs more conscious and aware people.

We are committed to helping these communities and help them relieve the suffering caused by the dysfunctional egoic mind so that more people can show up in their lives present and aware and in touch with their essential nature. If you're inclined to be a part of this impact, we have three ways that you can help. Number one, by sharing our social media posts about our book donation programs and our grant programs with your networks.

Number two, we of course graciously welcome any donations. And number three, and it truly is the most important. My personal favorite quote of Eckhart's has always been, the world can only change from within.

And that does mean that you being here, connecting to presence and continuing to practice living your life from presence is the most essential. I'd also like to thank all of you, our incredibly generous donors and our dedicated board of directors for their service, our staff and our volunteers, and of course our executive director, Ali Weibel. All of you are making this work possible.

Now it's time for our first surprise video, expressing their support for the work that we've been doing by bringing Eckhart's teachings to young people. This person's team reached out to me several years ago in hopes of connecting with Eckhart. And little did I know at the time what their vision was and where this connection would go.

I'm amazed by this person's commitment to sharing Eckhart's teachings with his massive audience. I would say that he is making spiritual teachings cool in the eyes of young people. He's definitely opening a meaningful conversation and he's using his art and his platform to not only share his own learning and wisdom, but also Eckhart's teachings.

Eckhart was featured in his most recent album throughout his whole album, almost, Mr. Morali and the Big Steppers. He is a multi-platinum Grammy and Emmy award-winning artist. He was the first non-classical, non-jazz musician to win a Pulitzer Prize for his 2017 album, Damn.

Here he is. Mr. Kendrick Lamar.

I believe people can, they truly can use, well, not people, young people. Young people need to hear Eckhart's words the most because today we live in a society where it's so many things pushing and pulling, where there's a lifestyle, social media, friends, trends, so many things consume young people and their decision-making. And to truly crack that code and have that balance, everybody wants nice things, right?

But to have that balance is to also go within, as I said before. I wish I would have read these books when I was 16, when I was 13. I'd probably be far more advanced in my personal life and my daily, you know, interpersonal dynamics, not only with people, but with myself.

But I'm fortunate enough to come across it in my 30s, right? But for the kids that's out there listening, 12, 13, 14, 15 and up, I truly recommend that you get into it because it'll open your mind up further than you can even imagine, further than the things that you want, further than the things that you think that you need. You'll explore a whole new journey of self-worth, passion, purpose, creativity, and stillness within yourself.

It's worth it, a hundred percent. Not only on a professional level, because I know everyone has dreams and goals and aspirations, but on a personal level, it plays the same rules. And when you intertwine the words between the two, things are happening tempo for you.

[Speaker 3] (5:48:46 - 5:49:42)
Kendrick Lamar saying, young people need to hear Epgart's words the most. What a terrific surprise video. Let's learn more about the New Earth Youth Initiative.

And to share with us more about the details, we have a fellow board member of mine on the Epgart Tolle Foundation board. One of the best parts of participating on the board is the type of allyship and friendship and creative partnership that I can have with somebody like Elizabeth Lesser, co-founder of Omega Institute, author of several best-selling books, including Broken Open, How Difficult Times Can Help Us Grow, and Cassandra Speaks, When Women Are Storytellers, The Human Story Changes. Elizabeth, over to you.

Okay, thank you. Hey, everybody. What a pleasure to be with you.

It's a cold, chilly night here in New York, and I imagine you're all coming in from all over the world and the country. It's just great to feel everybody on the Zoom and YouTube and wherever you're joining us. So I'm here to introduce our next guest, but first I wanna tell you briefly about the foundation's youth initiative.

We're calling it the New Earth Youth Initiative, and it's really meaningful to me to be working on something about young people and kids because I've been in education my whole life. I started out as a kindergarten and elementary school teacher, and then I worked my way up to working with grownups in education when I co-founded Omega Institute 47 years ago. And it dawned on me as I worked with kids years ago that grownups also need to keep learning, that it's actually imperative for adults to learn how to grow and change and expand our consciousness as we age.

And not just getting facts, but the important things like how do I quiet my mind and open my heart and relate to the mysterious parts of myself, my soul, my consciousness. And throughout my 50 almost years at Omega, I've had the privilege of being in the presence of educators of the mind and the heart and the soul, people like Eckhart Tolle, although there's really no one like Eckhart Tolle. And I got to really experience him in his full Eckhart-ness back in 2008 when I helped Oprah produce a webinar focusing on A New Earth, the book, the 10 chapters.

I don't know, many of you may be tuned into that. Millions and millions of people around the world tuned into that webinar. I remember the first night we did it, it was one of the first things like it in the world.

And the entire Chicago internet went down because so many people were trying to get on. And I learned during that, that his work wasn't just for serious spiritual readers and seekers, that anyone trying to figure out this tricky thing called being human could access the depth and the scope and the magnificence of his work. And that made me think, well, then kids could also.

And young people don't just need to learn how to read and write and do math. They need education of their hearts and their minds and souls, the way Kendrick Lamar was saying, if only he had had that learning way back in his early teens, what a difference it would make. And that's why we're doing this.

That's why we are raising money and spending the money we raise to do things like bringing his books to schools and school libraries, creating programs specifically for young people like the lectures Eckhart did a few years ago with NYU students and offering grants to like-minded organizations working with youth. And I'd like to introduce you now to a leader from one of those organizations. And he happens to be a dear friend of mine.

He has taught at Omega Institute for many years and his work inspires all of us at Omega and here at the foundation greatly. His name is Andres Gonzalez, and he's one of the three co-founders of the Holistic Life Foundation and the co-author of Let Your Life Shine, which is a powerful book that documents the way yoga and meditation have transformed and empowered thousands of historically underserved kids in Baltimore. For 20 years, Andres has shared wellness, healing and present moment practices in public school systems and beyond, breathing life back into a community destroyed by drugs, poverty and systemic racism.

And what I love so much about Andres is how he personally walks his message in the world. He has this message that love can heal any heart including our own. And he is that kind of healer and welcome Andres.

[Speaker 5] (5:54:44 - 6:04:12)
Thank you so much, Elizabeth. It's so good to see you. It's been a while.

I hope you're staying warm where you're at because it's chilly here in Baltimore as well. So before I get to just a few of the topics that I wanted to address, I really just wanna give a quick shout out to the Eckert Tolle Foundation for all the amazing work they do. The Holistic Life Foundation has been going for 20 years and recently they've been supporting us not only financially in terms of giving us funds to help run our Holistic Roots Program, which is a mentoring program.

It's really helping these underserved kids in the city. But also they've donated books to us, countless amounts of books. I mean, books on top of books on top of books so we can give them to the youth, to the adults, the teenagers, to anyone that we run into in all of our programs.

They're accessible and they're there to spread his message and his truths. And it's just amazing what they're doing. And this new initiative as well is incredible and it's so needed.

And I've seen it through the work I've been doing for over 20 years now all across the nation and across the world. And I wanted to start by talking about a metaphor and how important this work is. Our teacher Uncle Will used to use this extended metaphor to describe how important breath work or meditation is for people in general, but I think in particular for our youth and the transformation that it can have on them when they start using these skills and techniques to learn how to self-regulate.

The way he would do it, he'd say, our body's like a boat and the world is the ocean. And more oftentimes than not, our waters are calm. We can set our sails and go whatever direction we wanna go.

But if you think about it sometimes, and actually now I think about it most of the time, our waters aren't calm. We're bombarded by external and internal stimuli. Externally, we have what's going on in the world.

You have your family, you have your friends, your parents, your loved ones. So again, now there's coworkers, bosses, you have society, social media, politics, right? We're so that's smacking us around externally.

That's moving our boat around. We're trying to set our sails, it's getting tougher. And then internally, the bombardment we have, our fears, our doubt, stress, worry, anxiety, trauma that we faced, whether it's our personal trauma, secondary trauma, intergenerational trauma.

So really those waters, this world is chaotic. And we're bombarded by this all the time. And it's pushing us around all over the place.

So it's hard for us to set our sails. And our teacher used to remind us how the breath or meditation, that is our anchor. That allows us to still ourselves, which in turn will still our waters, which will allow us to set our sails and go in whatever direction we wanna go and achieve whatever it is that we wanna achieve.

And I've seen firsthand the amazing transformation this has with kids. So we were based out of Baltimore and we're in Northwest Baltimore. So like where the wire came out, like the hood of all hoods, right?

And there's a young lady in elementary school, we got with her. She was from the same projects that Freddie Gray was from. And for some reason, people would bully this girl, right?

She didn't have the cool clothes or the backpack. She was kind of, had a little less material wise than anyone else did. So they picked on her.

They made fun of her. They said stuff to her. And we're always confused why they chose her because her brother had showed her how to throw her hands a little, right?

So he had a box and he showed her. So I was always confused, like why do you keep picking on this girl? She's gonna beat you up.

She's stronger than you. She knows what to do with her hands, right? So we teach her some of these techniques, some of these practices of breath work and meditation.

And this is early on in us providing these techniques and practices to youth. And so myself and the other two co-founders, Ali and Atma, we're at this school and with the principal and we go and we're walking the halls and we turn the corner. And when we turn the corner, this young lady has this other lady, she's grabbed her by the shirt and she had her thrown up against the lockers.

And she's looking at her and you can tell she is about to cop back and hit this little girl. And she looks at us and she sees us walking down the halls and she looks at the girl and she looks at the guests again and she goes, looks at the girl and goes, you're lucky I meditate. And she lets go of the young lady, sits down and starts breathing.

And it was one of the most powerful things. The principal was looking at me like, what did I just see, right? And we were like, oh my God, what did we just see?

Cause we seen how she was with the other kids too. So it's just so powerful and amazing to see the impact that it can have on these youth. And not only is it helping with dealing with their stress, dealing with their anxiety, dealing with that bombardment I was talking to y'all about, but honestly, some of these kids in these neighborhoods, these techniques and practices that we're talking about that this new Earth Youth Initiative is focusing on will help these kids so much that in some cases, it may end up saving their lives.

Cause now they're no longer reacting to what the world is throwing at them, but they're learning to instill themselves and they're able to respond. You know, and Elizabeth mentioned I'm a big love guy, which I am, as you can see by the clothes. And I just think love is the most powerful force in the universe.

And I think that these techniques in particular, one of the things I think when youth learn to go inward, like Kendrick was talking about 13, 16, to learn how to instill those waters, learn how to be able to go inside and just be, remember we're human beings. When they learn that, they gain the sense of love, self-love, they learn to love themselves. And then now when they're looking out at others, they're more empathetic, they're more compassionate.

They start seeing themselves in everyone and everything. Now they're not alone. Now they're not so disconnected to anything.

Now they see the interconnection between themselves and everyone. They're not just their corner anymore. They're not just their block.

They're not just the East side or West side of Baltimore. They're not just Baltimore or Maryland or the United States. They're not just this country, this continent.

They start seeing that universal self, that omniscient, omnipotent, omnipresent self that they truly are. And that's when you see that transformation occur. And it's so beautiful and it's so powerful and it's so needed in the world that we're in right now.

And it's just, it's amazing. And so kudos to this foundation and the initiative they're making. I have two other things, I have these two quotes that Eckhart has in his books that I just wanted to talk about because they really ring true to some of the stuff and the synchronicities and the synergies that we're doing with the Holistic Life Foundation that are with his work.

So one of them is from The Power of Now. And our teacher used to always talk about how the only time that exists is right now, right? And Eckhart says, as soon as you enter the present moment, all unhappiness and struggle dissolve.

And life begins to flow with joy and ease. When you act out of the present moment awareness, whatever you do becomes imbued with a sense of quality, care, and love. And our teacher used to always say, the past causes anger.

Someone said something to you, they did something to you, you might regret something you did. The future causes anxiety. What's gonna happen?

What am I gonna do with myself? What's going on? When we teach these youth to be in the now, which is the only time that exists, right?

The past is gone. The future is never getting here. But when they learn to live in this now moment, this present moment, this present, it's a gift.

That's the reason it's called the present. It's so powerful. And what we're doing is we're allowing these kids to remember that they can access that whenever they want to.

And that reminder is something my teacher used to always say. He said, he says, I'm not a teacher. I'm not a teacher.

I'm a reminder, I'm a calm, do it. And Eckhart talks about that too. And stillness speaks.

A true spiritual teacher, he says, does not have anything to teach in the conventional sense of the word. Does not have anything to give or add to you. We have it all already, right?

Such as new information, beliefs or rules or conduct. The only function of such a teacher is to help you remove that which separates you from the truth of who you already are and what you already know in the depth of your being. And that's what this initiative is gonna be able to do y'all.

So really, we need your support. We need you to tell your friends to tell a friend. We need y'all to really understand the impact that this can have.

If we can take kids from inner cities, underserved communities, who have never had a retreat experience, never even left their city, they get to go hang out with Eckhart? Like, I wanna go to the retreat. You know what I mean?

So for real, special shout out to the Eckhart Tolle Foundation, all the amazing work that they're doing. Thank you for continuing to support the Holistic Light Foundation. And please, all y'all, please do the same.

Support as much as you can. This New Earth Youth Initiative is so powerful. It's so incredible.

We're honored to be a part of it here at the Holistic Light Foundation. I'm honored to be here. And I really just love to all of y'all.

And don't forget that love is the most powerful force in the universe.

[Speaker 3] (6:04:15 - 6:07:31)
Thank you, Andres. Bring in the heart. And it's time for our next surprise video.

I notice when I say that, I imagine like there should be confetti and music and sounds that go like rocket ship. Okay, okay, in a moment. And this next surprise video is from a quintessential multi-hyphenated artist, a Grammy-nominated singer-songwriter, actress, New York Times bestselling author, Jewel.

Jewel is also the founder of the Jewel Never Broken Foundation, which works with children and at-risk youth to give them the tools that they need to develop and grow into whole human beings. And I wanna connect a few dots for you here before we hear the surprise video from Jewel. Andres mentioned that the Holistic Life Foundation is part of the support partnering with the Eckhart Tolle Foundation in an upcoming retreat for young people to come be present with Eckhart and Kim in a retreat and environment.

The Jewel Never Broken Foundation is also partnering with us as is Echoes of Hope, a shout out to Echoes of Hope and other nonprofits who work with youth. And we're identifying 100 young people who can travel to Southern California and attend this three-day retreat with Eckhart and Kim at the end of May. And we're specifically raising funds.

This is the current focus of our New Earth Youth Initiative coming up in 2024. One aspect of it is to raise funds for the travel and the food and the lodging for these 100 young people to be part of this retreat experience. Eckhart Teachings is donating, gifting the tuition for the retreat, but you can imagine there are costs involved in bringing these 100 young people to the event and providing them with the travel food and lodging they need to attend.

And that's our goal here in this fundraiser is to raise funds specifically for these 100 young people to be at the retreat. We have a matching grant right now that's in effect. So when you donate and I'd like to invite you if you feel inspired to donate, there's a donate button below the player page to do so and your funds will be matched.

And this is our chance if this matches your inspiration. And with that, now let's have our surprise video with Jewel from the Jewel Never Broken Foundation.

Hey, everybody, it's Jewel. And it is an honor to be here with you all today and support Eckhart. I know we are all here because we love him and his teachings.

And I love what the foundation is doing to make sure that these types of teachings can get into the hands of so many people through the foundation, through the book programs, making sure it gets into the hands of youth. In prison systems, this is such important work. I really hope that you will donate and make more of these types of things possible.

His teachings have helped not only me, but my youth in our foundation. We are a foundation that's been working in mental health with youth for 22 years. And I cannot tell you how many times our kids have come up to us saying how his books have impacted them and their life.

I know this is not news to you. I know you're here because you know this and we all agree. Eckhart has done incredible things donating books to our foundation.

And it is just a privilege to show up here today because through his foundation, I know we can do such incredible work.

[Speaker 3] (6:08:39 - 6:09:04)
Thank you, Jewel. And now we have the chance to hear from Kim and Eckhart directly. We'll start by hearing from Kim Ang, Eckhart's teaching partner, the founder of Presence Through Movement.

Kim, here we go. Thank you, Tammy. Hello, everybody.

Hello, friends.

[Speaker 4] (6:09:07 - 6:20:26)
So what I'd like to do is for you to sit kind of like in a meditative state, but we're not going to really do a formal meditation. This is something that you can do for yourself like, you know, five, 10, three times, 20 times a day. And that is to be able to just sit in presence.

And even though things are happening around us, there may be voices, there may be things that you see in the background, but we're just going to kind of allow that to kind of go in the periphery and hold our hands like with our palms up, maybe just on your lap, but the palms up in a receiving. So we're receiving that spirit within, receiving that consciousness that is within you. So not only that you are receiving it, so you are that hole in the flute in which a life then can breathe through you, create through you.

So as we sit here with our palms up, we're in that receptive, receiving, and also emanating that light of consciousness. So our purpose in life is unfolding of that spirit within, or as Jesus said, seek the kingdom of God within. Or Buddha, he didn't say it in those words of kingdom or God, but he said the end of suffering.

And right now we are in these times, it's a challenging time. There's a lot happening in the world and these youths is the next generation to create a new earth, to create a better world than what we have created. I mean, it's all been a process, you know, and it's not always uphill, but it comes around, but they are our next generation and we are, as what Eckhart calls, we are the frequency holder for this next generation.

And these youths, I mean, as all of us have been challenged, not only by external, but by the internal, the ego, the mind, and these youths will probably also have to go through that. But if we hold that frequency of consciousness for these youths to be able to live in this world and create something that will be harmonious, peaceful, holy, and this is what we are moving towards. We're allowing that consciousness to come through our very, the essence of who we are, come through our being.

And we are that vehicle, just as those youths are the vehicle for the light of consciousness to shine through, for a new world to be able to be here, that we will end suffering, that we'll have the kingdom of God shine through us. So we are here to share this together for it's one consciousness, one life, that manifests through all these various forms. So we have our part, we each have our part.

And maybe our part is just being a frequency holder. Maybe our part is working with the youths. So it doesn't matter what is happening in the family life of the youths.

I mean, ideally, it'd be nice to be able to have conscious parenting that's happening in their family life. But just as we, each one of us, just as a school teacher, even, they may have that student one hour, three hours, five hours, whatever, how many hours in a day, it doesn't take all day to be with a student. It just takes a moment of pure consciousness to be that light, where that student can then just basically transform.

They will remember that time. We all can go back probably in our memories and think of somebody who has been there for us, no matter how small, in a way, short of time that it's been. But we, the older generation, the middle generation, and the younger generation, we're here to awaken, to unfold, to manifest a new earth, to be present, to let go of that egoic form and that identification with form so that we can live and breathe, be conscious.

So these youths may be the next leaders of our country, of the various countries that are around, and so shall it be. But will they live and be a leader, be the vessel in which consciousness can use their speech, use their mind, use their bodies in the sense of creating and living, bringing together a global peace? Now, we don't know what that requires, whether that means we go deeper into, as a collective world, deeper into, well, deeper into suffering, deeper into the fall of or the end of, maybe, of a civilization.

We don't know that. We don't know what's going to happen, but we do know, and I know that life comes around. So it may be take five, 10 steps back, but it'll come back around, and we are, that's the evolution of human consciousness, is that we are evolving.

And what we do, what can we do, but be present, accepting what is in this moment, and maybe there's a lot, and there's a lot of challenges that is happening in this world at this moment, but we can go deeper into that space consciousness so we can be that frequency holder. And from that space of being that frequency holder, we begin to learn and accept the spiritual laws of just accepting, allowing this moment to be as it is. Even though that there may be some challenging times, and there will be challenging times for youths.

I think anybody who is going to be, go into a leadership role is challenged, and they will be challenged, but we keep coming back to being present, to connect with that consciousness. And since that consciousness is the one consciousness, we as the individual human beings are holding that frequency. So it's all just one, one consciousness, manifesting in all these various forms, whether it's good, bad, for in the world of form, there are opposites, so there's gonna be good, there's gonna be bad, there's gonna be happy, there's gonna be sad, there's gonna be good times and bad times, but within those times can then consciousness come through and a shift begins to happen, something will happen. And we know if you go within, you know that the shift that is happening is happening in, if we can say the world of form, that it is transforming this world as we know it.

And this is what is needed, is just for all of us together to be that frequency holder. So, speaking of the world, I forgot to check my time to see when I started, so I don't know whether I've gone over, I'm under, but it feels complete if we could just sit in again, silence, and just allow consciousness to feel that consciousness within you, with your palms facing up.

[Speaker 12] (6:21:31 - 6:21:40)
We are one and connected and holding that space for the next generation, thank you.

[Speaker 3] (6:21:44 - 6:21:50)
Thank you, Kim. And now, over to Eckhart.

[Speaker 2] (6:22:04 - 6:22:10)
Hello, everybody, good to be with you.

[Speaker 1] (6:22:14 - 6:22:28)
It's, as the Buddhists would say, an auspicious evening. The full moon has just risen above the treetops here.

[Speaker 2] (6:22:29 - 6:24:48)
I've been watching it, and traditionally, those are very powerful moments in time for meditation and going within. So it just happens that this session here coincides with the full moon. We haven't been planning it, and the moon is incredibly still.

It rises, it looks enormously big when it first rises, then it seems to get a little smaller, but there's such stillness around it. It's challenging being a human being. It's also an incredible opportunity for the arising of consciousness, but it is undoubtedly not easy.

Humans are facing a seemingly endless succession of challenges, and challenges is already a positive term. Some people would call it bad things happening. When you become a little bit more conscious,

[Speaker 1] (6:24:48 - 6:25:04)
you recognize that seemingly negative things that are happening, limitations arising in your life, obstacles arising, difficult situations, circumstances, people, and then at some point you realize that those difficult situations, in whatever form they manifest, are actually an essential part of being human, and an essential part, as far as the flowering of consciousness is concerned, the next shift in consciousness that we're moving into.

[Speaker 2] (6:25:04 - 6:25:55)

So for young people, life is particularly challenging. The most difficult time in my life was childhood and adolescence, and many other people find that also.

[Speaker 1] (6:25:56 - 6:26:42)
When you're a child, you're born into a particular set of circumstances over which you have no control. You're completely at the mercy of whatever circumstances you're born into. Your parents, your environment, family background, the culture you're born into, the environment, the country, all this, and there's nothing you can do about it when you're a child.

But you are seemingly the passive recipient of whatever life is throwing at you. And some humans are born into extraordinarily difficult circumstances, even as young children.

[Speaker 2] (6:26:47 - 6:27:23)
And then you reach adolescence, and then often it gets even more difficult, because adolescence, for many people, is a very disconcerting time when you're halfway between childhood and adulthood, the time of transition. For many adolescents, it's a time of great upheavals and unhappiness, even when the external circumstances are relatively okay.

[Speaker 1] (6:27:24 - 6:27:35)
They're being challenged by an inner turmoil in many cases, and they're completely unprepared for that, because nobody at school has prepared them for it.

[Speaker 2] (6:27:36 - 6:27:44)
As they enter adolescence, they're going to enter, probably, a time of inner turmoil, no matter what their outer circumstances are.

[Speaker 1] (6:27:49 - 6:28:07)
And sometimes, if the outer circumstances are relatively okay, the turmoil, the inner turmoil, can be even greater than if the adolescents were born into poverty or to fight for survival every day.

[Speaker 2] (6:28:10 - 6:28:30)
So whatever it is, it's not easy, and it's essential for youngsters to be prepared for not just for adolescents, children to be prepared for what's coming, and then adolescents to be prepared for what's coming when they grow into adults.

[Speaker 1] (6:28:34 - 6:29:03)
And what we are attempting to help with in reaching as many youngsters as possible is teaching the basics of awareness, which is the key to transcending the suffering that otherwise arises in the human mind that is inherited from generation to generation.

[Speaker 2] (6:29:06 - 6:29:20)

So the most basic teachings for a young person, and it should start in childhood, is to be aware of their inner states rather than being at the mercy of their inner states.

[Speaker 1] (6:29:21 - 6:32:24)
They may be at the mercy of, until they become a little older, of their outer circumstances, but they don't need to be at the mercy of their inner states, which means emotions and thoughts. If they could become aware, if it could be shown to a child, it's not complicated, that emotions arise and that it is possible to be aware of these emotions instead of being totally absorbed in them, being totally taken over by them, that it is possible to stand back, so to speak, and witness the emotions. There it is.

That's extremely important in adolescence when sometimes very negative and violent emotions arise. Is the emotion taking you over completely or are you able to allow the emotion to be there but not being totally absorbed in it, not being totally identified in it so that it doesn't make you do sometimes things that are irreversible in many cases? So basic teaching is awareness of inner states that could start at the age of six and a few, some individual teachers are kind of introducing that, making that part of the teaching.

It has not yet entered the curriculum of many schools, maybe a few alternative schools, but the most important curriculum at school should not be any subject, whatever it may be, mathematics, English or whatever language, geography, whatever. It's all secondary relative to what is primary and that is to be aware. That should be the main subject in a more enlightened subject.

We are going in that direction. So it's awareness of emotions, which could be shown by role playing, by telling stories, all kinds of possibilities can help children to develop the ability to be aware. And the arising of awareness is the essence of spirituality.

Another word for awareness is presence. The arising of presence is the essence of all spirituality. So that, if we can make that the main teaching, everything else would then fall into place.

So it would start in childhood and then it becomes very important in adolescence when emotions do tend to arise, powerful emotions.

[Speaker 2] (6:32:27 - 6:32:39)
Also, not just awareness of emotions, but also to be aware of thoughts that arise. What are you telling yourself?

[Speaker 1] (6:32:40 - 6:36:10)
These are simple things that can be taught even to a child. It's not complicated. By telling stories, as I said, by telling stories, by acting it out, role playing, a child can learn to become aware also of how they speak to themselves in their mind, the inner voice.

What is the voice saying? So that they don't become the voice, because if you are the voice that you've been taken over by the conditioned mind, the mind which is conditioned by your environment, by whatever circumstances you were born into, whatever your parents have done, what people have done to you, et cetera, the conditioned mind, yes, it's there. You can't get rid of it easily, but you don't need to be totally absorbed by it, not totally identified with it.

So how do you, what is your mind saying? What is it doing? Simple things could be taught to children, and then gradually that ability grows, the ability to stay aware when difficult things happen, as they will in every person's life.

Every person is not only facing external difficulties, but also problems arising from the workings of the human mind. And the human mind also has incredible possibilities for manifesting and creating, but there's also built into the human mind a deep-seated dysfunction that everybody inherits. In some humans, it is present in a more acute form than in others, but in every human, this deep-seated dysfunction, which we could call the ego, the egoic mind, operates in one way or another in every person's life.

So we have that, it's been recognized in all spiritual traditions that, yes, humans are wonderful beings, they're wonderful possibilities. They also have created amazing things, but also there is a huge downside to being human, and that is the inherited, let's call it by a more direct term, the inherited craziness of the human condition, of the human mind. So we all inherit a little bit of insanity and sometimes a lot.

If that were not the case, the world would not be the way it is now when you see the enormous amount of suffering, most of it created by humans. Some suffering created by natural disaster, yes, but more suffering created by humans. But what does that mean?

It's created by the consciousness, the collective consciousness in humans that creates this world. And that's what you hear about when you listen or watch the news tonight.

[Speaker 2] (6:36:11 - 6:36:21)
What you're going to hear is manifestations of the collective consciousness of the human mind, and it's not pleasant.

And so this needs to be shown to young people so that you would have a wonderful start. You'd have already the power given to you of how to face the difficult life circumstances that are going to come sooner or later, sooner probably. So give children, give youngsters this gift of showing them the possibility of being aware, of being present, instead of losing themselves in their emotions and in their thoughts completely.

So that's really the essence what we need to teach young people. Traditionally, the knowledge of this always come in much later in life when people beginning to suffer more and more and more and then they just can't stand it anymore. And at some point, there's some awakening.

It's not guaranteed, but at some point when humans suffer, they awaken. And for quite a while, people coming to talks and retreats have seen some percentage of young people, but the potential of young people seems to be growing now slowly. Traditionally, it's been people in the second half of life who've come because they've suffered enough so that they finally begin to awaken.

Seems that humans need to suffer until there is the beginning of an awakening, but it doesn't have to be like that. Humanity has already suffered a lot. And I have observed two things in young people these days.

Seemingly contradictory, one is a high degree of disorientation and of aimlessness and of sometimes nihilism, nothing is worth doing. Sometimes a high degree of suddenly being possessed by some ideology that you subscribe to that reduces the complexity of life to one or see single things as the, yeah, this is the answer. I have the answer for everything.

So you become possessed by an ideology and then you act it out violently sometimes.

And others, completely aimless or they can't stand a seemingly empty life. So they're looking, they're going, they take drugs and so on.

So there's a very negative development on the one hand, but I've also observed, and it seems almost contradictory into something, is an increasing readiness in youngsters to awaken. They just need to hear the message, but nobody has told them. They just need to hear the message and then the shift can happen even at an early age.

But the strange thing is this, the message most youngsters have not yet been reached by this message. So there is, on the negative side, being young these days is very difficult. I don't want to go into it too deeply.

A huge challenge is that the technology that being absorbed in the virtual dimension, the virtual world of the screens that youngsters interact with, being told this is a huge challenge for youngsters and a huge challenge for human consciousness. So one would need to address that specifically. That's one of the major, if not the major challenge for young person now is how to live with this new technology, not lose yourself in the new technology.

And this technology is really an externalization of the human mind. So the human mind has always been a problem losing yourself in your mind, which is the egoic state of consciousness and having no awareness at all, being taken over by one thought after another, one thought after another. That's always been a problem already for hundreds and thousands of years.

But now you have the additional problem, this incessantly talking, active human minds that comes up, it never stops. One damn thing after another arises. It's become now externalized to the technology.

It comes at you, you interact with these screens and it never stops as a continuous input of stuff. You're bombarded by stuff. And youngsters, many youngsters these days, the major part of their reality is not this life here, the actual life that surrounds them.

The major part of their reality is a virtual world. The virtual world has become more real to them than the real world. Humanity has never faced a challenge of that kind.

It's for the first time, and it is an enormous challenge, enormous. This is why it's so important. So it's always been important to live consciously, but now we have no choice.

If we do not bring awareness in, we are going to lose ourselves completely in that the externalized mind, which is a virtual world, the virtual world can also be helpful. We're using technology here to reach people. It can be helpful, but it needs to be used with awareness.

Without awareness, without presence, it will consume you. So it's now an absolute necessity for humans to become aware, otherwise they will be consumed, not just by their mind, they will be consumed by what they have created, the externalized mind, the virtual mind, they will be consumed by it. So it's a, and this is a greater, this is the greatest danger for human consciousness, the greatest challenge, greater than any other challenge in the external world.

So it's so important now, only awareness can liberate us from all that. So the teaching, the main teaching, it's otherwise, we are actually confronted with a life-threatening situation in technology. So it's not just, it's always been a, traditionally, the awakening of consciousness is only, it's always been there for already for thousands of years.

There've always been humans who have awakened, yeah, have been able to transcend the egoic mind and become aware, but up until recently, it's been a kind of luxury almost. It was great. Some humans were able to realize it, many through the existing religious teachings, although religious teachings to a large extent have also become corrupted and misused by the human ego to a large extent, but there've always been some who were able to awaken through that, but now that's not enough anymore.

What we now need is an awakening on a much larger scale, and the possibility is there. When I talk to youngsters, and I want to do it much more, okay, I've given talks at some universities, I've talked, spoken at Stanford and New York University, and at first, I wasn't sure, but first, I wonder what they're going to make of it, and I was amazed how open they were to the teaching, and some said, wow, I've never heard that before. So the openness is there, and we just need to create channels so that they can be reached with this message.

And the message, basically, if I had to express it and define it in one single sentence, the message is that there's more to you than meets the eye. There is a possibility of accessing a deeper or higher state of consciousness. There is a dimension of consciousness in you just waiting to be discovered.

You don't have to achieve it, because that means you need a lot of time to get there. It's not something, the awakening is not something you need to achieve. It's something you discover.

To show that to youngsters, and not just conceptually, but experientially, to show them the possibility, for example, of being aware of the way in which they talk to themselves in their head. Just what are you saying to yourself? There's already an awareness, or the possibility of discovery between two thoughts.

[Speaker 2] (6:47:20 - 6:47:35)
There's a space. We call it stillness. And again, everything in this world goes against that.

[Speaker 1] (6:47:36 - 6:48:06)
Every device that you have with a screen on it is trying to obscure, to prevent you from accessing the dimension of stillness, because it's the opposite of stillness. It's stuff getting at you, content, stuff. Another text message, another Facebook post, another this, another this coming up, interacting.

[Speaker 2] (6:48:06 - 6:48:17)
Never a moment of, ah, and so the possibility to discover still.

[Speaker 1] (6:48:17 - 6:49:14)
I mean, there are a few apps, or there are quite a few apps that you can get that teach you meditation, and that's good. So it can be used for a helpful purpose. It can be, most of it is in the service of unconsciousness, this technology, but it can, but a small percentage of it is actually helpful.

There are some apps that teach you how to breathe consciously, how to be aware of your breath. One of the simplest, most fundamental ways of accessing this inner dimension of stillness that transcends thought, be aware of your breathing. So you have this little app.

I tried a few on my iPhones, and oh, that's quite good. So it goes, you can choose the duration. It says, breathe in, inhale, and it goes tick, tick, tick.

[Speaker 2] (6:49:18 - 6:50:00)
Hold, exhale, tick, tick, tick, tick, tick. Oh, inhale, hold, exhale, hold. Well, and what happens when you follow that?

The mind becomes still. So it can be used in a constructive and helpful way. It can be.

90% of it isn't yet, but, so we need to be, to use it skillfully with awareness.

[Speaker 1] (6:50:00 - 6:50:34)
Without awareness, it will destroy you. With awareness, it can be a wonderful thing, this technology, and then you may have heard about the latest developments of AI, artificial intelligence. It does the most amazing things.

You can ask it to write an essay on some subject, and it'll write it within five seconds. It would take you five hours to write that. It might not be as good.

It can do amazing things.

[Speaker 2] (6:50:35 - 6:50:44)
And so, quite soon, perhaps, the AI will be better at thinking than the human mind.

[Speaker 1] (6:50:48 - 6:51:50)
So that's another reason for going beyond thinking, so that, to discover a dimension in you that is actually higher and more powerful than the thought, the dimension of thinking. It's time now, because otherwise it'll defeat you, and it becomes better at thinking than you are. So you have to rise above thinking, the way we are able to use the mind and use the technology, but are not consumed by it.

You are above it, and that is presence, that is awareness. So this is a wonderful thing, but this is an incredible time we live in, when things are extremely challenging. One could say, who knows where it's going?

It could go very, very wrong.

[Speaker 2] (6:51:51 - 6:52:15)
It could, or it could be the very seemingly negative thing that we have created can be the opening into that higher dimension of consciousness that is waiting to be discovered in every human.

[Speaker 1] (6:52:16 - 6:52:19)
And that's vital. It's waiting to be discovered.

[Speaker 2] (6:52:19 - 6:52:32)
It's dormant in you. And so that's, children need to grow up with that, give a child this gift.

[Speaker 1] (6:52:35 - 6:52:47)
And then the child will grow into an adult and will be able to use that, and then it will become, it will grow, it will become more powerful.

[Speaker 2] (6:52:48 - 6:53:18)
Every challenge that then this human faces will make that human more conscious instead of drawing them back into unconsciousness. But of course, always, no matter in what way you become engaged in this, it always comes back to, you have to live it.

[Speaker 1] (6:53:19 - 6:53:35)
You have to live it every moment, and every moment is always this moment. In a way, one could say there is no every moment, there's only this moment. It just looks like lots of moments, but it's only ever this moment.

[Speaker 2] (6:53:35 - 6:55:36)
And this is the only moment where you can live state of the state of presence. And you can sense the power of presence within you, beyond the thinking mind, beyond emotional fluctuations. There's a, we can call it stillness, but it's much more than stillness, it's just a word, but let's call it stillness.

Discover the stillness that is always waiting. It just was obscured. So that is the most vital message for humanity.

I want to thank all of you for participating in this, realizing its importance, and every one of you can contribute in some way. And perhaps the most important contribution, I think Aaron already pointed it out earlier, the most important contribution, of course, is your state of consciousness. The world can only change from within.

[Speaker 1] (6:55:38 - 6:55:45)
What the world humans create is a manifestation or an externalization of the collective consciousness.

[Speaker 2] (6:55:46 - 6:57:13)
If the collective consciousness is dysfunctional, the outer world will reflect it. So thank you for being part of this. It's, nothing could be more important.

This is the purpose of your life, is to participate and embody the arising of what we could call the transcendent consciousness, the spiritual dimension, the shift. And then what arises as the book that I wrote, I guess it was written through me, a new earth then arises naturally as a reflection of the collective consciousness. Thank you.

Tammy, back to you.

[Speaker 3] (6:57:14 - 7:01:06)
Thank you, Eckhart. Here, as we come to a close, I just wanna underscore, I've had the pleasure and privilege of watching Eckhart teach some groups of young people. And I've seen their openness, and I've seen, as Eckhart described, in many young people, they just need to hear the message and how it was lights going on so quickly, and I could see it in their eyes.

And I have to say, some of the happiest experiences I've had at Eckhart Tolle, Kim Eng Retreats has been watching those lights go on behind the eyes of young people. And so I wanna thank all of you for being with us here as we more formally launch, moving into 2024, the New Earth Youth Initiative, as has been said a couple of different times in terms of your contribution to the Eckhart Tolle Foundation living with presence, the alpha and omega of it all. Additionally, if you feel inspired, we would love for you to help spread the word about the Eckhart Tolle Foundation.

Many people are just learning about it. You can do this by resharing our social media posts and our newsletters. We'd also love your ideas about how Eckhart's teachings can reach different populations in creative ways.

One way through book donations, if you have ideas for where we can donate Eckhart's books, you can access a request form at EckhartTolleFoundation.org. So again, if you have ideas and you'd like to share them with us about where we can donate Eckhart's books, there's a request form on EckhartTolleFoundation.org. We'd also love your ideas for connecting us with like-minded nonprofits like the Holistic Life Foundation and the Jewel Never Broken Foundation or other ideas you might have about how we can bring the teachings of presence to diverse demographics and people who would otherwise not have access.

You can write to us and you might wanna write this down, outreach at EckhartTolleFoundation.org. Perhaps creative ideas have been emerged in you from being part of this special online event. Write to us at outreach at EckhartTolleFoundation.org.

If you would feel inspired to donate to the Eckhart Tolle Foundation, I also warmly invite you to do so. You can scroll below the player and there's a donate button there. And again, to repeat, your donations will be matched in the coming days and will support programs like our New Earth Youth Initiative and the 2024 Prison Teaching Tour that's coming up that you'll hear more about as well.

Also, finally, if it matches your inspiration, you can include the Eckhart Tolle Foundation in your estate planning and in your will. Okay, to conclude now, Eckhart, would you be willing to lead us in some moments of connected stillness together?

Yes, Tammy, I am willing. Wonderful. So we come into the present moment so fully that we don't need to think about it, but just sense the present moment, the stillness, the power of stillness.

Thoughts fall away, but you stay alert and awake and there's a stillness. And that stillness is a presence. It is a presence of consciousness, the light of consciousness.

And then you realize that essentially I am that. I am, you realize the essential I am-ness, I am that, that's an ancient Indian saying, Tat Tvam Azeem, I might be mispronouncing it, but I am that is the realization of your essential nature as consciousness itself. The person is secondary.

More essentially, you are consciousness. And you can sense that as an essential aliveness or aliveness, has no form.

[Speaker 12] (7:04:46 - 7:04:47)
Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (7:05:12 - 7:08:21)
Hi, everybody. Welcome. Welcome to this special Eckhart Tolle Foundation online event.

I'm so glad that you're here with us. Thank you. My name's Tammy Simon.

I'm the founder of Sounds True. And I have had the great joy and honor of working with Eckhart Tolle since 2001. And I'm also on the board of the Eckhart Tolle Foundation and have been on the board since its inception.

And it's a great joy to be your host for this special online event. During this event, you'll be hearing more about the Eckhart Tolle Foundation. Perhaps for some of you, this is the first time you'll be learning more about the foundation's history and its activities.

And we're also going to introduce you to a New Earth Youth Initiative, which is a new program that the Eckhart Tolle Foundation is sponsoring. And it brings Eckhart's teachings and the experience of presence to young people who very well would otherwise not have access to these teachings and the experience of presence in Eckhart and Kim's presence. And you're going to be learning more about that.

Also, as part of this online special event, we have two surprise videos. Not going to say much more about it, except that these videos are from some celebrated visionary humans who are expressing their support of bringing Eckhart's teachings to young people. Most of all, I want to thank each and every one of you for being with us.

There's a kind of ripple effect that comes from us connecting together in this way with a shared intent to bring presence to more and more people without financial barriers to access. So it is so wonderful to be with you and to have this experience together. Oh, and of course, as part of our time together, you're going to hear from Kim and Eckhart.

Did I forget to say that? Yes, indeed. That's going to happen too.

And now I'd love to introduce you to someone who is the president of Eckhart teachings and the co-founder and board chair of the Eckhart Tolle Foundation. This is someone who's very special to me personally. I've known this person for more than two decades now and watched her grow into her role with such beauty and dignity and the power of a generous heart, Erin Jacobson.

Erin.

Thank you, Tammy. And thank you all for joining us tonight. I just wanted to spend a few moments and tell you a little bit about how we started and some of the inspiration for the foundation.

I've been working for Eckhart teachings since it began in 1999. And our mission has always been the same and that's to share Eckhart's teachings with as many people as possible. Of course, back in the early days, we did not have a big team.

We basically did everything by hand. You know, there's almost, it was the early days of the internet. And I can still remember like it was yesterday folding paper flyers in the living room and packaging audio and video cassette tapes, being in charge of duplicating the audio and video cassette tapes.

I was the one taking all of the phone fax and snail mail orders, packaging them up and walking several blocks to the post office every day. In fact, our very first covers were actually black and white photocopies that we made at Kinko's. As you can imagine over the years, we have received a lot of feedback from people who have been impacted by the power of now and a new earth.

And some of the most impactful feedback that we've received have been letters from people in prison writing to Eckhart and expressing their gratitude as well as telling their stories. And we have been so impacted by these letters and Eckhart keeps every single one. And even though we were impacted, it still made us think about all the communities with very little access that, and we were wondering like, how can we help them?

And giving back has always been a part of Eckhart teachings and we've been doing so by giving those that can't afford to pay event scholarships, access to online courses. We have a lot of teachings available for free on YouTube and other streaming platforms. And even though that we've been giving individuals help, we still wanted a way to be able to focus and give back to underserved communities.

So in 2016, we launched the Eckhart Tolle Foundation and we chose to support incarcerated people, hospice patients and the underserved youth. We've had a couple of large conferences where all the proceeds went to fund the foundation. We've been giving tens of thousands of books away to prisons, hospices and the underserved youth.

We've brought the youth to learn directly from Eckhart and Kim in person. And we've been donating, we've given grants to these communities. And we also recently partnered with Adovo and they are providing tablets and access to Eckhart and Kim's teachings to over 250,000 people.

And we're also planning for Eckhart to speak in a couple prisons soon in person. And tonight we're highlighting the underserved youth because they need mental, emotional and spiritual support. And not only for their own personal wellbeing, but because they represent humanity's future and this world needs more conscious and aware people.

We are committed to helping these communities and help them relieve the suffering caused by the dysfunctional egoic mind so that more people can show up in their lives, present and aware and in touch with their essential nature. If you're inclined to be a part of this impact, we have three ways that you can help. Number one, by sharing our social media posts about our book donation programs and our grant programs with your networks.

Number two, we of course graciously welcome any donations. And number three, and it truly is the most important. My personal favorite quote of Eckhart's has always been, the world can only change from within.

And that does mean that you being here, connecting to presence and continuing to practice living your life from presence is the most essential. I'd also like to thank all of you, our incredibly generous donors and our dedicated board of directors for their service, our staff and our volunteers. And of course our executive director, Ali Weibel.

All of you are making this work possible. Now it's time for our first surprise video, expressing their support for the work that we've been doing by bringing Eckhart's teachings to young people. This person's team reached out to me several years ago in hopes of connecting with Eckhart.

And little did I know at the time what their vision was and where this connection would go. I'm amazed by this person's commitment to sharing Eckhart's teachings with his massive audience. I would say that he is making spiritual teachings cool in the eyes of young people.

He's definitely opening a meaningful conversation and he's using his art and his platform to not only share his own learning and wisdom but also Eckhart's teachings. Eckhart was featured in his most recent album throughout his whole album, almost, Mr. Morali and the Big Steppers. He is a multi-platinum Grammy and Emmy award-winning artist.

He was the first non-classical, non-jazz musician to win a Pulitzer Prize for his 2017 album, Damn. Here he is, Mr. Kendrick Lamar.

[Speaker 9] (7:14:54 - 7:17:16)
I believe people can, they truly can use, well, not people, young people. Young people need to hear Eckhart's words the most because today we live in a society where it's so many things pushing and pulling, you know, where there's a lifestyle, social media, friends, trends, so many things consume young people and, you know, their decision-making. And to truly crack that code and have that balance, you know, everybody wants nice things, right?

But to have that balance is to also go within, as I said before. I wish I would have read these books when I was 16, when I was 13. I'd probably be far more advanced in my personal life and my daily, you know, interpersonal dynamics, not only with people, but with myself.

But I'm fortunate enough to come across it in my 30s, right? But for the kids that's out there listening, 12, 13, 14, 15 and up, I truly recommend that you get into it because it'll open your mind up further than you can even imagine, further than the things that you want, further than the things that you think that you need. You'll explore a whole new journey of self-worth, passion, purpose, creativity, and stillness within yourself.

It's worth it. A hundred percent. Not only on a professional level, because I know everyone has dreams and goals and aspirations, but on a personal level, it plays the same rules.

And when you intertwine the works between the two, things will happen tempo for you.

Kendrick Lamar saying, young people need to hear Epgart's words the most. What a terrific surprise video. Let's learn more about the New Earth Youth Initiative.

And to share with us more about the details, we have a fellow board member of mine on the Epgart Tolle Foundation board. One of the best parts of participating on the board is the type of allyship and friendship and creative partnership that I can have with somebody like Elizabeth Lesser, co-founder of Omega Institute, author of several best-selling books, including Broken Open, How Difficult Times Can Help Us Grow, and Cassandra Speaks, When Women Are Storytellers, The Human Story Changes.

[Speaker 7] (7:18:13 - 7:23:15)
Elizabeth, over to you. Okay, thank you. Hey, everybody.

What a pleasure to be with you. It's a cold, chilly night here in New York, and I imagine you're all coming in from all over the world and the country. It's just great to feel everybody on the Zoom and YouTube and wherever you're joining us.

So I'm here to introduce our next guest, but first I wanna tell you briefly about the foundation's youth initiative. We're calling it the New Earth Youth Initiative. And it's really meaningful to me to be working on something about young people and kids because I've been in education my whole life.

I started out as a kindergarten and elementary school teacher, and then I worked my way up to working with grownups in education when I co-founded Omega Institute 47 years ago. And it dawned on me as I worked with kids years ago that grownups also need to keep learning, that it's actually imperative for adults to learn how to grow and change and expand our consciousness as we age. And not just getting facts, but the important things like how do I quiet my mind and open my heart and relate to the mysterious parts of myself, my soul, my consciousness.

And throughout my 50 almost years at Omega, I've had the privilege of being in the presence of educators of the mind and the heart and the soul, people like Eckhart Tolle, although there's really no one like Eckhart Tolle. And I got to really experience him in his full Eckhart-ness back in 2008 when I helped Oprah produce a webinar focusing on A New Earth, the book, the 10 chapters. I don't know, many of you may be tuned into that.

Millions and millions of people around the world tuned into that webinar. I remember the first night we did it, it was one of the first things like it in the world. And the entire Chicago internet went down because so many people were trying to get on.

And I learned during that, that his work wasn't just for serious spiritual readers and seekers, that anyone trying to figure out this tricky thing called being human could access the depth and the scope and the magnificence of his work. And that made me think, well, then kids could also. And young people don't just need to learn how to read and write and do math.

They need education of their hearts and their minds and souls. The way Kendrick Lamar was saying, if only he had had that learning way back in his early teens, what a difference it would make. And that's why we're doing this.

That's why we are raising money and spending the money we raise to do things like bringing his books to schools and school libraries, creating programs specifically for young people like the lectures Eckhart did a few years ago with NYU students, and offering grants to like-minded organizations working with youth. And I'd like to introduce you now to a leader from one of those organizations. And he happens to be a dear friend of mine.

He has taught at Omega Institute for many years and his work inspires all of us at Omega and here at the foundation greatly. His name is Andres Gonzalez, and he's one of the three co-founders of the Holistic Life Foundation and the co-author of Let Your Life Shine, which is a powerful book that documents the way yoga and meditation have transformed and empowered thousands of historically underserved kids in Baltimore. For 20 years, Andres has shared wellness, healing and present moment practices in public school systems and beyond, breathing life back into a community destroyed by drugs, poverty and systemic racism.

And what I love so much about Andres is how he personally walks his message in the world. He has this message that love can heal any heart, including our own. And he is that kind of healer and welcome Andres.

[Speaker 5] (7:23:17 - 7:32:45)
Thank you so much, Elizabeth. It's so good to see you. It's been a while.

I hope you're staying warm where you're at because it's chilly here in Baltimore as well. So before I get to just a few of the topics that I wanted to address, I really just wanna give a quick shout out to the Eckert Tolle Foundation for all the amazing work they do. The Holistic Life Foundation has been going for 20 years and recently they've been supporting us not only financially in terms of giving us funds to help run our Holistic Roots program, which is a mentoring program that's really helping these underserved kids in the city, but also they've donated books to us countless amounts of books.

I mean, books on top of books on top of books so we can give them to the youth, to the adults, the teenagers, to anyone that we run into in all of our programs, they're accessible and they're there to spread his message and his truths. And just amazing what they're doing and this new initiative as well is incredible and it's so needed. And I've seen it through the work I've been doing for over 20 years now all across the nation and across the world.

And I wanted to start by talking about a metaphor and how important this work is. You know, our teacher, Uncle Will used to use this extended metaphor to describe how important breath work or meditation is for people in general, but I think in particular for our youth and the transformation that it can have on them when they start using these skills and techniques to learn how to self-regulate. The way he would do it, he'd say, you know, our body's like a boat and the world is the ocean.

And more oftentimes than not, our waters are calm, right? We can set our sails and go whatever direction we wanna go. But if you think about it sometimes, and actually now I think about it most of the time, right?

Our waters aren't calm, right? We're bombarded by external and internal stimuli. Externally, we have what's going on in the world.

You have your family, you have your friends, your parents, your loved ones, significant others, you have coworkers, bosses, you have society, social media, politics, right? We're sort of, that's smacking us around externally. That's moving our boat around.

We're trying to set our sails. It's getting tougher. And then internally, the bombardment we have, our fears, our doubt, stress, worry, anxiety, trauma that we faced, whether it's our personal trauma, secondary trauma, intergenerational trauma.

So really those waters, this world is chaotic. And we're bombarded by this all the time. And it's pushing us around all over the place.

So it's hard for us to set our sails. And our teacher used to remind us how the breath or meditation, that that is our anchor. That allows us to still ourselves, which in turn will still our waters, which will allow us to set our sails and go in whatever direction we wanna go and achieve whatever it is that we wanna achieve.

And I've seen firsthand the amazing transformation this has with kids. So we were based out of Baltimore and we're in Northwest Baltimore. So like where the wire came out, like the hood of all hoods, right?

And there's a young lady in elementary school, we got with her. She was from the same projects that Freddie Gray was from. And for some reason, people would bully this girl, right?

She didn't have the cool clothes or the backpacks. She's kind of had a little less material wise than anyone else did. So they picked on her.

They made fun of her. They said stuff to her. We were always confused why they chose her because her brother had showed her how to throw her hands a little, right?

So he had a box and he showed her. So I was always confused, like why do you keep picking on this girl? She's gonna beat you up.

She's stronger than you. She knows what to do with her hands, right? So we teach her some of these techniques, some of these practices of breath work and meditation.

And this is early on in us providing these techniques and practices to youth. And so myself and the other two co-founders, Ali and Atma, we're at this school and we're with the principal and we go and we're walking through the halls and we turn the corner. And when we turn the corner, this young lady has this other lady, she's grabbed her by the shirt and she had her thrown up against the lockers.

And she's looking at her and you can tell she is about to cop back and hit this little girl. And she looks at us and she sees us walking down the halls and she looks at the girl and she looks at the guests again. And she goes, looks at the girl and goes, you're lucky I meditate.

And she lets go of the young lady, sits down and starts breathing. And it was one of the most powerful things. The principal was looking at me like, what did I just see, right?

And we were like, oh my God, what did we just see? Cause we seen how she was with the other kids too. So it's just so powerful and amazing to see the impact that it can have on these youth.

And not only is it helping with dealing with their stress, dealing with their anxiety, dealing with that bombardment I was talking to y'all about, but honestly, some of these kids in these neighborhoods, these techniques and practices that we're talking about that this new Earth Youth Initiative is focusing on will help these kids so much that in some cases, it may end up saving their lives. Cause now they're no longer reacting to what the world is throwing at them, but they're learning to instill themselves and they're able to respond. You know, and Elizabeth mentioned, I'm a big love guy, which I am, as you can see by the clothes.

And I just think love is the most powerful force in the universe. And I think that these techniques in particular, one of the things I think when youth learn to go inward, like Kendrick was talking about, 13, 16, to learn how to instill those waters, learn how to be able to go inside and just be. Remember, we're human beings.

When they learn that, they gain the sense of love, self-love, they learn to love themselves. And then now when they're looking out at others, they're more empathetic, they're more compassionate. They start seeing themselves in everyone and everything.

Now they're not alone. Now they're not so disconnected to anything. Now they see the interconnection between themselves and everyone.

They're not just their corner anymore. They're not just their block. They're not just the East side or West side of Baltimore.

They're not just Baltimore or Maryland or the United States. They're not just this country, this continent. They start seeing that universal self, that omniscient, omnipotent, omnipresent self that they truly are.

And that's when you see that transformation occur. And it's so beautiful and it's so powerful and it's so needed in the world that we're in right now. And it's just, it's amazing.

And so kudos to this foundation and the initiative they're making. I have two other things, I have these two quotes that Eckhart has in his books that I just wanted to talk about because they really ring true to some of the stuff and the synchronicities and the synergies that we're doing with the Holistic Life Foundation that are with his work. So one of them is from The Power of Now.

And our teacher used to always talk about how the only time that exists is right now, right? And Eckhart says, as soon as you enter the present moment, all unhappiness and struggle dissolve. And life begins to flow with joy and ease.

When you act out of the present moment awareness, whatever you do becomes imbued with a sense of quality, care, and love. And our teacher used to always say, the past causes anger. Someone said something to you, they did something to you, you might regret something you did.

The future causes anxiety. What's gonna happen? What am I gonna do with myself?

What's going on? When we teach these youth to be in the now, which is the only time that exists, right? The past is gone.

The future is never getting here. But when they learn to live in this now moment, this present moment, this present, it's a gift. That's the reason it's called the present.

It's so powerful. And what we're doing is we're allowing these kids to remember that they can access that whenever they want to. And that reminder is something my teacher used to always say.

He said, he says, I'm not a teacher. I'm not a teacher. I'm a reminder, I'm a calm, do it.

And Eckhart talks about that too. And stillness speaks a true spiritual teacher. He says, does not have anything to teach in the conventional sense of the word.

Does not have anything to give or add to you. We have it all already, right? Such as new information, beliefs or rules or conduct.

The only function of such a teacher is to help you remove that which separates you from the truth of who you already are and what you already know in the depth of your being. And that's what this initiative is gonna be able to do y'all. So really, we need your support.

We need you to tell your friends to tell a friend. We need y'all to really understand the impact that this can have. If we can take kids from inner cities, underserved communities, who have never had a retreat experience, never even left their city, they get to go hang out with Eckhart.

Like I wanna go to the retreat, you know what I mean? So for real, you know, special shout out to the Eckhart Tolle Foundation, all the amazing work that they're doing. Thank you for continuing to support the Holistic Light Foundation.

And please, all y'all, please do the same. Support as much as you can. This New Earth Youth Initiative is so powerful.

It's so incredible. We're honored to be a part of it here at the Holistic Light Foundation. I'm honored to be here.

And I really just love to all of y'all. And don't forget that love is the most powerful force in the universe.

[Speaker 3] (7:32:48 - 7:36:04)
Thank you, Andres. Bring in the heart. And it's time for our next surprise video.

I notice when I say that, I imagine like there should be confetti and music and, you know, sounds that go like rocket ship. Okay, okay, in a moment. And this next surprise video is from a quintessential multi-hyphenated artist, a Grammy-nominated singer-songwriter, actress, New York Times bestselling author, Jewel.

Jewel is also the founder of the Jewel Never Broken Foundation, which works with children and at-risk youth to give them the tools that they need to develop and grow into whole human beings. And I wanna connect a few dots for you here before we hear the surprise video from Jewel. Andres mentioned that the Holistic Life Foundation is part of the support partnering with the Eckhart Tolle Foundation in an upcoming retreat for young people to come be present with Eckhart and Kim in a retreat and environment.

The Jewel Never Broken Foundation is also partnering with us as is Echoes of Hope, a shout out to Echoes of Hope and other nonprofits who work with youth. And we're identifying 100 young people who can travel to Southern California and attend this three-day retreat with Eckhart and Kim at the end of May. And we're specifically raising funds.

This is the current focus of our New Earth Youth Initiative coming up in 2024. One aspect of it is to raise funds for the travel and the food and the lodging for these 100 young people to be part of this retreat experience. Eckhart Teachings is donating, gifting the tuition for the retreat, but you can imagine there are costs involved in bringing these 100 young people to the event and providing them with the travel food and lodging they need to attend.

And that's our goal here in this fundraiser is to raise funds specifically for these 100 young people to be at the retreat. We have a matching grant right now that's in effect. So when you donate, and I'd like to invite you, if you feel inspired to donate, there's a donate button below the player page to do so.

And your funds will be matched. And this is our chance if this matches your inspiration. And with that, now let's have our surprise video with Jewel from the Jewel Never Broken Foundation.

[Speaker 10] (7:36:04 - 7:37:12)
Hey, everybody, it's Jewel. And it is an honor to be here with you all today and support Eckhart. I know we are all here because we love him and his teachings.

And I love what the foundation is doing to make sure that these types of teachings can get into the hands of so many people through the foundation, through the book programs, making sure it gets into the hands of youth, in prison systems. This is such important work. I really hope that you will donate and make more of these types of things possible.

His teachings have helped not only me, but my youth in our foundation. We are a foundation that's been working in mental health with youth for 22 years. And I cannot tell you how many times our kids have come up to us saying how his books have impacted them and their life.

I know this is not news to you. I know you're here because you know this and we all agree. Eckhart has done incredible things donating books to our foundation.

And it is just a privilege to show up here today because through his foundation, I know we can do such incredible work.

[Speaker 3] (7:37:13 - 7:37:37)
Thank you, Jewel. And now we have the chance to hear from Kim and Eckhart directly. We'll start by hearing from Kim Eng, Eckhart's teaching partner, the founder of Presence Through Movement.

Kim, here we go. Thank you, Tammy. Hello everybody, hello friends.

[Speaker 4] (7:37:40 - 7:43:49)
So what I'd like to do is for you to sit kind of like in a meditative state, but we're not going to really do a formal meditation. This is something that you can do for yourself, like, you know, five, 10, three times, 20 times a day. And that is to be able to just sit in presence.

And even though things are happening around us, there may be voices, there may be things that you see in the background, but we're just going to kind of allow that to kind of go in the periphery and hold our hands like with our palms up, maybe just on your lap, but the palms up in a receiving. So you're receiving that spirit within, receiving that consciousness that is within you. So not only that you are receiving it, so you are that hole in the flute in which a life then can breathe through you, create through you.

So as we sit here with our palms up, we're in that receptive, receiving, and also emanating that light of consciousness. So our purpose in life is unfolding of that spirit within, or as Jesus said, seek the kingdom of God within. Or Buddha, he didn't say it in those words of kingdom or God, but he said, at the end of suffering.

And right now we are in these times, it's a challenging time. There's a lot happening in the world. And these youths, it's the next generation to create a new earth, to create a better world than what we have created.

I mean, it's all been a process, and it's not always uphill, but it comes around. But they are our next generation. And we are, as what Eckhart calls, we are the frequency holder for this next generation.

And these youths, I mean, as all of us have been challenged, not only by external, but by the internal, the ego, the mind. And these youths will probably also have to go through that. But if we hold that frequency of consciousness for these youths to be able to live in this world and create something that will be harmonious, peaceful, holy, and this is what we are moving towards.

We're allowing that consciousness to come through our very, the essence of who we are, come through our being. And we are that vehicle, just as those youths are a vehicle for the light of consciousness to shine through, for a new world to be able to be here, that we will end suffering, that we'll have the kingdom of God shine through us. So we are here to share this together for it's one consciousness, one life, that manifests through all these various forms.

So we have our part, we each have our part. And maybe our part is just being a frequency holder. Maybe our part is working with the youths.

So it doesn't matter what is happening in the family life of the youths. I mean, ideally, it'd be nice to be able to have conscious parenting that's happening in their family life. But just as we, each one of us, just as a school teacher, even, they may have that student one hour, two hours, three hours, five hours, whatever, how many hours in a day.

It doesn't take all day to be with a student. It just takes a moment of pure consciousness to be that light where that student can then just basically transform. They will remember that time.

We all can go back probably in our memories and think of somebody who has been there for us no matter how small, in a way, short of time that it's been. But we, the older generation, the middle generation, and the younger generation, we're here to awaken, to unfold, to manifest a new earth, to be present, to let go of that egoic form and that identification with form so that we can live and breathe, be conscious.

[Speaker 12] (7:43:52 - 7:44:07)
So these youths may be the next leaders of our country, of the various countries that are around. And so shall it be.

[Speaker 4] (7:44:10 - 7:50:13)
But will they live and be a leader, be the vessel in which consciousness can use their speech, use their mind, use their bodies in the sense of the creating and living, bringing together a global peace. Now, we don't know what that requires, whether that means we go deeper into, as a collective world, deeper into, well, deeper into suffering, deeper into the fall of or the end of a, maybe of a civilization. We don't know that.

We don't know what's going to happen, but we do know. And I know that life comes around. So it may be take five, 10 steps back, but it'll come back around.

And we are, that's the evolution of human consciousness is that we are evolving. So, and what we do, what can we do, but be present, but accepting what is in this moment. And maybe there's a lot, and there's a lot of challenges that is happening in this world at this moment, but we can go deeper into that space consciousness so we can be that frequency holder.

And from that space of being that frequency holder, we begin to learn and accept the spiritual laws of just accepting, allowing this moment to be as it is. And know that there may be some challenging times and there will be challenging times for youths. I think anybody who is going to be, go into a leadership role is challenged and they will be challenged, but we keep coming back to being present, to connect with that consciousness.

And since that consciousness is the one consciousness, we as the individual human beings are holding that frequency so it's all just one, one consciousness manifesting in all these various forms, whether it's good, bad, for in the world of form, there are opposites. So there's going to be good, there's going to be bad, there's going to be happy, there's going to be sad. There's going to be good times and bad times, but within those times can then consciousness come through and a shift begins to happen.

Something will happen. And we know if you go within, you know that the shift that is happening is happening in, if we can say the world of form, that it is transforming this world as we know it. And this is what is needed, is just for all of us together, to be that frequency holder.

So speaking of the world, I forgot to check my time to see when I started. So I don't know whether I've gone over, I'm under, but it feels complete if we could just sit in again, silence and just allow consciousness to feel that consciousness within you. With your palms facing up.

We are one and connected and holding that space for the next generation. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (7:50:16 - 7:50:24)
Thank you, Kim. And now, over to Eckhart.

[Speaker 2] (7:50:37 - 7:50:54)
Hello, everybody. Good to see you. Good to be with you.

It's, as the Buddhists would say, an auspicious evening.

[Speaker 1] (7:50:56 - 7:51:01)
The full moon has just risen above the treetops here.

[Speaker 2] (7:51:02 - 7:51:04)
I've been watching it.

[Speaker 1] (7:51:08 - 7:51:20)
And traditionally, those are very powerful moments in time for meditation and going within.

[Speaker 2] (7:51:21 - 7:52:42)

So it just happens that this session here coincides with the full moon. We haven't been planning it. And the moon is incredibly still, it rises.

It looked enormously big when it first rises, then it seems to get a little smaller, but it's such stillness around it. It's challenging being a human being.

[Speaker 1] (7:52:44 - 7:52:49)
It's also an incredible opportunity for the arising of consciousness.

[Speaker 2] (7:52:50 - 7:53:16)
But it is undoubtedly not easy. Humans are facing a seemingly endless succession of challenges. And challenges is already a positive term.

Some people would call it bad things happening.

[Speaker 1] (7:53:20 - 7:53:33)
When you become a little bit more conscious, you recognize that seemingly negative things that are happening, limitations arising in your life, obstacles arising, difficult situations, circumstances, people.

[Speaker 2] (7:53:35 - 7:54:16)
And then at some point you realize that those difficult situations, in whatever form they manifest, are actually an essential part of being human and an essential part, as far as the flowering of consciousness is concerned, the next shift in consciousness that we're moving into. So for young people, life is particularly challenging.

[Speaker 1] (7:54:17 - 7:54:52)
The most difficult time in my life was childhood and adolescence, and many other people find that also. When you're a child, you're born into a particular set of circumstances over which you have no control. You're completely at the mercy of whatever circumstances you're born into.

Your parents, your environment, family background, the culture you're born into, the environment, the country, all this.

[Speaker 2] (7:54:57 - 7:54:59)
And there's nothing you can do about it when you're a child.

[Speaker 1] (7:54:59 - 7:55:15)
You are seemingly the passive recipient of whatever life is throwing at you. And some humans are born into extraordinarily difficult circumstances, even as young children.

[Speaker 2] (7:55:20 - 7:55:44)
And then you reach adolescence, and then often it gets even more difficult, because adolescence, for many people, is a very disconcerting time, when you're halfway between childhood and adulthood, the time of transition.

[Speaker 1] (7:55:46 - 7:56:17)
For many adolescents, it's a time of great upheavals and unhappiness, even when the external circumstances are relatively okay. They're being challenged by an inner turmoil, in many cases. And they're completely unprepared for that, because nobody at school has prepared them for it.

As they enter adolescence, they're going to enter, probably, a time of inner turmoil, no matter what their outer circumstances are.

[Speaker 2] (7:56:22 - 7:57:04)

And sometimes, if the outer circumstances are relatively okay, the turmoil, the inner turmoil, can be even greater than if the adolescents were born into poverty, or to fight for survival every day. So whatever it is, it's not easy, and it's essential for youngsters to be prepared for, not just for adolescents, for children to be prepared for what's coming, and then adolescents to be prepared for what's coming when they grow into adults.

[Speaker 1] (7:57:07 - 8:00:57)
And what we are attempting to help with in reaching as many youngsters as possible is teaching the basics of awareness, which is the key to transcending the suffering that otherwise arises in the human mind that is inherited from generation to generation. So the most basic teachings for a young person, and it should start in childhood, is to be aware of their inner states, rather than being at the mercy of their inner states. They may be at the mercy of, until they become a little older, of their outer circumstances, but they don't need to be at the mercy of their inner states, which means emotions and thoughts.

If they could become aware, if it could be shown to a child, it's not complicated, that emotions arise, and that it is possible to be aware of these emotions instead of being totally absorbed in them, being totally taken over by them, that it is possible to stand back, so to speak, and witness the emotions. There it is. That's extremely important in adolescence when sometimes very negative and violent emotions arise, is the emotion taking you over completely, or are you able to allow the emotion to be there, but not being totally absorbed in it, not being totally identified in it, so that it doesn't make you do sometimes things that are irreversible in many cases.

So basic teaching is awareness of inner states that could start at the age of six, and a few, some individual teachers are kind of introducing that, making that part of their teaching. It has not yet entered the curriculum of many schools, maybe a few alternative schools, but the most important curriculum at school should not be any subject, whatever it may be, mathematics, English, or whatever language, geography, whatever, it's all secondary relative to what is primary, and that is to be aware. That should be the main subject in a more enlightened subject.

We are going in that direction. So it's awareness of emotions, which could be shown by role-playing, by telling stories, all kinds of possibilities can help children to develop the ability to be aware, and the arising of awareness is the essence of spirituality. Another word for awareness is presence.

The arising of presence is the essence of all spirituality. So that, if we can make that the main teaching, everything else would then fall into place. So it would start in childhood, and then it becomes very important in adolescence when emotions do tend to arise, powerful emotions.

[Speaker 2] (8:01:01 - 8:01:12)
Also, not just awareness of emotions, but also to be aware of thoughts that arise. What are you telling yourself?

[Speaker 1] (8:01:13 - 8:02:32)
These are simple things that can be taught even to a child. It's not complicated. By telling stories, as I said, by telling stories, by acting it out, role-playing, a child can learn to become aware also of how they speak to themselves in their mind, the inner voice.

What is the voice saying? So that they don't become the voice, because if you are the voice, you've been taken over by the conditioned mind, the mind which is conditioned by your environment, by whatever circumstances you were born into, whatever your parents have done, what people have done to you, et cetera. The conditioned mind, yes, it's there.

You can't get rid of it easily, but you don't need to be totally absorbed by it, not totally identified with it. So how do you, what is your mind saying? What is it doing?

Simple things could be taught to children, and then gradually that ability grows, the ability to stay aware when difficult things happen, as they will, in every person's life.

[Speaker 2] (8:02:33 - 8:03:07)
Every person is not only facing external difficulties, but also problems arising from the workings of the human mind. And the human mind also has incredible possibilities for manifesting and creating, but there's also, built into the human mind, a deep-seated dysfunction that everybody inherits.

[Speaker 1] (8:03:07 - 8:15:54)
In some humans, it is present in a more acute form than in others, but in every human, this deep-seated dysfunction, which we could call the ego, the egoic mind, operates in one way or another in every person's life. So we have that, it's been recognized in all spiritual traditions that, yes, humans are wonderful beings, they're wonderful possibilities, they also have created amazing things, but also there is a huge downside to being human, and that is the inherited, let's call it by a more direct term, the inherited craziness of the human condition, of the human mind. So we all inherit a little bit of insanity, and sometimes a lot.

If that were not the case, the world would not be the way it is now, when you see the enormous amount of suffering, most of it created by humans. Some suffering created by natural disaster, yes, but more suffering created by humans, but what does that mean? It's created by the consciousness, the collective consciousness in humans that creates this world, and that's what you hear about when you listen or watch the news tonight, what you're going to hear is manifestations of the collective consciousness of the human mind, and it's not pleasant.

And so this needs to be shown to young people so that you'd have a wonderful start, you'd have already the power given to you of how to face the difficult life circumstances that are going to come sooner or later, sooner probably. So give children, give youngsters this gift of showing them the possibility of being aware, of being present, instead of losing themselves in their emotions and in their thoughts completely. So that's really the essence what we need to teach young people.

Traditionally, the knowledge of this has always come in much later in life, when people are beginning to suffer more and more and more, and then they just can't stand it anymore, and at some point, there's some awakening, it's not guaranteed, but at some point when humans suffer, they awaken, and for quite a while, people coming to talks and retreats have seen some percentage of young people, but it's now, the potential of young people seems to be growing now slowly. Traditionally, it's been people in the second half of life who've come because they've suffered enough so that they finally begin to awaken.

And it seems that humans need to suffer until there is the beginning of an awakening, but it doesn't have to be like that. Humanity has already suffered a lot. And I have observed two things in young people these days, seemingly contradictory.

One is a high degree of disorientation and of aimlessness and of sometimes nihilism, nothing is worth doing. Sometimes a high degree of suddenly being possessed by some ideology that you subscribe to that reduces the complexity of life to one or see single things as the, yeah, this is the answer, I have the answer for everything. So you become possessed by an ideology and then you act it out violently sometimes.

And others completely aimless or they can't stand a seemingly empty life. So they're looking, they're going, they take drugs and so on. So that's a very negative development on the one hand, but I've also observed, and it seems almost contradictory in something, is an increasing readiness in youngsters to awaken.

They just need to hear the message, but nobody has told them. They just need to hear the message and then the shift can happen even at an early age. But the strange thing is this, the message, most youngsters have not yet been reached by this message.

And so there is, on the negative side, being young these days is very difficult. I don't want to go into it too deeply. A huge challenge is that the technology that being absorbed in the virtual dimension, the virtual world, the screens that youngsters interact with, this is a huge challenge for youngsters and a huge challenge for human consciousness.

So one would need to address that specifically. That's one of the major, if not the major challenge for young person now is how to live with this new technology, not to lose yourself in the new technology. And this technology is really an externalization of the human mind.

So the human mind has always been a problem losing yourself in your mind, which is the egoic state of consciousness and having no awareness at all, being taken over by one thought after another, one thought after another. That's always been a problem already for hundreds and thousands of years. But now you have the additional problem, this incessantly talking, active human minds that comes up, it never stops.

One damn thing after another, right? It's become now externalized to the technology. It comes at you, you interact with these screens and it never stops as a continuous input of stuff.

You're bombarded by stuff. And youngsters, many youngsters these days, the major part of their reality is not this life here, the actual life that surrounds them. The major part of their reality is a virtual world.

The virtual world has become more real to them than the real world. Humanity has never faced a challenge of that kind. It's for the first time, and it is an enormous challenge, enormous.

This is why it's so important. So it's always been important to live consciously, but now we have no choice. If we do not bring awareness in, we are going to lose ourselves completely in that the externalized mind, which is a virtual world, the virtual world can also be helpful.

We're using technology here to reach people. It can be helpful, but it needs to be used with awareness. Without awareness, without presence, it will consume you.

So it's now an absolute necessity for humans to become aware, otherwise they will be consumed, not just by their mind, they will be consumed by what they have created, the externalized mind, the virtual mind. They will be consumed by it. And this is the greatest danger for human consciousness, the greatest challenge, greater than any other challenge in the external world.

So it's so important now that only awareness can liberate us from all that. So the teaching, the main teaching, otherwise we are actually confronted with a life-threatening situation in technology. So it's not just, it's always been a challenge Traditionally, the awakening of consciousness is only, it's always been there already for thousands of years.

There've always been humans who have awakened, have been able to transcend the egoic mind and become aware, but up until recently, it's been a kind of luxury almost. It was great. Some humans were able to realize it, some many through the existing religious teachings, although religious teachings to a large extent have also become corrupted and misused by the human ego to a large extent.

But there've always been some who were able to awaken through that. But now that's not enough anymore. What we now need is an awakening on a much larger scale and the possibility is there.

When I talk to youngsters and I want to do it much more, okay, I've given talks at some universities, I've spoken at Stanford and New York University and at first I wasn't sure, at first I wondered what they're going to make of it. And I was amazed how open they were to the teaching and some said, wow, I've never heard that before. So the openness is there and we just need to create channels so that they can be reached with this message.

And the message basically, if I had to express it and define it in one single sentence, the message is that there's more to you than meets the eye. There is a possibility of accessing a deeper or higher state of consciousness. There's a dimension of consciousness in you just waiting to be discovered.

You don't have to achieve it because that means you need a lot of time to get there. The awakening is not something you need to achieve, it's something you discover. To show that to youngsters and not just conceptually but experientially, to show them the possibility, for example, of being aware of the way in which they talk to themselves in their head.

Just what are you saying to yourself? There's already an awareness or the possibility of discovery between two thoughts, there's a space.

[Speaker 2] (8:15:55 - 8:16:08)
We call it stillness. Oh, and again, everything in this world goes against that.

[Speaker 1] (8:16:09 - 8:16:27)
Every device that you have with a screen on it is trying to obscure, to prevent you from accessing the dimension of stillness because it's the opposite of stillness.

[Speaker 2] (8:16:28 - 8:16:50)
It's stuff getting in, content, stuff. Another text message, another Facebook post, another this, another this, coming from, interacting. Never a moment of, ah, and so the possibility of discovery, still.

[Speaker 1] (8:16:50 - 8:17:51)
I mean, there are a few apps, there are quite a few apps that you can get that teach you meditation, and that's good. So it can be used for a helpful purpose. It can be, most of it is in the service of unconsciousness, this technology, but it can, but a small percentage of it is actually helpful.

There are some apps that teach you how to breathe consciously, how to be aware of your breath. One of the simplest, most fundamental ways of accessing this inner dimension of stillness that transcends thought, be aware of your breathing. So you have this little app.

I tried a few on my iPhone and said, oh, that's quite good. So it goes, you can choose the duration. It says, breathe in, inhale, and then it goes, tick, tick, tick, tick, hold, exhale.

[Speaker 2] (8:17:53 - 8:18:21)
Tick, tick, tick, tick, tick, hold. Inhale, hold, exhale, hold. Well, and what happens when you follow that?

The mind becomes still. So it can be used in a constructive and helpful way.

[Speaker 1] (8:18:21 - 8:18:33)
It can be, 90% of it isn't yet, but, so we need to be, to use it skillfully with awareness.

[Speaker 2] (8:18:34 - 8:18:36)
Without awareness, it will destroy you.

[Speaker 1] (8:18:37 - 8:19:07)
With awareness, it can be a wonderful thing, this technology, and then you may have heard about the latest developments of AI, artificial intelligence. It does the most amazing things. You can ask it to write an essay on some subject and it'll write it within five seconds.

It would take you five hours to write that. Might not be as good. It can do amazing things.

[Speaker 2] (8:19:08 - 8:19:17)
And so, quite soon, perhaps, the AI will be better at thinking than the human mind.

[Speaker 1] (8:19:22 - 8:20:19)
So that's another reason for going beyond thinking, so that, to discover a dimension in you that is actually higher and more powerful than the thought, the dimension of thinking. It's time now, because otherwise, it'll defeat you. It becomes better at thinking than you are.

So you have to rise above thinking, the way we are able to use your mind and use the technology, but are not consumed by it. You are above it, and that is presence, that is awareness. So this is a wonderful thing, but this is an incredible time we live in, when things are extremely challenging.

One could say, who knows where it's going?

[Speaker 2] (8:20:19 - 8:20:23)
It could go very, very wrong.

[Speaker 1] (8:20:24 - 8:20:55)
It could, or it could be the very, the very seemingly negative thing that we have created can be the opening into that higher dimension of consciousness that is waiting to be discovered in every human, and that's vital. It's waiting to be discovered. It's dormant in you.

[Speaker 2] (8:20:56 - 8:21:05)
And so that's, children need to grow up with that, give a child this gift.

[Speaker 1] (8:21:09 - 8:21:21)
Then the child will grow into an adult and will be able to use that, and then it will become, it will grow, it will become more powerful.

[Speaker 2] (8:21:21 - 8:21:51)

Every challenge that then this human faces will make that human more conscious instead of drawing them back into unconsciousness. But of course, always, no matter in what way you become engaged in this, it always comes back to, you have to live it.

[Speaker 1] (8:21:52 - 8:22:03)
You have to live it every moment, and every moment is always this moment. In a way, one could say there is no every moment, there's only this moment.

[Speaker 2] (8:22:03 - 8:24:09)
It just looks like lots of moments, but it's only ever this moment, and this is the only moment where you can live state of the state of presence, and you can sense the power of presence within you, beyond the thinking mind, beyond emotional fluctuations. There's a, we can call it stillness, but it's much more than stillness, it's just a word, but let's call it stillness. Discover the stillness that is always waiting.

It just was obscured. So that is the most vital message for humanity. I want to thank all of you for participating in this, realizing its importance, and every one of you can contribute in some way, and perhaps the most important contribution, I think Aaron already pointed it out earlier, the most important contribution, of course, is your state of consciousness.

The world can only change from within.

[Speaker 1] (8:24:11 - 8:24:19)
What the world you want to create is a manifestation or an externalization of the collective consciousness.

[Speaker 2] (8:24:20 - 8:24:41)
If the collective consciousness is dysfunctional, the outer world will reflect it. So thank you for being part of this.

[Speaker 1] (8:24:43 - 8:24:45)
Nothing could be more important.

[Speaker 2] (8:24:46 - 8:25:46)
This is the purpose of your life, is to participate and embody the arising of what we could call the transcendent consciousness, the spiritual dimension, the shift, and then what arises as the book that I wrote, I guess it was written through me, a new us then arises naturally as a reflection of the collective consciousness. Thank you. Tammy, back to you.

Thank you, Eckhart. Here, as we come to a close, I just want to underscore, I've had the pleasure and privilege of watching Eckhart teach some groups of young people, and I've seen their openness, and I've seen, as Eckhart described, in many young people, they just need to hear the message and how it was lights going on so quickly, and I could see it in their eyes. And I have to say, some of the happiest experiences I've had at Eckhart Tolle Kim Ing retreats has been watching those lights go on behind the eyes of young people.

And so I want to thank all of you for being with us here as we more formally launch, moving into 2024, the New Earth Youth Initiative, as has been said a couple of different times in terms of your contribution to the Eckhart Tolle Foundation, living with presence, the alpha and omega of it all. Additionally, if you feel inspired, we would love for you to help spread the word about the Eckhart Tolle Foundation. Many people are just learning about it.

You can do this by resharing our social media posts and our newsletters. We'd also love your ideas about how Eckhart's teachings can reach different populations in creative ways. One way through book donations, if you have ideas for where we can donate Eckhart's books, you can access a request form at EckhartTolleFoundation.org.

So again, if you have ideas and you'd like to share them with us about where we can donate Eckhart's books, there's a request form on EckhartTolleFoundation.org. We'd also love your ideas for connecting us with like-minded nonprofits like the Holistic Life Foundation and the Jewel Never Broken Foundation or other ideas you might have about how we can bring the teachings of presence to diverse demographics and people who would otherwise not have access. You can write to us and you might wanna write this down, outreach at EckhartTolleFoundation.org.

Perhaps creative ideas have been emerged in you from being part of this special online event. Write to us at outreach at EckhartTolleFoundation.org. If you would feel inspired to donate to the Eckhart Tolle Foundation, I also warmly invite you to do so.

You can scroll below the player and there's a donate button there. And again, to repeat, your donations will be matched in the coming days and will support programs like our New Earth Youth Initiative and the 2024 prison teaching tour that's coming up that you'll hear more about as well. Also, finally, if it matches your inspiration, you can include the Eckhart Tolle Foundation in your estate planning and in your will.

Okay, to conclude now, Eckhart, would you be willing to lead us in some moments of connected stillness together?

[Speaker 2] (8:29:42 - 8:32:28)
Yes, Tammy, I am willing. Wonderful. So we come into the present moment so fully that we don't need to think about it, but just sense the present moment.

The stillness, the power of stillness. Thoughts fall away, but you stay alert and awake and there's a stillness. And that stillness is a presence.

It is a presence of consciousness, the light of consciousness. And then you realize that essentially I am that. I am, you realize the essential I am-ness, I am that, that's an ancient Indian saying, Tat Tvam Azeem, I might be mispronouncing it, but I am that is the realization of your essential nature as consciousness itself.

The person is secondary. More essentially, you are consciousness. And you can sense that as an essential aliveness or not-ness, has no form.

[Speaker 12] (8:33:19 - 8:33:20)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (8:33:58 - 9:08:27)
Beautiful sunshine, but the fog is rolling in slowly. That's beautiful too. And quite often along the coast here, you get fog and sunshine at the same time.

So as the fog reaches the beach, it begins to dissolve and then you have the sun filtering through the fog, quite magical. So here we are, an interesting thing to observe while you're here especially, but the rest of your life also is where your attention is at any given time or more precisely in the present moment, which is all there is, where your attention is in the present moment and whether your attention is determined by all kinds of factors or whether you have some influence over where your attention goes. Now you've all noticed and experienced when you're walking in the street or you're sitting somewhere and suddenly there's some noise behind you or somebody shouts something or you're in a restaurant sitting and somewhere behind you, somebody drops a plate.

And usually most people would go immediately. It's an automatic thing. And these days, of course you have other, not just plates breaking, which happens relatively rarely, but you have your phones demanding your attention.

So you are having a wonderful conversation with a friend and then you suddenly hear, ping, ping, ping. You were just talking about it really connecting and suddenly your attention goes, and it's a text message. Or some other sound, which means it's an email.

And that demands your attention and people don't realize that they obey immediately that little device. It's like a plate breaking, except this happens all the time and all people shouting behind you. So your attention is being pulled out continuously.

When I first got my iPhone two years ago, then I got my first text messages, which were quite miraculous. And then often I didn't reply until the next day or two days later. And then I was told this is not according to text message etiquette.

Text message etiquette dictates that you reply immediately. So occasionally I do that now, but even now I don't always reply immediately. And I don't even look at it immediately.

At first I did when I got the iPhone and then I realized what it was doing. And then apart from all these external things, and of course the electronic devices, they increase the demands that the external world makes upon your attention. Before you had all these electronic devices.

Yes, even then the world would make demands continuously on your attention, but not as frequent as with all these devices. And so people don't realize they are kind of, they lose their freedom of choice. And something even more all pervasive that was already there before the electronic devices came is that certain thoughts in your mind also demanding your complete attention.

A little thought comes in about something that you can't do anything about now, but you have to think about it now. And the thought says, give me your attention. So what I'm talking about here is you begin to identify with every thought that arises.

It has a pulling power. It pulls you in and it's an energy formation. Everything, a thought is an energy form.

Everything is not physical energy. It's probably halfway between physical and non-physical. And the greatest scientists, no matter what they tell you, their ego may not allow them to admit it, but if they're really honest and their ego is not huge, they will admit to you they don't, they have examined the brain for a long time, but they can't, they don't know what a thought is.

You've looked at brain chemistry and examined it and examined it, but what is a thought? They still don't know. And so we don't need to know on that level here.

You just experience what a thought is and how it pulls your attention in. And you follow it up. You follow it where it wants to take you and it leads to another associated thought and another.

And before you know it, you are dragged along by another mind stream out of the present moment into some conceptual reality, because that's what thought is. So you're drawn away into some conceptual reality, which includes a conceptual sense of self, a me, an image of me, a narrative of me. And so that is then the reality that you inhabit most of the time.

And so whether your attention is pulled by some external thing or an electronic gadget or your thoughts, it goes to all kinds of places in your head and outside and thing and what. You actually can choose to direct your attention to something rather than being at the mercy of all kinds of factors that determine where your attention is going to go. So you can choose when you hear the bing of a text message or the bong of an email, you can choose to not give it your attention, but just remain still for three seconds.

And then you have a choice. You can give it your attention or not give it your attention. At least now you have a choice.

The same thing with when some of this shouting behind you and obviously doesn't concern you, why automatically go? If you're really present, then you can hear the noise and you don't go there. It's not necessary.

It's just somebody dropped a plate or whatever. In a restaurant, it happens all the time. So you can choose to direct your attention.

For example, right now, you can choose to direct your attention. Of course, at the moment it's in visual perception and auditory perception. In addition, you can choose to direct your attention into your right hand, which does not diminish your ability to listen and to see what's going on here.

So you can have your attention in your right hand and feel the energy as I can feel it right now. Can feel the energy in my right hand or the aliveness, which does not diminish my ability to speak or to see you. I can feel, and I can feel the left hand also.

So you can direct attention into your feet. You can direct attention to some object in this room. Any sensory perception.

You can choose to think a particular thought and then let go of the thought. What am I going to have for dinner? What are they going to serve for dinner tonight?

Thought arises. I'm feeling a little bit peckish. What's one of the, and then you can choose to let go of that thought and not to follow it and return your attention to visual and auditory perception.

And so that's it. You have a choice when you're, when you realize that you have a choice where you don't need to, and to practice with the electronic gadgets particularly, because they, the common, the consensus is that you don't have a choice. You have to immediately look and check and reply or whatever immediately.

It used to be just telephones, but the telephones had a line attached to them. So they're in a particular place. They didn't follow you around.

But even when they had telephones, people would interrupt any conversation just because the phone was ringing. And at that time, they didn't even have a caller identification. So you had to pick it up no matter who, you had no idea who was going to call, but you had, it was ringing.

You had to pick up and give your attention to that call. Then the time came, fortunately, when there was caller IDs, at least you could look and see who is called. Do I want to talk to this person?

So the choice in directing your attention, and that is really the beginning of meditation or any meditation practice is to have some influence over where your attention goes. And usually in meditation, your attention is directed to a meditation object for a while and some people get stuck there for 20 years or the rest of their lives. The attention may go to a mantra, which really is a certain thought or certain sounds that you repeat in your head or you speak out aloud.

And so it becomes the focus for your attention and you choose to direct your attention there rather than useless thinking. Your attention becomes focused or you can have an external object of your attention, a candle flame, a flower, whatever it is, and you keep your attention there for a few minutes, 10 minutes, 15 minutes. And when it wanders away and you notice it's gone away, you choose to redirect your attention to that, the object.

of your meditation. So it's a practice, it's like a physical exercise. The muscle of choice is strengthened by realizing you can practice, you have a choice.

And then you discover you do not have to follow every thought where it wants to take you. You can drop a thought or you can recognize a thought as just another of those old thoughts, not interesting, and then it dissolves by itself. So it's not, the process is not to emphasize more and more the form of the me and the form and as God continues to build me, he is building me up, that could be the idea.

God is building me up. God, of course, you can replace with the universal intelligence, the universe, whatever you want to, whatever term you want to use. And yet I know from inner realization that it's not really how it works.

It's becoming diminished as a person and then something else shines through that has nothing to do with the form of the person. But the form of the person was necessary, like the seed has to break open and that was necessary, but the seed does not find its purpose, the purpose for its existence is not to become a better seed or to look better as a seed, but to break open and no longer being a seed. And then these amazing things come out of the tiniest seeds.

I, in a botanical garden, I bought in a little, they were selling a little paper bag seeds for trees and then I planted some in pots and I bought, there were like probably 80 or 100 tiniest seeds, you can hardly see the single seeds and they became, it said, this is the sequoia tree or something like, or it becomes a gigantic, it can live for 2,000 years. It comes out of something you can hardly see. But if the seed had a self-image of being a seed and were persistent in remaining a seed and stubborn and insisting, no, I'm seed and I want to be a better seed, then it wouldn't happen.

The whole miracle would not unfold. And there may be seeds who refuse to give way and break open. When you hold things down, often after a while, an explosion happens.

It's like a boiling kettle. You can't hold it for that long and then you have some kind of rationalization in your mind, you'll do it anyway. The mind will give you a reason.

Certain actions take place, you do things, you know they're not the optimal things to do but you can't help it. It's something acts through you. There seems to be some power there that makes you do things that you know are not right or not good for you and yet you can't stop it.

That seems to be the case. And that, of course, is often the case with people who are, with you it might be many different areas of your life but this is also the case with addictions. For example, people who are addicted to a certain substance or who are addicted to eating too much or drinking.

There's something that overpowers them in you that seems to obscure the awareness or the awareness is pushed to the side and this thing, this powerful thing does it anyway. And again, my answer is a little bit similar to what I said to the first questioner tonight. The power of presence needs to grow in you so that it is strong enough not to, it's not willpower because willpower is not the best way of dealing with these things but it's what I'm talking about could sometimes be confused with willpower but willpower includes the application of a force to hold something down.

Let's say if your addiction is to alcohol have a, to indulge in intoxicating beverages, in other words, booze is the British word, then, and you can feel it, it comes on, there it comes. You know the bottles are there, there they are and you feel you have to go there and you have to reach out and you have to pour yourself a drink. Now, when you're not aware at all, you don't even know what you're doing, you're so unconscious that you're already holding the drink and you're drinking, then at that point, you don't even know that you're drinking.

The same with food, I've spoken to people who have had addictions to food, they often say they wake up when they're already, they've already eaten in the middle of the night, they've already unconsciously gone to the fridge, taken out the chocolate cake and they're already halfway through the chocolate cake and suddenly they're like, what am I doing? But, so awareness comes in at a very late point. Willpower would be to hold an urge down, let's say, I'll go, they have the pool or even what the example you gave, you want to turn on the TV and you know it's not right because I'm not here for that and he actually told us not to do it.

And I, what I can't do, I can't help it, I have to go, I can't, I can't. Now, willpower, you would say, I'm going to hold this down, I'm not going to do it. And I can feel the urge, but you're holding it down.

When you hold things down, often after a while, an explosion happens, it's like a boiling kettle. You can't hold it for that long and then you have some kind of rationalization in your mind, why, it's, you'll do it anyway. The mind will give you a reason.

I spoke to a man who was addicted to food and he was, his body was very unhealthy, he was extremely dangerously overweight. Unfortunately, he's passed away, but he was a wonderful man and he talked to me and often, before he goes to the, to indulge in excessive eating, he would, his mind would say something like, you've had a rough day, you really deserve a treat. It explains why it's the right thing.

I'm not going to do it for much longer, but just today I need, I really need a treat. Life is not, hasn't been treating me, but it's the only pleasure I have, what should I do, it's all I have, there's no other pleasure in my life. Okay, go to the fridge.

Listen, I attempted to be able to show him that this thought is a deception and I had a little bit of success, but unfortunately it was too late to save him. Well, he is no longer in the body, but that's okay. He's the essence of never, he probably reincarnates now into the opposite, perhaps, in order to learn a lesson.

Again, what I said to the first questioner, to practice presence power when you're not particularly tempted by anything and you're just in your room, there's no particular temptation, go into the body, feel the inner body, be aware, be present. When you sense perception, I recommended that practice, sense perception, feel the presence pervading every cell in your body, the inner body awareness. And so that there's enough presence when this impulse comes, you use it as, don't say go away or something like that because it won't go away, it'll do it anyway.

The impulse comes, whatever it may be, and you observe, you realize it's not a good thing that it wants you to do. And if there's enough awareness, you use it as every time an impulse of that kind comes, this is your special spiritual practice. So instead of wanting to get rid of it, welcome when an impulse of that kind comes and see that this is a special spiritual practice specially designed for you, of course it is.

And so how do you transform this into spiritual practice? First, you realize this is an opportunity for practicing. And the first thing you could do is you practice delaying, obeying the impulse, not obeying it immediately, but delaying it.

And you observe them. Let's say when you wanted to go to the TV and turn this thing on, or you feel the impulse, or say, okay, here's my next spiritual practice. I'm now going to delay the turning on of this show on TV for three minutes.

And during those three minutes, you observe this, the impulse in you, you observe, it has, it's an energy form, and you observe it, oh, there you are. There you are, hmm, do you feel it? It's like a little gremlin or something.

It's like a little gremlin. And so this time gap can be a very useful first practice, that you introduce a time gap before you give in. You're not saying, I'm not going to give in.

No, you say, three minutes. During those three minutes, I'm going to observe you. And you shine the light of consciousness, the light of awareness on this impulse, which is an energy form.

And it can be an energy form that is in you as a kind of emotion. It can also dangerously invade your mind and make you, the explanation I gave just now with this friend of mine, the thought comes into your head that explains why you should give in to this impulse, that it can happen easily. And there too, you need to be present enough, sufficiently aware, so that you do not believe in every thought, especially those kinds of thoughts.

You don't believe in every thought that comes into your head. You observe the thought because the thought is part of it. And even to the thought, you say, oh, there you are.

There's a thought, and there's a feeling behind the thought. And you set aside three minutes. During those three minutes, you observe that, isn't that interesting?

Wonderful spiritual practice. And while you observe, you grow in consciousness. You apply consciousness to it.

Only three minutes, three minutes. And then after the three minutes, see how you feel. It may have dissolved, but probably not yet.

It's still there. And then you can see, can I do another two or three minutes? Am I strong enough for that?

Is my awareness strong enough? And yes, it is. Don't believe you might, oh, stop this nonsense.

Do it anyway. And so you, and then you achieve five or six minutes of, and then what happens after that, we don't know. It is possible that the impulse has receded, gone back to a dormant state, and you're suddenly, you don't have to do it.

It's also possible that the impulse is still there, and you cannot, after five minutes, there's not enough awareness left, and you finally have to go and do it. But at least the five-minute interval, the time gap was very important. And when anything like that happens, you always introduce a time gap for your spiritual practice, during which you do not hold it down, but you observe it.

So you don't push it down. You observe, oh, there you are. So if it's a gremlin, you don't, you don't say, hold you down.

Ah. There's a gremlin. You look at it.

There it is. Oh. Now, the interesting thing, when you apply awareness to something, you shine the light of consciousness on it, the possibility of transformation is also there.

It arises as you shine the light of consciousness on it. This is the famous example from fairy stories and so on. The frog, you don't kill the frog, or do something with it.

You kiss the frog, and the moment you kiss the frog, it turns into the prince. And so the frog stands for, and this is like mythology. There's some wisdom embedded in these fairy stories, which, by the way, were not, many of them were not created by the people who wrote them.

They were already orally transmitted over long periods of time. So they are mythologies that often contain a lot of wisdom. And there's certainly a lot of wisdom in kissing the frog, which then turns into something beautiful.

So there's something ugly, but you give it, you kind of, you give it an acceptance and love. You look at it, and then it, transformation happens. So that is the spiritual practice.

And after a while, you will find that initially, perhaps after the time gap, you still do it. But then gradually, this time gap gets longer, and then you may observe that the energy behind the impulse weakens, and it subsides until next time. But gradually, it weakens, and all these self-sabotage mechanisms then begin to gradually disappear if you apply the awareness to it, observe them.

There it is. So think of the frog. These are all the frogs and whatever they are, gremlins, frogs, that live in you as energy fields.

And the energies are trapped there. They are not in themselves bad. They are trapped.

Like the pain body is an energy that is emotional energy that's trapped. When the pain body dissolves, it's transformed into presence. It's like a fire.

You put a log into a fire, or it's consumed and transmuted, perhaps is the word. It's transmuted into presence. And here we have, again, the famous example.

In Middle Ages, certain philosophers were very interested in alchemy. Alchemy was supposed to be the transformation of base metal into gold through a chemical process of transformation. But the true meaning behind alchemy was the transformation of human consciousness.

And they have many images and so on. They could not speak and write about this openly because they would have been executed by the church at the time. So they had to hide all these symbols as if it were to do the transformation of base metal into gold, of something that is, first of all, not very desirable into something wonderful.

And that's the alchemical process of transmutation, which really is something in the human psyche. There's an entire long treatise written by Carl Jung, the psychologist, on alchemy with countless illustrations and just fascinating things. But it's all, it's the transformation of something undesirable initially into awareness or into consciousness.

And this is, so you're lucky to have that tailor-designed spiritual practice for you. That makes a difference if you can reach people in their own language. And people were grateful that I made this effort.

Normally, I'm not into efforting at all. And...

[Speaker 8] (9:08:27 - 9:13:01)
Hi, Eckhart. My name is Baba. And I started listening to you, I think a year ago during the pandemic.

Thanks a lot to my partner who introduced me to you. I have a three-dimensional question for you, sir. As a technologist, I come from this experience of creating virtual worlds, and I'd say there's some good news.

The good news there, both as a producer and a consumer, is there's a lot of suffering there. And as we always say, suffering is the foundation to consciousness, so hopefully we'll find a solution there. On a serious note, the three-dimensional question I have for you is, in regards to language, how is the understanding of multiple languages ...

I don't know if you've addressed this in the past, but just listening to you speak, since you have a grasp or a decent grasp of multiple languages, how has your understanding of multiple languages enabled you to get access to wisdom in the conscious dimension and communicate that in accessible ways? So that's the first one. Then the second one is pushing, wanting to explore your mind around digital media.

So I don't know whether you've experienced digital media or whether you spend much time on there, but if you were to explore your mind and talk about how you would design social media in conscious ways, what would you recommend there? Because I literally quit my job to leave in my car to explore some of these ideas. Because yeah, I think, as the pandemic showed me, it's important we solve this problem and exploring your mind would give me some insights.

Then the final one is the power of now, and it's ... I come from a different community whereby thoughts like yours was inaccessible to me, and I feel like it was a language barrier, and I would like to work with you and your team to help make the power of now accessible in major African languages, because it has really, in my own personal journey, first of all, being able to ... I've grown up speaking English, and being able to access your perspective.

I grew up Christian, but being able to access your perspective opened my mind to another dimension, and I was able to heal my deep, like Kim says, laundry. There's a bunch of laundry I was able to heal, but after healing my laundry, I came to the realization that, okay, there are a bunch of these amazing things I want to communicate with my parents, but I really can't, because I speak English to them. English is not their first language.

It's like, speaking of unconsciousness, slavery and colonization, it's like a second or third language for them, and so there are some things that are not accessible, but the weird thing is I started learning my native language, and there's some weird thing that started going on. It's like, the same thoughts you were saying is actually accessible in other languages that already exist, and I'm like, oh, my God, and I started speaking my language to my parents, and it's bringing so much peace to them, and it's like, what you're saying is actually true. Ancient wisdom and ancient civilization, those things are real, so I would love to work with you and your team to make this accessible, so please, languages, digital media, and power.

[Speaker 1] (9:13:10 - 9:13:30)
Thank you. Wonderful proposal, and that will help perhaps millions of people. However, I must confess that I have forgotten your first question.

[Speaker 8] (9:13:35 - 9:13:49)
Your understanding of several languages, does that help in accessing wisdom from the conscious dimension, and does that help in communicating that in accessible ways? Right.

[Speaker 1] (9:13:49 - 9:21:32)
Well, just, when was it, three weeks ago, we had a retreat in Mexico, and for the first time ever, I wanted to challenge myself, and I decided to do the entire retreat in Spanish, and that was, I learned Spanish a long time ago, over half a century ago, and haven't used it very much since, reading, occasionally reading a book, and I experienced the, at first, it was very hard for my mind to find the words that, there's an intuition that comes, before you speak, it's very hard to describe, before language happens, you already know what wants to be said, and at a non-verbal level, and then, this knowing what wants to be said, which is a non-conceptual knowing, then it gets translated into concepts and words, and with a, in English, they say, your, your, your language is rusty, when you haven't used the language for a long time, you say, it's rusty, and it's, that's how I experienced it, the, the impulse came to say something, and sometimes, the flow was there, it was fine, and then, so, can't find the right word, immediately, the mind has to work overtime to find an equivalent or similar word, and it slows you down a bit, but that was fine, so, I was able to reach, and after a couple of days, the flow came back, and it went much more easily, quite enjoyable, reaching people in their own language, that makes a difference, if you can reach people in their own language, rather than have it translated into their language, this is why I wanted to do it, so, I was able to, and people were grateful that I made this effort, normally, I'm not into efforting at all, but, it, I made an effort to speak Spanish, and it, it worked, and that was good, similar thing in Germany, years ago, I, so out of touch with the German language, that I spoke as a child, and I said, I cannot possibly, that was 20 years ago, I said, I cannot possibly give a talk in German, it's just, the words are not there anymore, and, at the first event, I had a translator, I spoke English, and the translator interpreted it into German, it didn't feel quite right, and a few times, I knew the translator wasn't correct, but I couldn't, but I couldn't say anything, and at the second talk, the organizer said, why don't you tell, tell your, just say a few words in German, and explain to them why you are not going to speak German, and that, that's a good idea, so I started, and I talked, the reason why I'm not going to speak in German, I said in German, the reason why I cannot speak in German to you, because I haven't used the language in 60 years, or whatever, and so, and then, I continued on, and talked, and talked, and 15 minutes later, I said, oh, I'm still speaking German, and then, they continued, translation was unnecessary, the flow was there, it was a miracle, and so, after that, I've always, whenever I go to Germany, Switzerland, I speak in German now, that's good, but the language is a strange thing, it's of course, it's an, it's an abstraction, language, I use language to teach, and the, the words that one uses were in spiritual discourse, the, the words have a different function from the function that words have in ordinary discourse, in spiritual discourse, the, the words are, are not the thing, they are all, they only point to the thing, they, all the words are pointers to something that is beyond words, so I'm using words in order to point something that is beyond the words, even when I say stillness, the word stillness isn't stillness, so it's a, it's a pointer, when I say to, to, to the awakening, spiritual awakening, presence, whatever it may be, they're all, they're all just pointers, they're not, not something to be believed in, it's not, you cannot learn the terminology of spirituality, and then believe, because you have mastered the words that are used in a spiritual teaching, then you have mastered the spiritual teaching, in ordinary subjects, this is how it works, you learn, you learn the words, and in exams, you regurgitate what you have learned, you write it all down, and you pass your exam, and so, to learn the words is, you become proficient in spiritual discourse, if you learn the words, you might become proficient in spiritual discourse, but it hasn't done anything to your state of consciousness, there are actually people around these days, who, who give talks, spiritual talks, I've seen a few on YouTube, who have mastered the spiritual discourse, especially in the area of what in, in India, India is called Advaita, Advaita Vedanta, people who have mastered the terminology of Advaita, and they can beautifully explain it, whatever you say to them is, yeah, that's obviously, it's all delusion, of course, it's all totally, it's all, everything is denied, it's very easy to, to make sense, apparently, but it doesn't make sense at all, and you can see it hasn't done anything to the state of consciousness, but they have mastered the terminology, so the language, language has a different function in spiritual discourse, and so that's, I don't know whether that has anything to do with the answer to your question, but that's what, that's what came to me, when you talk to your parents, did you talk to your parents, do you speak English to your parents?

[Speaker 8] (9:21:33 - 9:22:15)
Growing up I did, but I always felt they didn't really understand me, but when I started like, because it's the same thing you're saying, so, because I'm still not fluent in my native language, so I go through the exact same process, there's a pause, you're searching for the word, and then the word just flows through you, and there's a silence from them, to show that they, like, in English, it's like a debate, the conversation feels like a debate, but when I speak in their language, there's a silence, a pause, and an acknowledgement, and a, hmm.

[Speaker 1] (9:22:16 - 9:24:03)
That's good, very good, that's wonderful, because this is means, because you haven't quite mastered the language, the communication is not totally obscured by concepts, there are gaps in the concepts, and this is why you can actually communicate better that way, although you are not proficient at the language, that's actually a plus, especially when you communicate something even remotely connected to spirituality, that's a, it's a great, you're lucky, that, I don't know whether, Kim has mentioned to you, it reminds me of Kim's, I don't think it's a secret, she has spoken about it before, Kim has a very good relationship with her mother, her mother is 99 years old, still very active mind, very, also physically good, but Kim as a child, because she was a minority in her, at school, at that time there were very few Asian people, she decided when she was six or so, or seven, she didn't want to speak Chinese anymore, not speaking Chinese, because she did, she wanted to fit in with the others, so she refused to speak Chinese, so she lost most of her Chinese completely, as a result now, communication with her mother is virtually impossible, except for very elementary things, and her relationship is wonderful, no problem arises ever, so that's a big, a big plus, and yours is not quite as extreme, but it's similar.

So, exploring your mind, do you have thoughts on how social media, digital media, can result in more consciousness? I think this is going to help technologists like me design things for the next generation.

[Speaker 1] (9:24:23 - 9:38:59)
Well, I am not an expert on, I'm not only not an expert, I am computer, almost computer illiterate, but I'm observing things, I know how these things function, how they work, I don't have a creative solution as such, I do know that a few things that appear in the virtual world are actually helpful, there are apps that can teach you to meditate or to breathe consciously, to bring you back into the present moment, also there are talks by Eckhart on YouTube, I was, not long ago I was going for a walk, and you know that people have different conceptual identities, one of my conceptual identities is I'm a writer, when people ask me, I usually say I'm a writer, or if I don't want any further questions from them I'll say I'm retired, which is not a lie because I've been retired for many decades, in a deeper sense, so I'm a spiritual teacher, I rarely say I'm a spiritual teacher because I'm not a spiritual teacher except in the moment when spiritual teaching happens, I don't carry around with me a conceptual identity in my head, I am a spiritual teacher.

I'm an author, I suppose, okay, anyway, I was walking, a young man was coming with his partner, opposite direction, and the man stopped and he looked at me and said, I know you from somewhere, what's your name? I said, Eckhart, oh, I watch you, I read you on YouTube all the time, and then he said to his girlfriend, look, this guy is a famous YouTuber. And then I realised I have a new identity now.

So sometimes the virtual world is used for good purposes, this is not the only example, of course, but there is an inherent danger in the medium itself, it's hard to describe, even a simple thing, when I occasionally read, I love books, the physical presence of books, but sometimes when I travel, I have things on my iPad or virtual books, because books are heavy otherwise, it is not quite the same to have the experience of reading on a screen as to have the experience of a book.

I find it hard to describe what the difference is, it's almost as if I was leaking energy when I'm engaging with a screen, I have sometimes the feeling there's an energy leakage, that energy pours out, it's kind of, the screen sucks it out, and perhaps to some extent this happens to everybody, because the energy is directed onto that screen, and energy, attention is energy, so there's an outflow of attention onto there, and so I don't know what the screen does with it, here we have a nice idea for a science fiction movie, that the screens are sucking up human energy, it's the Matrix. I don't know if I finished, probably not. The, somehow to, nobody can control what people put out there, there's nothing you can do about that, if people are very unconscious, what they communicate will reflect their state of unconsciousness, so there is not much you can do, to censor people becomes problematic, although obviously there are already laws against threats of physical violence or slander and things like that, then to, in an ideal world one would say, oh, let's only allow polite and nice messages to come through, anything other, we need to censor, that would not be the right way to go, but I have no solution except to encourage you to apply your presence that is already there, and apply it so that you have creative insights into what is possible, use the presence instead of looking to me for an answer, because it appears that I don't have one, instead of looking to me for an answer, look to, go into that stillness, that presence, and see what arises, because creative solutions, creative answers come from there, so trust yourself, not the personal superficial self, but trust in the depth of your being, where intuition resides, the source of all creativity, become present, become still, direct your attention, have a question, what do you want, a creative answer to allow the virtual world to become a helpful tool in the development of human consciousness, or whatever your purpose is to direct it, and then you become still, you ask the question, the question is, you let go of the question, it drops into the stillness, this applies to any creative solution that you may need, you ask a question, and then you become still, and perhaps not immediately, perhaps after several days, weeks, or months, an answer arises, and repeat that process several times, ask a question, so you focus, and then be happy with not having an answer, allow the answer to come up, so what you're asking, the question you're asking me, is what you should be asking yourself, you will find a creative solution to that, I can sense that that will happen, and the African languages, reaching people in their own African languages is a wonderful idea, so please connect with us, so that we can pursue that.

Becoming aware of your own presence, becoming aware of yourself as presence, rather than being aware of yourself as a person, with a history, when you sense your own presence, which is the presence of yourself as consciousness, you don't have a history, there's no history in presence, and what is history, other than thought, thinking, so our meditation, the essence of our meditation, is the shift, to go through that shift, from thinking to presence, the usual human state is identification with thinking, and you only know yourself as a thought-based entity or being, in other words, you're always aware of yourself as something or somebody, and you're aware of other things that arise in your consciousness, but you're never aware of awareness itself in the normal state, you're never aware of yourself as awareness, never is perhaps very slightly exaggerated, there may be moments when you are aware of yourself as presence, but in most cases, people who don't know what that is, misinterpret it, and it's confused with something else, you could be climbing a mountain, and you stand at the mountaintop, but the sun is just setting, and the exertion of climbing, and this moment of incredible beauty stops your mind, and then you go, wow, and you may think it's caused by the beauty, but the joy and the intense aliveness and the peace, the alive peace that you sense, isn't really caused by the sunset, or caused by your surroundings, even by the activity of climbing, but that which had obscured that awareness is suddenly removed, the continuous stream of thinking, and then what is underneath is the vastness of formless consciousness, that is suddenly there, and that gives you that sense of intense aliveness, peaceful, alive presence. In India, satchitananda it's called, which means being, consciousness, bliss, another word for bliss would be joy, intense aliveness, being, consciousness, bliss, meaning satchitananda, being, satchitananda, being, consciousness, bliss, you string it together, it's one word, because it's a single thing or a single no thing, you're aware of being, you're aware of consciousness, but not in a duality, when I talk about it, it becomes duality, it says, I am aware of consciousness, but that's not really how it is, language operates within the realm of duality, but this isn't the realization of non-duality, it's only when you talk about it, it becomes duality again, as if you were aware of something, no, you are aware of the awareness, the awareness becomes self-aware, the consciousness becomes self-aware, there's no object, there's only subject. We are here to give up waiting as a state of mind, normal state of mind, and that there's another state of mind, or rather, no mind, in which you're not waiting for the next moment, that's why we're here, to discover that state of no mind, awareness, you could call it,

or deepen it,

[Speaker 1] (9:39:12 - 9:39:30)
we are not here to add anything to what we know, we know enough, enough to have come here,

[Speaker 2] (9:39:50 - 9:39:52)
so we are here to discover

[Speaker 1] (9:39:58 - 9:41:23)
that thinking is not the only possible state for humans, and not the highest state, and as we go through the shift from thinking to awareness, thinking, first of all, loses its predominant place in our lives, and as a side product of losing its predominant place in our lives, it actually becomes more effective, thinking becomes more effective, less destructive, not destructive anymore, so no answer here is going to come if you're looking for the answer on the level of thinking, or on the level of adding something to your mind, the answer lies in stepping beyond thinking,

[Speaker 2] (9:41:30 - 9:41:42)
simply by allowing what is, which is now,

[Speaker 1] (9:41:44 - 9:41:51)
allowing what is to be as it is,

[Speaker 2] (9:41:54 - 9:41:55)
because it is,

[Speaker 1] (9:41:58 - 9:43:50)
and you discover that the compulsion to think is to a large extent connected with not being willing to allow what is to be as it is now, because there's a little mind-made entity consists of thinking and accumulated thought patterns that thrives on resistance to what is, and on reactivity, and is always looking for the next thing to get a little bit bigger, it's never quite enough, this little me is never quite enough, most of you have come here because there is at work within you something that goes far beyond the personal, something that is an expression of the evolutionary impulse of the universe, on the surface level it looks as if a person had chosen to come here, but it is also possible that one or two have come here expecting something they're not going to get, what's that? More, more experiences, more knowledge,

[Speaker 2] (9:43:55 - 9:43:58)
more beliefs, more opinions,

[Speaker 1] (9:44:09 - 9:45:48)
so if there are one or two who have come here expecting more, then they might want to leave, as soon as they discover there's no more, or they suddenly after, if they can endure the discomfort that arises when the need for more is not met, and don't run away immediately, they can endure the discomfort, they may be able to break through that mind pattern, please pay attention not just to the words, but to the silent spaces between the words, that's where the shift happens, in that alertness that is required to acknowledge or to listen to that dimension of stillness that underlies the words and is in between the words, that is why we're here, and that's not an adding to, because that is discovering something that's already there, but had been ignored, just as I was coming here this beautiful night, in this incredibly beautiful place, I took off my shoes and I looked up at the sky, clear sky,

[Speaker 2] (9:45:49 - 9:45:55)
stars, brilliant points of light,

[Speaker 1] (9:45:58 - 9:47:54)
and there is something when you look up there, there's something that is so easily overlooked, but should be obvious to anybody who looks up there, it can tell you something about the nature of the universe, when you look up, what do you see?

You see little points of light, you see basically there are two dimensions there, objects, celestial objects, suns, planets, the moon, galaxies, billions, trillions, so there are celestial objects, things, objects in space, and there's space, the universe consists of things, you can look, it's so obvious, there are things in space, and there's the vastness of space, the things are that which is manifested, but when you look up there, what produces the feeling of awe, of the feeling of infinity, is the vastness of space, the depths of it which is inconceivable,

[Speaker 2] (9:48:00 - 9:48:01)
has no end,

[Speaker 1] (9:48:04 - 9:49:55)
that is such that even our neighboring galaxy, our next door neighbor in terms of galactic neighbors, the Andromeda galaxy, if you traveled at the speed of light, which is very fast, 300,000 kilometers per second, which is the distance from here to the moon in one second, is the speed of light, if you traveled at the speed of light to our neighboring galaxy, and there are billions of galaxies, the closest one to us, it would take you 2.3 million years to reach it, at the speed of light, 2.3 million years, such is the depths, the vastness of space, and what is out there, applies also the so-called external universe, applies also to the so-called inner universe, there is also within you, things, let's keep it simple, things, and space, in your life, now, things, it is obvious that your life is surrounded by things, there are many things in your life, physical things, in many people's lives there are so many physical things to deal with, that they are constantly running after the next physical thing that they need.

[Speaker 2] (9:49:56 - 9:50:00)
[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 2:18:19)
Need to deal with, they may have a house, they may have this and this, and everything demands attention. Their entire attention is absorbed by the things that surround them. And it's just at the moment, just talking about physical things.

This is needed and that's needed and that, and then there's the belief that there are not enough physical things yet. I need some more because I don't feel quite complete yet. And then there are other things in a wider sense, all the things that make up your life situation, conditions of your life, events, things are constantly happening and constantly new things pop up.

Oh, thanks. So it's not just physical things, all kinds of things make up your life situation, what people call my life. But I say, it's only your life situation.

They don't know what their life is. Their life situation consists of an accumulation of events, things happening, situations, demanding attention, everything saying, this is important, give me attention. So there's the pull of things, not just physical things, there's a pull of situations of demanding it.

So it's the world, the world, your world, consisting of things that need to be dealt with. And it's never quite enough time to deal with it all. And when you've dealt with one thing here, there's three more things dropped up there.

And so that's, people go through life with that pull into the world of things, doesn't leave you alone for long. And on a primordial level, on a basic primordial level, all the world of things starts with thoughts. Because all the things, whether they are physical or events or situations in your life, really only exist in you as thought.

Nobody knows whether actually there's anything out there at all. Because what reaches you, they say sense perception happens, visual, auditory, and so on, is translated into nerve impulses that reach the brain. And it's then those impulses are decoded.

And then some kind of world picture emerges. Oh, this is what's going on. Nobody actually knows what's out there beyond the impulses that are being received and decoded.

And so some kind of world picture is put together so that some philosophers have even doubted that there's anything out there at all. And it could just be a dream.

And there are certain indications that it is a dream.

It's in the nature of dreams to be fleeting, to evaporate very quickly. It's in the nature of situations in your life, whatever condition, any situation, everything is fairly fleeting. It's there, one moment, it has gone the next.

Where was yesterday? What happened yesterday? When you first wake up in the morning, you might think, was it a dream or did it happen?

And then you meet some other people who agree that it did happen. But it could be that these other people are part of your dream. So all the things that seem to be out there, the world of things is really an inner phenomenon.

It's to do with mind, it's to do with thought. We don't need to take any position here. We don't need to say, yes, the external world exists or no, the external world does not exist.

Very often, the answer is both or neither. The answer is not yes or no. From one perspective, it's yes.

From another perspective, no. So most people's life is filled up with things, which on the most basic level means thoughts, mind movement. One could say objects that appear in your consciousness, one after the other.

And sometimes they are battling for this. One thought, another thought. So people's lives are crammed full with that mind stuff.

And you can see it in people's faces, the way they lead their lives, the way they interact with others. What you can see is very often the absence of space. Well, it can't be absent, but they don't know it's there anymore.

All they know is things that appear, that any sense of space is gone. And so they experience their life as a continuous dream of, I'm quoting Churchill again, as I love to do, who defined history as one damn thing after another. Oh.

And if you ask many people about their personal lives, they might give you the same answer. How has your life been up to this point? One damn thing after another.

And the next damn thing comes just in the moment when you thought now you've made it. Success at last, recognition. Everybody loves me.

And then everybody wants something from you. Now, what remains? You can't say what remains, but you know what remains directly.

A sense of presence cannot be defined. A sense of beingness. This is the most beautiful thing.

These moments without thought, but it's not loss of consciousness. It's loss of thinking when it's not needed because thinking is useful for many things. And destructive for many other things.

And so you discover when it's useful and you let go of it when it's destructive, when it destroys your enjoyment of life, your enjoyment of the present moment, your ability to just be, to acknowledge the aliveness of things around you, to acknowledge the present moment, to have some gratitude for the richness of life and all life around you. All this you lose when you're continuously absorbed only in thinking. What remains then when thinking subsides, awareness remains or presence, whatever you want to call it.

In religious traditions, in mystical Christianity, it's called the Christ within. In some Buddhist schools, it is called your Buddha nature. These are just names to talk about it.

That's what remains when thinking subsides and there's only a sense of spacious presence like now. And in that spacious presence, strange thing is you don't know anything anymore, of course, because there's no concepts anymore in your mind. You don't know anything on the level of concepts.

And yet that is the essence of who you are, this beingness or presence. So you don't know yourself anymore as an object, which is when you live through the ego, then you become an object to yourself and your consciousness and you have a relationship with yourself. You can say, I love myself, which is better than hating yourself, but you still have a relationship with yourself.

You're not yourself. You have a relationship with yourself. It's better to love yourself and to hate yourself, true, but you still have a relationship with yourself.

There's two, I love myself, I'm two. But when you, with the realization of being, you are yourself. And so you cannot know yourself as an object of knowledge, but you can know yourself as the eternal subject of all knowing.

And that's where wisdom arises. This is the source of all real knowing. And the source of all true intelligence is in this non-conceptual vast intelligence, which is the intelligence of consciousness itself, which is one with who you are.

And then when you can link into that, you become inspired. It can inspire your mind. Your mind can create when it's linked into that.

You have creative thoughts. You have creative input, ideas. You take action that is wise rather than, or as the Buddhists say, skillful, skillful, wise action rather than unconscious action that produces more suffering for yourself and others.

Perpetuates karma. So this realm of true intelligence is the non-conceptual realm. Yes, you need concepts and you can use concepts, but don't lose yourself in concepts.

Don't look for yourself in concepts and then have a narrative in your mind that says, this is who I am. It's just a story of one concept linked with others' concepts. The story of yourself is not essentially who you are.

It's a story versus this limited entity, the person. It's a surface phenomenon. It's not who you are, but it's the realization of who you are.

That's the awakening. But it's not conceptual. So look for the cessation of thought.

Look for it in little moments, like now. Whenever you look at something natural, the sky, a tree, the ocean, any plant or flower or animal, don't label it. Just be alert and present and perceive it.

And as I said before, when you go into anything natural, when you go into nature, you can then sense something that is almost awe-inspiring. I'm not romanticizing nature. I also, of course, nature can also kill you, but there is something there that is holy or sacred.

And humans have to find that urgently because then they are not going to destroy nature anymore. Ultimately, humans have been destroying nature for some time because they have lost the ability to sense what's there. And then you can cut down.

There are old forests, some are still here in Canada and other parts of the world. There are forests that have been there with gigantic trees that have been there for thousands of years, thousands of years. They are sacred spaces.

And, but if humans cannot sense it anymore, then all they see is possible profit. What can we do with it? What can we do with it?

They look at the whole world in terms of doing, what I can, what can I do with it? Because they have lost sense of being. It's a terrible loss.

So, but you've also lost it with reference to yourself. You can't sense your own being. That's why you cannot sense the forest.

You can't sense your own holiness. And that's why you cannot sense the holiness of the forest or the sky or the ocean. So it's not impossibly difficult.

What I am suggesting is the most important task in your life, which has become particularly almost one could say urgent at the present time. This is a task of realizing the transcendent dimension to who you are by the simple, very simply by realizing that you do not have to think all the time. That there's always a possibility in yourself.

It's just waiting to be discovered. You are waiting to be discovered, so to speak. That dimension is always there.

The moment thinking subsides, you feel that stillness. It's another word you can use. There's a stillness.

I wrote a little book called Stillness Speaks. It's a small book designed for meditative reading, not consecutive reading, just little entries. The first sentence in the book, if I remember correctly, is you are never more essentially yourself than when you are still.

So this is the same thing. It's just another term pointer to describe it. We are still when the mind subsides, but awareness is not lost.

In fact, awareness has grown. Consciousness, awareness. This is the light of consciousness that Jesus said, you are the light of the world.

It's in one of the gospels. In another gospel, he also said, I am the light of the world, both statements. What is he talking about?

You are the light of the world. You are the consciousness of the universe. That's what he said.

You are the consciousness without which there wouldn't even be a universe. You are essentially not a person. You are the consciousness of the universe disguised briefly as a person.

But the consciousness of the universe wants to realize itself through you. This is very strange. So in other words, the universe is in the process of an awakening.

It's an awakening of consciousness. One could almost say the universe has led a dreamlike existence for a very long time when forms were identified with just the form without a gradually loss of realization of the essence. With humans, that has become very extreme.

And a tree is still rooted deeply, not only in the soil, but in the beingness of life. When you look at a tree, you can sense it is one with itself. It doesn't, it's just, you have to be still to be able to sense that there is something there that beyond sense perceptions, the presence of the tree.

It's a manifestation of consciousness too. Or even an animal, you can look at an animal without always having to label it. And you just look or touch or listen and it also is a manifestation of the one consciousness.

And it's still more rooted in being than a human, even your dog. And the dog is already kind of becoming humanized in many cases, but even the dog or the cat, they are still more deeply rooted in the beingness of themselves than humans. Humans have gone out a long way, lost themselves in mental abstractions, but it's all fine.

It all was meant that way. It's all necessary. But what's necessary now is the next step, the shift in consciousness.

Jesus called that the repent, which has been mistranslated, metanoia is repentance. It's a Greek term used in the Old Testament. Repentance, an important concept in the teaching of Jesus.

Repentance is a shift, a turnaround of consciousness, which is not, they translate it as repentance. And then they thought it means you say, oh, I'm such a miserable sinner, which, well, you probably are because your mind is dysfunctional. But then if you create an image of yourself as a miserable sinner, you're stuck again in delusion.

So metanoia is the ancient Greek term, traditionally translated as repentance, but really means an inner shift in consciousness. And that's what it's all about. And it's a great opportunity now, especially if you want to first avoid further suffering for yourself and avoid contributing to the suffering of the world or humanity, they go together.

If you don't want to contribute to the madness, because there is at the present time an increasing craziness in the energy field, you can either become part of it and contribute to it or you begin to dissolve it in yourself. So the key is become aware of yourself as a conscious presence, consciousness. Become aware that you are conscious.

For example, one could say that there's no doubt that even if your entire life is a dream, including this moment, there's no doubt that in order for the dream to happen, there needs to be a consciousness, the light of consciousness in which the dream appears. And you are that, whether you call it a dream or reality, it doesn't matter. You are the light of consciousness in which this appears.

So everything can be doubted except consciousness. You can doubt everything about yourself except that you are conscious right now. And even that, when you use language, we distort things.

Even to say you are conscious is not quite correct because that would imply that there's two of you. There's a you that is conscious or even to say I am conscious is not quite correct because language so easily creates duality. I am conscious means there's an I and there's a consciousness but that's not right.

I am consciousness is the most accurate way of saying it instead of I am conscious because you are not separate from consciousness. You are consciousness. There's no you without consciousness.

You are the light of the world. And a person, by the way, you're also a person. But if you're a person that is rooted in the realization that you are the light of the world, at all times, then you become, by the way, a much better person too.

It's the icing on the cake. It's a side product. It's a side effect of awakening.

You're no longer a totally crazy person. You're not part of the craziness anymore. Well, that's a wonderful thing.

Not being part of the craziness of the world. That's your task, especially now as the craziness is increasing. Your task is not to be part of the craziness.

So the key is awareness, presence. And that is be aware of yourself as a conscious presence and then recognize that conscious presence in everywhere else, every other human, every life form, you can sense there too is the same conscious presence in a different, one could say different vibrational frequency, but you have to become still. Thinking needs to subside if only for a moment.

And awareness remains, become still. Take a breath, one conscious in breath, one conscious out breath. And notice, if you observe, this is a lovely mini meditation.

Observe the breath going into your body and coming out of your body. During that time, you're not thinking. And so that's the way you can use your breathing by being aware of that you're breathing.

And you can, that becomes part of being aware that you're aware. As you know, I also recommend to feel your inner body, the energy that pervades your entire body, which is consciousness. And so you become aware of this inner energy field of aliveness that pervades your hands, your arms, your legs, your feet, entire body.

But it's not the body anymore. It's the unseen. You can't find that when you could cut open the body and you can't find that.

It's beyond what can be perceived. It actually exists in another dimension. That invisible presence that you are, that you cannot find when you cut open the body and look for it.

This, the invisible presence that is the essence of who you are, it does not actually exist in this dimension. It exists in another dimension. Even that you can say that the dog, what you love in the dog is yes, the dog may look nice or the cat may look nice, lovely to look at, but you can sense there is an inside to the dog.

There is, the dog has an inner being, but you cannot cut open that dog. Let's say the dog dies or does, you cut open and you look for that inner being. You can't find it because all you find is bones and blood and flesh.

Where's the dog? It's not in the bones and the blood and the flesh. It doesn't actually exist in this dimension.

It's in, it is another, you are a being and every, it's from another dimension. And only the outer part comes into this dimension. You are, as you know, you're essentially invisible.

You are invisible. The essence of who you are is invisible. Even just thought is already invisible.

You can't find a thought by looking for it with instruments, let alone the deeper consciousness of who you are, you're invisible. You can then sense intuitively that this presence is not subject to decay or time or death. But when you only know yourself as a person, then you continuously have the fear of death.

And ultimately all fear comes down to the fear of death. So the, if you want to lose the fear of death, know yourself as this invisible presence that actually doesn't even exist in this dimension. That's already in another dimension.

And you, and you realize if you had to talk about it but you don't have to say it, that ultimately there is no death. And to know that it's a direct knowing, that means all fear goes, because if the fear of death goes, then ultimately, because that's the root of all fear, the ultimate loss. And then the virus and all that is not a threat anymore.

You can take action if action is needed and often it's not needed. So that's the secret of awakening, bringing about a shift in consciousness in yourself and bringing about an end of the craziness and restore or restore sanity. Hasn't been here for, on the collective sporadically, there has been some sanity, but a lot of insanity in the collective energy field.

And there are times when the insanity increases as it did in the first half of the 20th century. It was to the two world wars and other dreadful conflicts, huge amount of collective insanity. And then it got in the Western world, at least got better for quite a few decades.

And now we're entering another period of insanity, but this, we are more ready for it now. Many humans are more ready to awaken now than before. And of course you are one of them.

Otherwise you wouldn't be here unless somebody dragged you here and you can't stand it anymore. So meditation ultimately is, yes, it's very helpful. But we are talking about is the meditative state as your normal state of consciousness.

So you're all, there's always a background of awareness in your life, even while you're talking about the upcoming elections in November, big challenge. Background of awareness, while you put forward your, how you see things, if you feel like doing it, but often there's no point. So always background of awareness and aware presence.

And then you return to just aware presence and you look around. And then it means more and more present moment living. The present moment is actually usually not bad at all.

Global meditation. Thank you very much. Just to learn to be present, to have your attention in the present moment instead of having your attention continuously being absorbed by the thinking process, the thoughts.

So this is our global live healing meditation, particularly helpful. I would say at this present time, as we are finding ourselves in a time of global disruption, many global challenges arising and likely, it's likely that the challenges will remain with us and new challenges will come as we are moving into a period of global turbulence. And that's fine.

It's a unique opportunity for spiritual awakening, a unique opportunity for disidentifying from the egoic mind and finding the transcendent dimension to who you are. The motivation for awakening, for going deeper grows for human beings as the challenges grow. And this is a reason why this is potentially an auspicious time.

When humans are not being challenged, then the motivation to evolve is not there, it's lacking because you're relatively comfortable in your little comfort zone. But when you're taken out of your comfort zone, when things get disrupted, a huge amount of uncertainty comes into your life. Loss comes into your life or the possibility of loss.

And that's often the same thing for people because the possibility of loss is a projected future and you suffer just as much as if you were already in that situation, which may never happen. But all these things potentially become the motivating force for deep, profound inner change, for a shift in consciousness, for a step forward in the evolution of your consciousness, which is the consciousness of humanity. So we need to rise up to the challenge of our present time, because if we don't, or if you don't, then it will affect you in a very unpleasant way.

You suffer more and more, as already millions of people are experiencing suffering. For example, an enormous amount of fear in the collective energy field. Many people are in a state of fear, for example, connected to the virus.

And so there's a disruption that occurs on the outside and there's also a disruption that occurs in human consciousness. The most important realization is to become aware of the fact that the most primordial thing in your life, ultimately, the one thing that determines how you experience your life or your reality, determines how you respond or react to events and situations and circumstances. The most primordial fact is not what happens around you.

The most important fact or factor is your state of consciousness, the state of consciousness with which you meet the circumstances of your life, the situation of your life. And so if people live unconsciously, they're not aware of this, it's very easy to become a victim of your circumstances. And many, many humans are victim of their circumstances.

What does that mean? Their inner state of consciousness is completely determined by the external world, by other people, by what happens on the outside, both their personal situation and the collective situation in the world. So they're at the mercy of circumstances.

Even on the smallest level, at the mercy of another human being, you meet another human being who is angry. If you are not sufficiently present, this human being who is angry will trigger the same emotion in you. And so you are at the mercy of somebody else's state.

That's just a small example. And it happens all the time. And then you have the, whatever you absorb through the media these days, the mainstream media, social media, and mainstream media, for example, generates an enormous amount of emotion.

It's there because emotion sells, it sells people tune in. It has an almost addictive quality to it. And so without knowing it, I don't believe the people who run the media, the mainstream media are probably not aware of what they're doing, but they themselves are in the grip of this collective energy field underneath the surface of things.

And there's a huge amount of collective fear running through. And if you are not sufficiently present, then you have no immunity to what goes on around you. And you are susceptible to catching, so to speak.

I'm not talking of a virus because there's another kind of immunity that is of a different kind that is within your consciousness. You are then at the mercy of whatever mental virus is floating around in the collective energy field. And without knowing it, it infects you.

So you absorb by watching an excessive amount of news, television or whatever device you use, you absorb all that collective energy field that you can't see. It is underneath the surface of things. And you're then taken over by a mental emotional energy field.

Without knowing it, you think that's you. You're identified with this collective energy field. So you've been taken over by what could be described as a virus, a mental virus, a mental emotional virus.

And you find yourself in a state of either fear or a state of anger or anxiety. And so, and that's this, when you identify with that state of anger or anxiety or fear, you become it, so to speak, or it becomes you. It becomes part of your identity.

And spiritually speaking, we call that unconscious living. To be unconscious is to completely identify with a mental emotional energy field. Identify means you seek yourself in it.

It takes you over. You don't know yourself except through that. Your consciousness is completely identified with that energy.

And that's a terrible state to be in. Now, a state of quite normal. It's very important.

Then when this becomes more and more unpleasant, fear grows, anger grows. Then it's easier for humans to suddenly become aware of what's happening to them. And that is the motivating force that helps people to step out of the identification with this collective streams of emotional mental streams.

So that's the most vital thing. You need vigilance so that you are not drawn into these unconscious collective energy fields, which are really very much like a mental virus collective. So there's an equivalent on a mental level to what we have on the physical level.

On the physical level, we have the virus that we all know about all over the world. And the equivalent of that on the mental level is a virus of destructive, negative thought forms and emotions that people get taken over by. And that makes life very unpleasant.

It can also lead to an intensification of external problems. When more and more people are being taken over by negative energy fields without knowing it, then they create in the external, they create whatever corresponds to their inner state of consciousness. So this is a time of very critical time, but it is the most critical element of it, as I see it, is not in the external.

Yes, there are external problems, but more fundamentally, it is a problem of human consciousness. And it can only be tackled there. This is the root, the causal realm is human consciousness.

And in order to inhabit a better world, you need to go to the causal realm of your own consciousness and not seek a better world in the realm of effect, which is the external realm. It doesn't mean you cannot do things in the external realm. Factor in any action that you take is, so if it is action to be ultimately really helpful and beneficial, if the underlying mental emotional state out of which this action arises is one of anxiety or fear, it's not possible to take wise action and make wise decisions out of a state of fear.

So also many people want, they have good intentions, they want to create a better world, and that is wonderful. But if you neglect the causal realm, which is your consciousness, then whatever you do on the outer, you might be very angry. And out of your anger, where you want to create a better world, that's dangerous.

It's understandable, but it's dangerous because any action you take is contaminated by the energy field of anger and creates, in Eastern terms, would say creates more karma, more suffering. So the important thing for us is not to be taken over by the collective virus that's floating around and that's everywhere in the media and so on. So be very vigilant.

Vigilance is required. It's ultimately, and this is what meditation is all about, and this is what healing is all about. Healing in a wider sense, normally healing refers to physical healing, which is wonderful too, but the deeper healing is a healing of your consciousness, the healing of a fragmented consciousness, the healing of the suffering that arises when you completely identify with mental, emotional streams that come to you.

They take you over. And so then you identify with all your, every mental positions. You have political views, mental positions, and you derive your sense of self from your position and the other becomes the enemy.

It does not mean as you awaken out of that, it does not mean that you no longer have any mental positions. You continue to have certain views, for example, with regards to the political situation or the social situation, you have certain views and that's fine. It would be virtually impossible to say, I'm now giving up all my viewpoints completely.

I'm no longer having any viewpoint and you can't do that, but you can recognize a mental position as a mental position without deriving your sense of self from it. Then when you become involved in a discussion with someone who holds, for example, in the United States at the present time, there's a huge division. There's almost like two, gradually two universes are developing that are separate as a fragmentation.

And if you're unconscious, which means you're identified with your mental positions, then when anybody questions your mental position with an opposite mental position, the person becomes your enemy. If millions of people live in that unconscious way, a civil disorder, even civil war is not impossible. That means millions of people are so identified with their positions that they're completely unaware that they are being taken over by an energy field.

And so the answer is to become aware of the positions that your mind is taking and saying, well, this is my position. You can then have a discussion with someone without making the other into an enemy, without attacking the other, either emotionally, mentally, or even physically in the case of very unconscious people. You can have a discussion and perhaps you can arrive at some kind of, you can meet at some point in the middle if you're conscious.

If you're unconscious, which means completely identified with your mental position, there's no meeting anymore. You cannot meet the other because the other is the enemy. So the primordial problem, and this is where the healing also comes in, is healing is really to be restored to wholeness, not to be fragmented and lose yourself in the fragmentation of your mind.

And so how does this happen? How can I have a mental position, for example? Even I have certain positions, obviously every human has with regards to politics.

I don't talk about them because who cares what my mental position is? That's not important. I'm here to guide humans to a higher or deeper dimension where they are no longer completely identified with and absorbed by their mental positions, their minds, their thoughts.

Then you can have the thoughts, but the thoughts exist within a greater wholeness, which we could call the awareness. And your identity lies in the awareness, the presence, the consciousness, not in the position of the mind. Then you can still have your position, but you're no longer threatened in your sense of identity if somebody questions your position or contradicts.

So that's the, and that's the essence of meditation also. The essence of meditation is to find that, to discover that transcendent dimension to who you are. The being of yourself and you discover it.

And this is, as I speak, there's an opportunity for you to realize this within yourself as I speak here and now. This transcendent dimension to who you are, the unconditioned being is something that you do not need to bring about through arduous discipline. And you cannot generate it by being, a good person.

It comes before all that. It's already here. You, at that level, you are already complete, perfect, or to use this word, whole.

Whole, you are already whole. On the level of being, you are already whole. Now that's an interesting word, whole, W-H-O-L-E, whole.

On this, on the personal level, the conditioned mental emotional entity, you are not whole, you are, there's a lot still that you could do and many things you cannot do. And you can improve your life on the level of the person. Of course, it's a good thing to improve your life on that level.

But if you miss the fundamental dimension of the transcendent, which is the spiritual dimension, then nothing on the level of your personal self will ever ultimately satisfy you, no matter what you achieve on that level. It doesn't mean that you should not strive to achieve things. It's a good thing to try and achieve things as a human being, to learn new things, experience new things, to grow, that beautiful.

This is part of why you are here, but it's not enough. And in fact, it's frustrating ultimately and not satisfying if you miss the more fundamental task, the more fundamental human task, which is to awaken to the deeper dimension of who you are beyond the conditioned person. And that's the healing, that's the wholeness.

Do you realize on that level, you are already whole. Healing and whole go back to the same root. If you go back, the etymology of the English, healing and whole come back from, to go back to the same root, which lies in old English, old high German and Norse, which is Scandinavian language.

They all go back, healing and whole go back to the same root. Sometimes wisdom is embodied sometimes in language. See if you follow it to its root.

So healing and whole have the same root. And then there's another word that's part of that, that comes out of the same root. And that's the word holy.

So the word healing, whole and holy have the same, etymologically have the same root. So you discover a dimension that has always been there, is not subject to time. Discover a dimension within yourself that is also the realm of the holy.

And you cannot define that. Holy points to the fact that you are intrinsically connected to the source of all life, which traditionally is called God. The holy points to that.

Holy is not a word that you will hear very frequently in our present civilization. It's unlikely that the word holy has ever been used in the past few years on CNN, MSNBC or Fox News, very unlikely. And the New York Times also haven't seen the word holy.

I've been looking for it a long time. No, it's not there because humans no longer know, even know what that means. You can only get a glimpse of what that means within yourself beyond conceptualization.

When you go out into nature and you're in a state of pure awareness and you look at the totality of nature that surrounds you, no matter where you are, there are trees or there's a landscape or there's the ocean or there's a mountain or just a field or even just a park or even just one tree, you give it your complete attention then without labeling it, without analyzing it, without calling it anything, you give it your complete attention. Then you can sense that beyond that, which you see in nature with your senses or what you can hear, see, hear, take in with your senses, there is something, there is an essence in nature.

There is a presence in nature that can only be described as holy. And you're in a state of awe. I like that word, awe.

When you're in nature and you go, ah. And of course, at that moment, your mind stops. You're just conscious.

You're not labeling what you perceive. And then you sense the, every sense perception is a surface reality. But beyond the surface reality, there's a deeper reality and you can sense this deeper reality, which ultimately, what is that?

It's the universal consciousness that manifests itself through countless millions of life forms. But underneath it, there is the one, ultimately the one consciousness, the one being. And you can sense that when your mind is still, you can sense that in nature.

And then you can sense that there's not a separation anymore between you and nature. The same consciousness, but different frequency. Yes.

Is alive in you as you, as the consciousness that manifests as a plant, a tree, a flower. And so you sense that connection. That is the awakening.

That's the restoration of wholeness, the wholeness of life. When the fragmented entity, the ego, subsides and you become restored to the wholeness of who you are. That's the, this is what is needed for sanity to come back into human interactions.

The only thing that can save the world is this shift in consciousness. This realization. It begins with you and it begins here and now.

And how does it begin here and now? It begins, and I'm inviting you now, perhaps it's already happening in you, but you're not quite aware of it. It begins with a moment of no thought, but just pure presence or beingness, like now.

That's meditation. Meditation is thinking subsides, awareness remains. And when thinking subsides, the entire self, what we could call the self, the egoic self, the person, the personality also subsides because it's created by the movement of thought.

So when thinking subsides, even for a moment, in that moment, the conditioned entity, the personality also subsides and something else arises. And there are many names that we could use to describe that something else that arises, that is much deeper, much more fundamental than the person. Many words have been used over centuries and millennia to describe this.

The most neutral term you could use is the being of you or the beingness of you. It could also be called the Atman, the innermost, the divinity within. That is from Indian spirituality, the Atman.

Now, Jesus had certain words for it. He called it, sometimes he called it the kingdom of heaven, which is a dimension of consciousness. It's not something you can see.

It's here or it's there. He clearly said, you can never say it's here or it's there because it's inseparable from who you are. So the kingdom of heaven is another term.

You can use it to describe that dimension. The entire teaching of Jesus was about finding that dimension within. Sometimes he called it other things.

He also called it eternal life. And he said, I want you to have eternal life. This is that my teaching is this eternal life.

What does that mean? It doesn't mean that the person goes on and on and eternal means timeless, the timeless dimension of who you are. And then the Buddha came and the Buddha refused all positive terminology, like kingdom of heaven or the Atman or eternal life, because he knew that humans would fall into the trap of transforming any positive statement into a mental idol.

So he refused to make any positive statements. He used only negative statements. He denies everything that is ultimately not it.

So Buddha described it as a no self. This is a no self. That's the ultimate teaching of the Buddha is to discover within yourself the unreality, ultimate unreality of the person, the personal sense of the egoic sense of self, the self, which also Jesus said when he made the important statement, deny thyself.

That wasn't the Buddha. I thought it could have been said by the Buddha. Jesus said it, deny thyself, deny yourself, meaning what denies a strange word here.

It doesn't mean that you decide to say, oh, I don't exist, that's not it. Deny means, as he uses it, recognize the unreality of the self that you thought you were. That is the denial of self.

Deny thyself, recognize it. Ultimately, that is not really who you are. This is just a surface phenomenon.

It's, you find that it also has its place. You have to live with it for a while, but the deeper dimension is that that is not who you are. So it's vital for humans, especially now as we are moving into a critical time period for the totality of humanity, which is also an incredible opportunity for disidentifying from the unconsciousness that otherwise governs the world.

So how do you do it? In a way, you don't even do it. It's just a cessation of, one could almost say the cessation of doing and the realization of being.

And doing, on a primordial level, is thinking. Humans are thinking all the time, except in dreamless sleep. They're thinking and thinking and thinking and thinking and thinking.

It's no cessation. And then life gets more and more difficult. Then you watch more and more in the news on TV and whatever it's called.

The news is not the news anymore. It's just opinions. It's just stupid manipulation.

And you watch him and you get drawn into that and you think it's all so real. And then you see anxiety arises, anger arises, suffering arises. And that's, and as humans, as the suffering increases, as I said before, the motivation to awaken in many humans also increases.

So we are here to realize this and to actually welcome the challenges we are confronted with externally, because they are a great opportunity for the awakening of consciousness. Yes. Humans don't awaken, except through difficulties, obstacles, problems, challenges.

And then your state of consciousness, the state of consciousness with which you meet the external situation changes, which means how the way in which you experience an external situation changes. And, now this sounds a little mystical. What subsequently happens on an external level is also to a large extent determined by your state of consciousness in the present moment.

What subsequently happens in the so-called future, which never comes, because you can only experience the future as the present moment. So you can never experience the future, except as a thought form. Interesting to realize this, the only reality the future has is as a thought form.

You cannot actually say, oh, there it is, because the moment you say there it is, it's the present. So the, how things evolve in the so-called future are linked in very fundamental way to your state of conscience in the present. So if you meet a difficult situation or a difficult person in a state of consciousness that is not reactive, but in an awakened state of consciousness, which means present, alert, then it changes also the situation, the external situation, how it develops from there onward.

Or you can, but if you're unconscious, you face an external situation and you amplify the problem of the external situation that you're facing by your unconscious reactivity of the egoic self, it feels threatened in the situation, has a new small anxiety, then all the things that you do in order to remove the situation or make it better actually makes it worse. So it amplifies when you're unconsciously reacting all the time, and you can observe it even just meeting with a single human being, a difficult human being, and many human beings are very difficult, you might've noticed. So you meet a difficult human being, how you react if this difficult human being triggers the same in you, an angry human being triggers anger in you, then you amplify his or her anger, and then it grows and grows and grows, might become violence.

And this applies to any situation, what if you are in a reactive unconscious, the unconscious state of reactivity, then you amplify the problem. And this is what happens a lot on every level here. This is an unconscious way of dealing with things.

Whenever you're motivated by fear or anger, this is what happens. You think you're resolving the situation, but you're amplifying it. Terrible.

So the key is then to realize this dimension within yourself that is beyond the thinking mind and all the mental, emotional turbulence. And this happens very easily in a moment, like now, when your mind, your thinking mind, subsides, comes to a stop. Now, what remains?

You can't say what remains, but you know what remains directly. The sense of presence cannot be defined. The sense of beingness.

This is the most beautiful thing, these moments without thought, but it's not loss of consciousness. It's loss of thinking when it's not needed, because thinking is useful for many things and destructive for many other things. And so you discover when it's useful and you let go of it when it's destructive, when it destroys your enjoyment of life, your enjoyment of the present moment, your ability to just be, to acknowledge the aliveness of things around you, to acknowledge the present moment, to have some gratitude for the richness of life and all life forms around you.

All this you lose when you are continuously absorbed only in thinking. What remains then when thinking subsides, awareness remains or presence, whatever you want to call it. In religious traditions, in mystical Christianity, it's called the Christ within.

In some Buddhist schools, it is called your Buddha nature. These are just names to talk about it. That's what remains when thinking subsides and there's only a sense of spacious presence, like now.

And in that spacious presence, strange thing is you don't know anything anymore, of course, because there's no concepts anymore in your mind. You don't know anything on the level of concepts. And yet that is the essence of who you are, this beingness or presence.

So you don't know yourself anymore as an object, which is when you live through the ego, then you become an object to yourself and your consciousness and you have a relationship with yourself. You can say, I love myself. Which is better than hating yourself, but you still have a relationship with yourself.

You're not yourself. You have a relationship with yourself. It's better to love yourself than to hate yourself.

True. But you still have a relationship with yourself. There's two.

I love myself. I'm two. But when you, with the realization of being, you are yourself.

And so you cannot know yourself as an object of knowledge, but you can know yourself as the eternal subject of all knowing. And that's where wisdom arises. This is the source of all real knowing.

And the source of all true intelligence is in this non-conceptual, vast intelligence, which is the intelligence of consciousness. Which is one with who you are. And then when you can link into that, you become inspired.

It can inspire your mind. Your mind can create when it's linked into that. You have creative thoughts.

You have creative input, ideas. You take action that is wise rather than, or as the Buddhists say, skillful, skillful, wise action, rather than unconscious action that produces more suffering for yourself and others. Perpetuates karma.

So this realm of true intelligence is the non-conceptual realm. Yes, you need concepts and you can use concepts, but don't lose yourself in concepts. Don't look for yourself in concepts.

And then have a narrative in your mind that says, this is who I am. It's just a story of one concept linked with others' concepts. The story of yourself is not essentially who you are.

It's a story versus this limited entity, the person. It's a surface phenomenon. It's not who you are, but it's the realization of who you are.

That's the awakening, but it's not conceptual. So look for the cessation of thought. Look for it in little moments, like now.

Whenever you look at something natural, the sky, a tree, the ocean, any plant or flower or animal, don't label it. Just be alert and present and perceive it. And as I said before, when you go into anything natural, when you go into nature, you can then sense something that is almost awe-inspiring.

I'm not romanticizing nature. I also, of course, nature can also kill you, but there is something there that is holy or sacred. And humans have to find that urgently because then they are not going to destroy nature anymore.

Ultimately, humans have been destroying nature for some time because they have lost the ability to sense what's there. And then you can cut down. I mean, there are old forests.

Still, some are still here in Canada and other parts of the world. There are forests that have been there with gigantic trees that have been there for thousands of years, thousands of years. They are sacred spaces.

And, but if humans cannot sense it anymore, then all they see is possible profit. What can we do with it? What can we do with it?

They look at the whole world in terms of doing. What can I do with it? Because they have lost sense of being.

It's a terrible loss. So, but you've also lost it with reference to yourself. You can't sense your own being.

That's why you cannot sense the forest. You can't sense your own holiness. And that's why you cannot sense the holiness of the forest or the sky or the ocean.

So it's not impossibly difficult what I am suggesting is the most important task in your life, which has become particularly almost, one could say, urgent at the present time. This is a task of realizing the transcendent dimension to who you are by the simple, very simply by realizing that you do not have to think all the time, that there's always a possibility in yourself. It's just waiting to be discovered.

You are waiting to be discovered, so to speak. That dimension is always there. The moment thinking subsides, you feel that stillness.

It's another word you can use. There's a stillness. I wrote a little book called Stillness Speaks.

It's a small book designed for meditative reading, not consecutive reading, just little entries. The first sentence in the book, if I remember correctly, is you are never more essentially yourself than when you are still. So when you're, is this the same thing?

It's just another term pointer to describe it. We are still when the mind subsides, but awareness is not lost. In fact, awareness has grown.

Consciousness, awareness. This is the light of consciousness that Jesus said, you are. This is our live meditation, which basically is learning to stop thinking, which sounds a little paradoxical because usually learning involves thinking.

So it's more like unlearning because we are conditioned to think continuously. And a lot of the time it's not only unnecessary, but also destructive. Cuts you off from the depths of being, of who you are beyond the thinker.

The most dreadful limitation for a human being is to know him or herself only as the thinker with its opinions and beliefs and reactions and whatever else the mind continuously comes up with. And that cuts you off from that vast dimension of consciousness that is there beyond thinking, not separate from thinking. It makes thinking possible, but it's deeper than that.

And here as we meditate, which is probably not the right word because it sounds as if we were doing something, but we're not doing anything. We're not doing a meditation, but we're here to realize that beyond doing, there's another dimension more vital. And that we could call being.

And to sense that in yourself, there needs to be at least a gap in the stream of thinking. Even a few seconds is already a slight deepening and a little bit of peace and aliveness and a little bit of joy coming through the cracks, so to speak, in what is otherwise a solid wall of thought. But we are here to go beyond that, not just wait for the little cracks to appear occasionally, but to embrace that dimension without which your life is not really that enjoyable, frustrating, in fact, pointless, that continuous worry and upset, anxiety, complaining.

That's what most people's lives consist of. Maybe, yes, the occasional crack is there. Or maybe when they get tired, they feel a little bit better because they can't think anymore.

And then they go to sleep. But really, without that deeper dimension, life, is it worth living? I don't think so.

What for? Do you think you'll ever sort out the problems in your life? You sort out one and another two appear.

So there's nothing more important than this. And realize when you stop thinking, or thinking subsides, we could say, you essentially are still there as a conscious presence, a still, conscious, aware space. And that still, conscious, aware space needs to be there in daily life, in the background.

Doesn't mean it can only be there when you don't think. You access it most deeply when thinking subsides. But as you sense it, you realize even when you think again, it doesn't go away completely anymore, that conscious, aware space can be there even while thinking happens, or while you're talking to someone, or dealing with things that need to be done.

And then you can enjoy life every moment. But the enjoyment doesn't come from all the things that happen in your life. It comes from a deeper place.

And then what happens or does not happen is of secondary importance. You're not dependent on what happens or is not happening that you want it to happen. And then you move through life embodying two dimensions, the dimension of form, which is thinking and doing, and the dimension of the formless presence, the conscious, aware space.

The two are there simultaneously. The conscious, aware space interpenetrates, if that's the word, the world of form. Then perhaps you realize the truth of the ancient Buddhist scripture, one of the most famous sutras, which says, form is emptiness, emptiness is form.

Form and formlessness being there as one. And so the way I put it occasionally, you may have heard it before, it's not the absolute truth. It's a way of talking about it.

There's two of you in any moment, in any situation. There's the person who thinks and does things and deals with life situations and people. There's you as the person.

And then there's the other you as the conscious presence. So you can still deal with things as a person, but behind that and even within that, there is the aware space. So you become a spacious person, so to speak.

Anybody who has not realized that dimension within themselves are not spacious. And of course that still applies to many humans. They are not the opposite of spacious.

Let's say they are dense, the density of the person. You can look at anybody that you know, or even strangers when you observe them, how they go about life, how they deal with things, how they interact with people, how they react or respond to changing circumstances, especially when things go wrong, so to speak. By just observing them, you can sense and see how dense or how spacious they are.

And it's not a judgment. You just see it in just the same way as you see whether it's light or dark. You're not judging when you say, oh, it's getting dark.

It's not a judgment. You just see it. So you can see it in others.

And sometimes so-called people who are into spiritual awakening, even they can sometimes very quickly when they are challenged by events, become very dense. The spaciousness is lost. So that's your spiritual practice.

Of course, it's everyday life. Can you embody the spaciousness in addition to being a person? So you don't need to achieve perfection as a person.

The person will always have certain limitations and shortcomings. And when Jesus said, be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect, he doesn't refer to the world of form, but the deeper perfection, the wholeness that is spacious presence. In ancient Greek philosophy, they often use the term, the good.

What is the good? Where is the good? And of course, we know what it is and where it is.

The good is not in the world of form. The world of form is good and bad. Nothing stays good for that long.

It either disappears or turns into its opposite. The good is within you and it is the formless presence, the source of aliveness, of joy, the source of identity, the sense of who you are. The source of that is beingness, presence, spacious awareness, I am.

They all point to the same experience, which is not ultimately negative. It just seems negative when you are in it, but it is part of a larger purpose. It's part of the awakening, not for everyone.

It doesn't have to be, but often it is part of the awakening process. The dark night of the soul is a term from, it goes back a long time. Maybe it goes back to the Spanish mystic, Saint John of the Cross.

I'm not sure if it does, but it goes back a long time. It describes something.

Well, the questioner seems to imply that he or she is going through something like this at the moment.

The dark night of the soul, which, yes, I have also experienced, that's a term then used to describe a, what one could call, a collapse of a perceived meaning in life, an eruption into your life of a deep sense of meaninglessness. And the inner state, in some cases, is very close to depression. Maybe some dark night of the soul often to do with what is conventionally called depression.

But it is basically a sense of emptiness or meaninglessness. Nothing makes sense anymore. There's no purpose to anything.

And sometimes it's triggered by some external event. Some disasters, perhaps, on an external level, external rather than within. The death of someone close to you could trigger it, especially premature death.

For example, if your child dies or you had built up your life and given it meaning, and the meaning that you had given your life, this is what my life is about, your activities, your achievements, where you're going, what is considered important. And so the meaning that you had given your life for some reason collapses. So as I said, it can happen if something happens that you can't explain away anymore.

Some disaster which seems to invalidate the meaning that your life had before. And really what has collapsed then is the whole conceptual framework for your life, the meaning that your mind had given it. And so that results in a sense of darkness, a dark place.

But people have gone into that. You're in that dark place for a while. And then you emerge out of that.

There is the possibility that you emerge out of that. You can emerge out of that into a transformed state of consciousness where life has meaning again, but it is no longer a conceptual meaning that you could necessarily explain. It is often from the dark night of the soul, not necessarily, but quite often, it's from there that people awaken out of their conceptual sense of reality which has collapsed.

They awaken into something deeper which is no longer based on concepts in your mind. The deeper sense of purpose or connectedness with a greater life that is not dependent on explanations or anything conceptual any longer. It's a kind of rebirth.

And the dark night of the soul is a kind of death that you die. What dies in the dark night of the soul is the egoic sense of self. And of course, yes, death is always painful, but nothing real has actually died there, only an illusory identity.

Now, it is probably the case that some people who have gone through this transformation, they have been through the dark night of the soul and they discovered that out of that, a new self emerged that was a non-conceptual self, but a deeper being, the awakened consciousness. And they somehow, looking back, they realized that they had to go through that. Not everybody does, of course, have to go through that, but some people do.

And they've even, in some spiritual traditions, they try to recreate the experience of the dark night of the soul in order to bring about a spiritual awakening. And that was probably part of the so-called mystery schools of ancient Greece and Egypt, which were designed, they even survived into Roman times, mystery schools with rituals and so on. Not much, we don't know much about it because they were kept secret.

Not much was written about it. And in one tradition, you spend a prolonged period of time in darkness, sometimes even in a coffin, coffin-like place, in complete isolation and darkness. That is an attempt, I would say, on the part of someone who has gone through the natural dark night of the soul to recreate the experience of it in a kind of artificial, more artificial way of actually experiencing that utter darkness where things break down.

To what extent that worked when it's not a natural experience, but a created experience, for how many people that worked and actually did bring about an awakening and a collapse of the mind-made self, I don't know whether it truly worked for many people, but it must have worked to some extent because the tradition went on for a very long time. There are other, in other forms of, in mythological forms also, they speak of similar things, sometimes described as the night journey in mythological tradition or also the descent to the underworld. They all point to the same experience, which is not ultimately negative.

It just seems negative when you are in it, but it is part of a larger purpose. It's part of the awakening, not for everyone, it doesn't have to be, but often it is part of the awakening process. The death of the old self, the birth of the true self.

So once you know that, if it should come or if you should even be in the middle of it now, you can just, the more you surrender, the more quickly you go through it. Surrender means don't judge it anymore. You accept whatever it is.

It's your experience at this moment. But as I said, not everybody has to go through that. For many people, the awakening process starts and begins without that.

Sometimes even after the awakening process begins, it might still happen, and then finally you will break through, but that's fine. Allow life to do what it does. You don't need to seek that, and we don't need to recreate it in some artificial way, so don't shut yourself in a dark room for days on end.

It's unlikely to work. It's unnecessary. The first lesson in the Course in Miracles says, nothing I see in this room means anything.

And you're supposed to look around the room at whatever you happen to be looking at. You say, this doesn't mean anything. That doesn't mean anything.

This table doesn't mean anything. This hand doesn't mean anything. What's the purpose of a lesson like that?

Well, that's a little bit like recreating what can happen during the dark nights of the soul, which is the collapse of a mind-made meaning, conceptual meaning of life. Believing that you understand what's it all about. So with the Course in Miracles in Lesson One, it's a voluntary relinquishment of the human mind-made meaning that is projected, and you go voluntarily into saying, I don't know what this means.

This doesn't mean anything. You wipe the board clean. In the dark night of the soul, it collapses.

And in some spiritual traditions, then you can actually, you're encouraged to relinquish your conceptual reality. And so you're then meant to arrive at a place of conceptual, one could say meaninglessness, or one could say a state of ignorance, where you don't, things lose their, the meaning that you had given them, which was all conditioned and cultural and so on. And you can then look upon the world without imposing a mind-made framework of meaning.

Is there some type of discipline that is needed to be successful with conscious manifestation? If so, can you describe what the discipline is that is needed? Well, basically, I have already described the discipline that's needed for, in your daily life, to be aware of yourself and of your own state of consciousness.

Also, an important factor, perhaps, that is implied in what we've been saying, but it's worth pointing it out explicitly, is the importance of what is conventionally called gratitude. But there could be other words. Gratitude is a very powerful transformational tool and also one of the most powerful tools for manifesting better things in your life.

Now, what does that mean? The gratitude is to acknowledge the good in your life now. And it's surprising how many people don't do that, who can only see the bad in their lives or only complain, but it's extremely powerful to acknowledge the good that's in your life now.

Now, let's talk about this for a moment. This does not mean that you have a conceptual idea of what your life is, and then you compare it to somebody else's life, and you say, oh, really, I should be happy because I have it so much better than look at these people. Their life is worse than mine, so I really should be grateful for my life.

That's not it. That's not real gratitude. That means you're moving within the conceptual realm and your feeling of well-being is dependent on somebody else who has less than you or is suffering more than you.

So gratitude is not if you compare yourself because that's a misconception, very common misconception of gratitude is you compare yourself to somebody else or even a whole group of people, so you look at people in the third world, I really should be grateful, we are so much better off, even though I may be poor, but I'm still better off than, so let's be grateful. No, that's not real gratitude. You're depending on others to be worse off than you, but you can feel gratitude.

It's crazy. It feeds the ego. No, no, gratitude is to acknowledge the good that's in your life now, now, this moment.

Okay, so it's not the good in your life situation, I'm fine because I have achieved this or that or whatever, no, at this moment. And that's simple things. It really comes down to simple things.

What can I be grateful for at this moment? Wow, there's so much I can be grateful for. Now, what is it?

To be grateful is to acknowledge something, to give it attention and to appreciate it. I have this, you can't see it, but I have a nice round table here. And it's lovely, I touch it, it's made of wood and it's lovely.

It's not spectacular, it doesn't need to be spectacular, but it has a presence and a beingness. There's light coming through the window there and from behind me. I often sit here, I'm lucky to have these trees here and I often sit here, there's a little screen too, otherwise there's too much glare, but I often sit here, I look at the trees for 10, 15 minutes and there's a continuous feeling of goodness because, and we could call that gratitude, but I don't say in my mind, I'm so grateful for these trees.

I simply appreciate the wonder and aliveness, the beingness of these trees. So I acknowledge the good in this moment by appreciating the wonder, the miracle of these trees. It's just, you can look at the sky here today, happens to be completely overcast, but very, and that's fine too, because there's light filtering through.

There's more light in a way today than when the sky is blue because the light is dispersed by the cloud, it's everywhere, it comes from the sun, it filters through the clouds. Now you appreciate that. You look at a potted plant, you become, you're grateful for that, you're grateful for all the little things.

You hear a bird, you drink a glass of water, acknowledging all the, you're breathing. So that's gratitude, is the appreciation of life that's around you. So you can say the gratitude for being alive, for to feel that you're alive in your entire body, the inner body, the invisible presence that inhabits the body to feel that.

So all my, all the little things, gratitude is best applied to all the small things that continuously surround you in life. And then you see the goodness of it all, or you can just, let's say you have little or no money, so, and you're looking for abundance. So how do you bring abundance into your life?

You have to discover, to acknowledge the abundance that is already everywhere around you. You walk past this, you go, you're walking in the street and there's a flower store, there's flowers on display and potted plants outside if you live in a city. An abundance of life, the flowers, they're just amazing.

There's abundance and you can look everywhere and see abundant life. Jesus used that term. He said, I want you to have abundant life.

In other translations, he says, the same term translated in a different way, I want you to have the fullness of life. Jesus promises the fullness of life or abundant life. Now, true abundance, which many people are looking for, and they think abundance is to do with having many things, it could be that quite a few things come to you when you access the source of all abundance, which of course is within you.

It's the feeling of the fullness of life. Now, once you get this feeling in the present moment, then this is perhaps the very core of gratitude is to feel the aliveness of life within yourself.

Thank you for this opportunity, for being here and allowing us to become more aware. And my question is a little bit of a follow-up from what you've just said. I know you work with psychotherapists and therapists and helping others.

And my question is, how can we follow up on the analogy of the caterpillar? How can we support others? How can we know if they are there, if they are not there?

Is it possible to help? I don't know what the question is, but it's, can we support someone in this process? You obviously are, and Kim is obviously supporting us.

So is there different stages that we can support different people in different processes?

The moment the spiritual awakening, if we want to call it that, happens in you, which is the disidentification from the thinking mind and certain degree of arising of presence. Well, not the moment it happens, but a little bit after that, as this process continues, you, many people find that more and more people come, you meet people, sometimes seemingly accidentally, or it might be people who you know already who need you, who also are at a stage of readiness, but don't know it yet. And you may find and will find that these people are drawn to you.

You may not immediately recognize them. In fact, you may think, listen, this person is not going to awaken in this lifetime, but you can get big surprises. Sometimes the most unlikely people can come to you and you know that it's happening.

There's a moment usually when you notice there is a transmission either of presence as an energy field, or they ask you a question, you give an answer, and the answer has a certain power or aliveness to it. It comes through you spontaneously, because the question was a genuine question and there was an opening in the other person. If it's not a genuine question, if it's a question asked out of curiosity, what's that spiritual stuff all about that you do, or whatever, or tell me about that spirit stuff, but there's no real opening, then your answer will not be good, or there may be no answer.

But if it's a real question and there is some degree of presence in you, then there will be a real answer. And the helping then comes in two ways. One is through the energy that you emanate as you are present.

The second is through what you say to them. And that is the beginning of you becoming a spiritual teacher. And many of you, some of you are already spiritual teachers, whether formally or not formally, some of you will become formal spiritual teachers because the world is in great need of you.

Humans want you, they may not know it yet, but everybody, even if you do not become a formal spiritual teacher, you will do some teaching informally through everybody you meet, because you spread, your state of consciousness spreads to others. That applies both to unconscious people who spread their negativity or the viral infection of their minds, and to present people who spread presence. And it's not that you are doing it.

So an important obstacle could be if you think that you need to do something to help them. This is very seductive because it's a wonderful thing to help others. But the obstacle is you think that it is up to you to help them.

It's not. In fact, you wouldn't know how to. I wouldn't know how to.

So you have to allow it to happen by holding the presence, especially when somebody comes to you, asks a question, or you say something, hold the presence and then see what happens. So it's not you who is doing it. Sometimes I've met some people who said they've been asked to, first they saw some individuals, helped them, they're growing and growing in presence.

And then somebody approached them and said, can you give a talk to our little group? And then they came to me and said, I don't think I'm ready to give a talk to a group. Somebody asked me to give a talk to a group.

I think I'm not ready. And I said, if you think you're ready, then that's not a good sign. And I said, if you think you're ready, Because there's probably a little ego in there Because there's probably a little ego in there just come to me and I will heal you.

But if you feel that the most powerful place, whether you are with one person or with a group of people, the most powerful place is to not know. But you have to be comfortable with not knowing. If you're uncomfortable with not knowing what to say, what to do, then you go, oh dear, what should I say?

The mind says, quick, say something useful to this person. And then you think of things you've read in a book. Well, Eckhart says that it doesn't mean you should never quote, but it's always more powerful if it comes from you.

So it only comes if you are comfortable with, enter that space of not knowing, which is basically you surrender thought and you just look at the person and you listen and then see what answer comes, then see what you say, if anything. In some cases, you might not say anything. So the help allow it to move through you.

And that's a big relief. It means you don't have to do it. You only become a vehicle for it, an opening for it.

You become an opening for consciousness. So you don't have to heal people, help people. I mean, you can help physically, that's a different matter.

You can give somebody food or money to help, but at a deeper level, you can't do anything. So getting out of the way, and then it will happen through you. And in the Course in Miracles, it says the moment you become a student of the Course in Miracles, which by the way is a lovely teaching, but not for everybody.

So don't believe that because I mentioned it now, you have to go and get it. It's great for some people. It's a beautiful spiritual work, but for others, it's not the right one.

Nothing is right for everybody. Course in Miracles, however, says, the moment you start studying the Course in Miracles, which really implies the moment you begin to disidentify from the conditioned mind, you become a teacher of God. Now the ego, of course, would probably love that term.

That is why I personally would not use it, but there is some truth in it. It's not a terminology that I would use, but the moment the presence arises, you begin to teach presence, but really presence does it through you. Thank you.

Thank you. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Here's a question about the teachings of a spiritual teacher called Joel Goldsmith, who taught in the 50s and 60s. He wrote books like The Infinite Way and other books using Christian terminology, but going far deeper than the kind of Christianity you would encounter in most churches. So he's taken Christian terminology and used it in a deeper sense.

I studied Joel Goldsmith's teachings for many years before I came to your teachings. He was very much a healer, a spiritual healer. This is true.

Now I'm in a healing field, massage therapy, and would like to hear you talk about healing, physical and spiritual. I can get involved in trying to fix my clients' aches and pains and need guidance. Yes, that's interesting.

Healing, physical healing. Physical healing not infrequently comes naturally with the arising of presence, and not only physical healing, also the likelihood of being ill diminishes as presence grows, because many illnesses are actually caused by dysfunctional states of consciousness, which are egoic, and dysfunctional states of consciousness affect the body in a negative way and decrease the body's ability to fight disease, the immune system.

So not all illnesses, of course there are other reasons why people become ill, but very often a dysfunctional state of consciousness makes you, yet generally, a dysfunctional state of consciousness makes you much more susceptible to disease. It does not mean that when you are present, there is a guarantee that you will never become ill. As the body grows old, at some point, it is in the nature of things, at some point, something will fail.

At least so far it's happened to humans. I'll let you know if it doesn't happen to me.

[Speaker 7] (2:31:25 - 2:31:29)
Yeah. Yeah. Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (2:31:30 - 2:38:56)
The, and healing also, as I mentioned the other day, healing is often experienced, that kind of spontaneous healing, when people surrender, they no longer, not surrender to the idea of illness, surrender simply to the present moment, to what is in the present moment. Then something is generated that is very healing. Peace itself is healing, to be in a state of a peaceful state of consciousness is healing.

So that is all true. So some of you may have heard me telling the story that for, I think, I can't remember for how long, for a couple of years or so, I was a spiritual healer for a while. And the reason was that a few years after the awakening, people started coming to me.

And one lady who used to come once a week for to sit with me, she was sensitive to energy. And as she was talking about her problems, I was in that state of blissful, intense presence, listening to her with a smile on my face, which she didn't mind, but other people mind it, because I've always had this smile on my face when I was listening to people's problems. Not because I was thinking that the problems were funny.

I could just sense that at a deeper level, the problem didn't actually exist. And so some people got angry and said, why are you smiling at me? I'm telling you about my sufferings and why are you smiling?

What's going on in your mind? And I said, there's nothing going on in my mind. That's why.

And that's why I'm smiling. And so I was sitting with her and she was talking and suddenly she stopped talking and said, oh, you're doing healing on me. I said, am I?

And she said, yes, I can feel it. It's just wonderful. And she didn't talk for a while.

And then she felt so much better. And then she said, you're a healer. I said, oh, I didn't know that.

And then she recommended that certain people should come to me. By word of mouth, it started with her. You must go to this spiritual healer.

He will free you of your pain, your illness, whatever it is. And more and more people came to me who said, oh, I've got this pain here. Can you take that away?

I've got migraine, headache. Please help me. I've got a lump on my foot.

Please remove it. And for a while I did it. I kind of was present.

That's the only way I could do. And then a few people experienced healing. Some didn't.

And then more and more I realized most people that were coming now just wanted to be relieved of certain symptoms, illnesses. They didn't seem that interested in awakening anymore because they wanted to be free of their pains, physical pains, which is fine too. But I realized that that was not my function in this world.

And so I said, I'm no longer a spiritual healer. And I know that healing still sometimes happens to people naturally. But to focus on that so much, I believe, is not my function.

Maybe somebody else's function. Joel Goldsmith is a great teacher, was a great teacher. One thing where his teaching was perhaps slightly unbalanced is there was an excessive emphasis on physical healing.

And that was always regarded as a criterion for how successful you are. And apart from that, his teaching is great. But because of the excessive emphasis on physical healing, so his teaching was associated very strongly with that.

One reason being that he came out of, for several years he was a practitioner of Christian science and his teaching still has certain similarities with Christian science. So that's some balance, something a little bit unbalanced, excessive, in my view, emphasis on spiritual healing, which resulted, for example, in strange things like when he had a heart attack, it had to be kept secret from the followers because they would have been disappointed. And so you can see the loss of balance, too much emphasis on physical healing.

But of course, when finally he had another heart attack and died, they had to finally say, he died. That's it. But if you disregard that, then it might help you.

You might read Joel Goldsmith and become suddenly physically healed. So that's great. There's some many people, the book, I don't know how many people are familiar with Christian science.

I don't think I'm familiar with it, but the foundational book for Christian science, Mary Baker Eddy, was kind of channeled, and you can read it. And quite a few people have claimed, may still claim, that just by reading some chapters in the book, they suddenly became healed. The book stresses, as Joel Goldsmith does, that basically illness is an illusion, and ultimately even having a physical body is an illusion.

On the deepest level, that is true. But you don't even, I don't usually approach it from that angle. The arising of presence is enough.

And where the identification with the body ceases. I'm not trying to convince anybody that the physical body is an illusion. And then we go, really?

Feels so real to me, especially the aches and pains.

[Speaker 2] (2:39:27 - 2:49:55)
Hi, let's get ready for a approximately 10 minute guided breath meditation. So here you are, sitting at your computer screen, and just come forward to the edge of your seat. So you're sitting right up onto your sit bones.

Your feet are flat on the floor. You can place your hands either face down or facing up on your lap. And then just gently close your eyes.

Sitting up nice and tall with your eyes closed. Bring your attention to your breath. Now at this moment, we're not trying to change the breath.

But just simply become aware of how you are being breathed at this moment. Perhaps there's some tightness, perhaps your breath is shallow. Just be aware, and then become aware of your body.

If there's any tightness, tension, bring your attention to those areas of tightness or tension. And consciously relax your body. So you're relaxing your jaw, your forehead, the shoulders, your entire body.

And then bring your attention back to your breath. And let's together deepen the breath. And as we're doing this, you're bringing calm, a calmness to your body, relaxing the body.

So we will inhale for a count of four and exhale for a count of four. So at this moment, we're just going to even out our breath. And for those who are beginning, just beginning their practice in meditation, you may wish to count, actually count out your inhale and count out your exhale.

So I'll count with you for the first two or three breaths. And then you can count just on your own. And for those who have been practicing meditation for a while, it's just simply consciously aware of your breath as you inhale and as you exhale.

Feeling the breath moving in and out of your body. Feeling the breath as you breathe in through the nose and exhale through the nose. So let's empty our breath, empty our lungs with an exhale.

Exhale. Then inhale two, three, four. Exhale two, three, four.

Inhale two, three, four. Exhale two, three, four. and continue like this on your own.

Notice where you're breathing when you inhale, where the breath is going in the body. See if you can actually inhale through the belly so when you inhale your belly rises and when you exhale your belly falls inward. If you become lost in thoughts just gently guide your attention back to your breath.

Now let's increase the inhale and the exhale to the count of six. You may notice as you deepen your breathing and you inhale it goes into the belly, into your chest and rises to the shoulders and as you exhale your shoulders fall, your chest falls and then your belly falls. Now just see if you can just stop the counting and simply be aware and feel.

Feel your belly rise as you inhale, the chest rise, the shoulders rise and feel your chest fall, your belly fall as you exhale. Feel the body relax as your breath evens out. Notice the space around your breath.

Notice the space in this moment and when you're ready you can slowly open your eyes, taking in the world of form, still keeping some attention on your breath and as you go about your day just practice keeping some attention inward on your breath and if you feel like you just want to keep sitting here meditating on your breath feel free to do so.

[Speaker 1] (2:50:26 - 7:03:48)
As you look at me or the image on the screen or look into my eyes, feel, sense your own presence. So you pay attention to that presence without which you would not be able to perceive anything. The prerequisite for all perception or experience is that presence.

Another way of putting it, there is a, you're giving attention to what appears in your consciousness at this moment. You're giving it attention and that attention is your presence, is awareness and that's more important than me looking at this image on the screen. So while I'm looking, it almost seems that I'm looking at you and in a way I am.

It took me a while, just a little comment. It took me some time to be able to speak into a camera rather than to a live person or live audience until I was able to sense the camera as a kind of wormhole, to use a science fiction term, through which I reach the consciousness that is you. Because it's essentially, we are an expression of that one consciousness manifesting as the person that I am right now for a little while, the person that you are right now for a little while.

A little while could be anything from how much longer are you going to live, few more weeks, months, 10 years, 50 years, 70 years. It's all a little while. There is an essence that underlies the entire universe.

And that is sometimes in spiritual language called the one. The oneness sounds a little bit more abstract. The one is more direct.

And the one is another term for God. So there isn't my consciousness and your consciousness only when we use language, it appears that there is such a thing when I say, I reach your consciousness. But there's only the one consciousness appearing as this and that and that.

I am that one consciousness. You are that one consciousness. Knowing yourself as that one consciousness is spiritual awakening is if you know yourself continuously as that one consciousness, then traditional terminology that would be called enlightenment.

It really is your natural state. Potentially it is a natural state for all humans potentially. And it is our destiny to know ourselves as the one consciousness.

The one consciousness, in other words, knowing itself through you and me. Becoming aware of itself. Awakening in this dimension.

Coming more and more fully into this dimension from another dimension which is timeless. In this dimension there is time. Paradoxically one can say the timeless one expressing itself gradually, which means time, expressing itself gradually more and more in this universe, in this dimension.

So the universe is becoming spiritualized, you could say. And from the perspective of time that takes a long time. But it's all very simple.

From where you are, it does not take time. This realization is the realization of the timeless. The timeless dimension in you.

That is the spirit, to use an old term. There is something else to you that is the body. And there's also the mind.

They are not separate from spirit. They are expressions, limited expressions of the formless one spirit, one consciousness. And so we have the three terms, mind, body, spirit.

You know yourself as a body. You can touch the body, you can look at yourself in the mirror. You can like or dislike what you see when you look in the mirror.

You can derive your identity or a large part of your identity from what you see in the mirror. Positive or negative, good or bad. You may like what you see, you may dislike what you see.

Either case, it's possible that you derive a large part of your identity from the body. If it looks good to you or better than others, then it's a happy identity.

And if it doesn't, it's an unhappy identity.

It's a very limited identity, a sense of self, a very limited sense of self. But for people, it's the main thing that they are concerned about. And then comes the mind.

So the body, physical form, that which can be seen. And the next level is that which cannot be seen, but which can be known. You know yourself primarily as a mind.

The larger part of who you are is not visible. The entire psychological self, the conditioned entity, all the thought processes, all the emotions that go with the thoughts, all the emotions that arise, come and go. It's all the unseen you.

Science as it is at the moment wants to reduce the unseen to that which can be seen or perceived. In other words, it wants to reduce everything to matter. It doesn't really recognize there's anything unseen.

It says if you really look deep enough into matter, you will eventually find everything there. You will find the chemicals that produce the emotions, you will find the molecules that produce certain thoughts. You just haven't found them yet, they say.

We still don't know what a thought is. But eventually we'll find that matter produces thought. It's a byproduct of that's what science, mainstream science believes, believes at the moment that matter, that what we call consciousness is a byproduct of matter, accidental byproduct of matter.

And that is a, I don't want to argue with that right now, but the time will come when we will realize that is an absurd misperception of who we are. And that the entire universe can be reduced to accidental formations of matter is also a misperception. But we can put that aside for our meditation purposes here and go to what we can verify directly within.

And you can verify that there's a lot of stuff going on inside you or thought processes that give you your sense of self. So the sense of self is derived and partly from the physical body. For some people, it's a large part, for other people, it's a smaller part of their sense of self.

The next step, you derive your sense of self from your mind and the emotions, thought activity, the mental image of who you are, the self talk in the head that you may be familiar with, the storytelling of the mind that you may know, me and my life, listen to my story. And that's where it stops for most people. Sense of self derived from the body plus the mind, which includes emotion, mental, emotional.

And that's about, that's what there is for most people. So you have body and mind, but where's the spirit? Now, for most people, spirit is just a concept.

They might, if you go to church or temple, or wherever you may hear about spirit, you may repeat words that refer to the spirit. But is that anything other for you than a thought in your head, just another thought that's added? Or even one gigantic thought that controls all other thoughts, God, so forth.

There are people in whom the mental concept of God has taken over their mind and has become the controlling thought. And through that controlling thought, they perceive everything else. They think that's spiritual.

Of course, what that really is, is what's sometimes called radical fundamentalism, actually a form of insanity. One thought has taken over and controls all other thoughts. And that is a gigantic ego.

And then you share that with other people who have the same dysfunction. And you have this gigantic collective ego. It's a form of insanity, not uncommon.

But anybody who is not yet aware of a spirit in their immediate experience, partakes to some degree of that dysfunction, might not be as gigantic and as potentially violent as the dysfunction in the fundamentalist or the terrorist. But it is a dysfunction when you only know yourself as the physical body and whatever your mind is telling you, with all its conditioned patterns. But it's so easy to take one another step deeper into yourself and also know yourself as spirit.

And that's so simple as the question I asked you at the beginning of our session today. As you look at me, can you sense that in you, which is looking? And I don't mean the physical eyes.

I don't mean what you're looking at. But the energy behind the looking, the consciousness that makes a looking possible. And that is your simple presence.

And if possible, make sure that you're not disturbed while we're here. And just give this time to yourself. Because really, meditation in a wider sense, just means being with yourself.

And everybody should take time out every day, even if it's only 10 minutes to be with themselves. Now you may ask, am I not always with myself? Throughout the day?

And you might even say, I'd rather get away from myself and my usual preoccupations, worries, anxieties, fears. So what does it mean when I say being with yourself? I don't refer to your usual sense of self, which I call the surface self.

That's to do with all the thinking that goes through your mind throughout the day, the emotions you experience, all the things that happen in your life, your memories of who you are. In every human being, there is a deeper dimension to who they are. And getting in touch with that deeper dimension within themselves.

That's really what meditation is. And if you've never accessed that deeper dimension in yourself, you will always feel that something really vital is missing in your life. Even though you may have achieved many things on what I call the surface reality, the surface level of your life.

Maybe you have recognition, maybe you have wealth, you can buy whatever you like. And yet, you will notice there's something that seems is still missing a certain underlying dissatisfaction or discontent. It may not be there all the time.

But it always resurfaces. And many people, I've met quite a few people who have achieved fame and fortune. And they all told me that after a while after the initial elation of being suddenly wealthy or famous, recognized as important by the world.

And soon, the old discontent came back, a sense of insufficiency, also to do with fear. So no matter what you achieve on the surface level of life, if you haven't found that deeper dimension to who you are, your life is not really fulfilled. And there's so much frustration.

The frustration that people continuously experience in life is not really to do with the imperfection on the outer level of their life, because on the outer level, things can never be perfect, or never perfect for very long. Things come and go, you lose here, you gain something there, you lose something here. So the dissatisfaction is not realizing that there is something deeper within you, that is more truly who you are, than whatever happens on the surface of your life.

That really is the spiritual dimension. And the deeper self also connects you with the underlying deeper dimension of the universe. Because just like you, what we see in this world, the universe, the world, whatever you call it, it's all the surface of reality.

Under that, and the great teachers and philosophers since ancient times have said that, realized it, there is an unseen dimension. Underneath that, there is a universal intelligence underneath all the phenomena that we experience through the senses. And you are one with that universal intelligence.

And the way to connect with that universal intelligence that underlies all the manifold manifestations of life that continuously unfold around you is miraculous. Underlying all that, there is a, an intelligence, we can call it, there are other names we can use to talk about it. But it's only in you that you can find it, you can't find it out there.

But once you find it in yourself, you recognize it out there. You can sense that that intelligence or that consciousness is in everything. So how, how do you connect with the deeper level within yourself?

It's deeper than thinking. So you can't get there through thinking about it. It's deeper than the emotions.

And yet it's always there. It's always there. And it's not that it's totally hidden from you.

It's that the thinking, the thoughts, the emotions, and the sense perceptions draw all your attention to themselves. So people are kind of hypnotized by those things, especially thoughts. So they no longer can sense the dimension of depths, because every thought really demands your attention.

And you go, you follow it with your attention. And then it leads to another thought and another thought. And every thought is a voice in the head.

It thinks, it thinks, it thinks. And you go, and you think that's your life. All the thoughts that come and talk to you about who you are and what other life is, that's your life.

They're people who they are. And continuously, your attention is being drawn into that mind activity and emotions go with it. And that's, that's the usual surface sense of self.

And it's, it's frustrating if there's nothing else. Everybody has it, has that surface sense of self, of course. But if, if there's nothing else in your life, except that, then your life is shallow.

And the spiritual dimension is missing. So here we are. Because we want to find the dimension of depths within ourselves.

And it's already here. We just need to become aware of it. How?

Well, that's what traditionally what meditation methods are for. But here, I'd like to suggest to you to just investigate without actually using any technique as such. Just investigate with your attention.

What it means to be yourself. On the most essential level. What does it feel like to be yourself?

What is that sense of self? Can you get a taste or a glimpse of that sense of self without thinking about yourself? How is it possible that you can even think about yourself and about your life and all the things that make up your life?

What makes that thinking possible? What is the prerequisite for being able to think? You need to be conscious.

If you're not conscious, you can't think. But usually, this consciousness is completely absorbed by thinking. And that is what keeps you on the surface level of reality and yourself.

So you only know yourself as defined by your mind. You then have an image of who you are. And really, that is what ego means in the way we use it.

You then have a mental image. You have a self-talk. And you think that's who you are.

Me. But there is a more fundamental sense of self underneath all that. And that is your simple sense of presence.

So I'm inviting you now to sense that there is more to you than all your thinking. What does it feel like without the thinking to be yourself? What is left when you're not thinking but you're not falling asleep?

Let's see if we can create a little gap in the stream of thinking. To some extent, me talking to you already does that. So if there's a little gap in the stream of thinking, like now, you go, and there's a moment of no thought.

But something is there. A sense of presence or aliveness, whatever you call it. So can you sense now, at this moment, that inherent, deeper sense of alive presence that has nothing to do with your personal history?

It has nothing to do with the past. It has nothing to do with the future. It has nothing to do with your situation in life or your name or your background.

It's beyond all that. So another way of putting it, can you sense that presence? You can't define it.

It has no content. It's just space. Spacious presence.

And then you know, in that you know, that you are alive without having to tell yourself that you are alive. Because the fact that you are alive is self-evident. Because you are conscious.

And to say you are conscious, even that is not absolutely correct. Because in essence, it's not that you are conscious, but you are consciousness. That strange thing or no thing, that's the essence of who you are.

And sensing yourself as that consciousness also frees you, liberates you from being completely trapped. In your personal sense of self. Of course, that's still there on the surface.

But now, you can sense that you are actually deeper than that. Now you may notice that as I speak to you, there are little gaps between words or sentences. Now these gaps are not there to hypnotize you.

Because we are here to de-hypnotize you from being totally trapped in your thoughts and deriving your sense of who you are from your thinking. It's to bring you to that presence. Pure presence.

That's so refreshing, so revitalizing to sense yourself as that pure presence. And so, these little gaps in between words or sentences as I speak are very important. Because you may notice that in those gaps, you're not thinking.

In those gaps, for example now, you are just present. And that's wonderfully liberating to sense yourself as that presence. I'd like to mention for those of you who are new to this, to be aware as you sit here and listen and watch, to be aware that I don't talk continuously right now.

There are short gaps in between words or sentences. And as part of our meditation, please just notice that there are gaps when I don't speak. Notice means pay attention.

Just note. One could even say the gaps are more important than the words. You need a certain alertness to notice the gaps.

I could say what you notice is the silence in between words or sentences. And to the mind, the thinking mind, that is something silly and absurd. Because the thinking mind is mental noise, so it doesn't know what to do with silence.

It's not high on your list of thinking minds or list of priorities. And the thinking mind says I've got other things to worry about than silence, but that's the problem. It worries a lot.

The thinking mind is not ever silent. But to find that dimension is very important in your life. I would even say the most important thing.

Now what happens inside you when you notice the silence between words, the gap? You become silent. When you notice that there is a silence, a silent space, like now, in that moment of noticing, whether it's two seconds or five seconds, in that moment of noticing, you're not thinking, but you're conscious.

And that's meditation. To be conscious without thinking. In addition to noticing the silent gap, gaps, you could also become aware that you are breathing.

The breath flows in and out. Flows in and out. So it may help you to be aware not only of the silent space, spaces, where it's only ever one space because there's only the present moment.

To be aware of the one space, the gap between words, it may be helpful while you're aware of that space, to be aware that you're breathing also, you're breathing. You feel it, sense the air flowing in and out. So there's a knowing in the background that's not thinking.

A conscious presence, but you're not thinking. It's vitally important to be able to access that dimension, not just when you sit and say, okay, now for the next 10 minutes, 15 minutes, half an hour, one hour, I'm going to do my meditation. That's fine.

It can be very helpful. But it's more important to access that dimension in everyday life. That's stillness, another word for it.

And in that stillness, you are there, but not the historical you, the person that thinks about his or her problems and fears and desires and the past and the future. It's all connected with a stream of thinking. Me and my life, think about that.

Who I am, that's defined by thinking, the judgments about myself, things I'm proud of, things I'm ashamed of, things I regret, things I'm anxious about that might happen. All that usually gives you your sense of who you are. But when that comes to a stop, there's a cessation in that stream of thinking that usually provides you with your sense of identity.

Then, now, you become aware that there is another dimension of consciousness in you that's, one could say, deeper than thinking, or one could say, higher than thinking. Awareness, presence, stillness, spaciousness. And you can sense that there is something there that has no form.

When you think about your life, your problems, your anxieties, so on, it's all form, every thought is a thought form. And yet there's another dimension in you that most people don't know about that is formless. One could say you become aware of your being, your beingness, your presence.

When there's a moment of no thought, is there nothing there anymore? Well, there is undoubtedly a conscious presence left, the light of consciousness, and that is you. More essentially than the story of your life.

That is the universe of which you are an intrinsic part, the universe becoming aware of itself. It's conscious. You are conscious.

And suddenly you know that you are conscious. You sense that consciousness, that presence. It underlies everything.

Your entire order of thinking couldn't happen if you were not conscious. You couldn't have any emotions if you were not conscious. You couldn't have any sense perceptions if you were not conscious.

It underlies everything. It's the foundation for everything. It's the one thing that is totally beyond any doubt.

Maybe your entire life is a kind of dream. It could be. So you can doubt the absolute reality of your so-called life.

What you cannot doubt, because the evidence for it is here and now and immediate, what you cannot doubt is that you are conscious. The essence of who you are is that presence, that consciousness. I want to leave aside today for our meditation the question that may have arisen in your mind, whether the brain, the physical brain, produces consciousness, or whether the brain receives consciousness like a radio receives the signals and translates them.

I would suggest the second is the case, but we don't need to explore that here now. Our session here is practical and direct. We don't need to go at the moment into abstract speculation or philosophy, although it's interesting.

The fact remains that that presence that's there is the essence of who you are. Most people are not aware of their own presence. They are only aware of what arises in that presence, in that consciousness.

Sense perceptions, the look, the hear, the touch. Thoughts and emotions. Those are the things that arise in that light of consciousness.

Welcome to another live meditation. As you look at me, or the image on the screen, or look into my eyes, feel, sense your own presence. So you pay attention to that presence without which you would not be able to perceive anything.

The prerequisite for all perception or experience is that presence. Another way of putting it, there is a, you're giving attention to what appears in your consciousness at this moment. You're giving it attention, and that attention is your presence, is awareness.

And that's more important than me looking at this image on the screen. So while I'm looking, it almost seems that I'm looking at you, and in a way I am. It took me a while, just a little comment.

It took me some time to be able to speak into a camera rather than to a live person or a live audience. Until I was able to sense the camera as a kind of wormhole, to use a science fiction term, through which I reach the consciousness that is you. Essentially, we are an expression of that one consciousness, manifesting as the person that I am right now for a little while, or the person that you are right now for a little while.

A little while could be anything from how much longer are you going to live, a few more weeks, months, 10 years, 50 years, 70 years. It's all a little while. There is an essence that underlies the entire universe, and that is sometimes in spiritual language called the one.

The oneness sounds a little bit more abstract. The one is more direct. And the one is another term for God.

So there isn't my consciousness and your consciousness, only when we use language it appears that there is such a thing, when I say I reach your consciousness. But there is only the one consciousness, appearing as this and that and that. I am that one consciousness.

You are that one consciousness. Knowing yourself as that one consciousness is spiritual awakening, is you know yourself continuously as that one consciousness. In traditional terminology that would be called enlightenment.

It really is your natural state. Potentially it is the natural state for all humans. It is our destiny to know ourselves as the one consciousness.

The one consciousness, in other words, knowing itself through you and me. Becoming aware of itself. Awakening in this dimension.

Coming more and more fully into this dimension from another dimension which is timeless. In this dimension there is time. Paradoxically one can say the timeless one expressing itself gradually, which means time, expressing itself gradually more and more in this universe, in this dimension.

So the universe is becoming spiritualized. And from the perspective of time, it takes a long time. But it is all very simple.

From where you are, it does not take time. And this realization is the realization of the timeless. The timeless dimension in you.

That is the spirit, to use an old term. There is something else to you that is the body. And there is also the mind.

They are not separate from spirit. They are expressions, limited expressions of the formless one spirit, one consciousness. And so we have the three terms, mind, body, spirit.

You know yourself as a body. You can touch the body, you can look at yourself in the mirror. You can like or dislike what you see when you look in the mirror.

You can derive your identity or a large part of your identity from what you see in the mirror. Positive or negative, good or bad. You may like what you see, you may dislike what you see.

In either case, it is possible that you derive a large part of your identity from the body. If it looks good to you or better than others, then it is a happy identity. And if it doesn't, it is an unhappy identity.

It is a very limited identity, a sense of self. A very limited sense of self, but for some people it is the main thing that they are concerned about. And then comes the mind.

So the body, physical form, that which can be seen. And the next level is that which cannot be seen, but which can be known. You know yourself, or at least the mind.

The larger part of who you are is not visible. The entire psychological self, the conditioned entity, all the thought processes, all the emotions that go with the thoughts. All the emotions that arise, come and go.

It's all the unseen you. Science, as it is at the moment, wants to reduce the unseen to that which can be seen or perceived. In other words, it wants to reduce everything to matter.

It doesn't really recognize there is anything unseen. It says, if you really look deep enough into matter, you will eventually find everything there. You will find the chemicals that produce the emotions.

You will find the molecules that produce certain thoughts. We just haven't found them yet, they say. We still don't know what a thought is, but eventually we will find that matter produces thought.

It's a by-product of what mainstream science believes at the moment. That matter, what we call consciousness, is a by-product of matter. Accidental by-product of matter.

I don't want to argue with that right now, but a time will come when we will realize that is an absurd misperception of who we are. And that the entire universe can be reduced to accidental formations of matter is also a misperception. But we can put that aside for our meditation purposes here and go to what we can verify directly within.

And you can verify that there is a lot of stuff going on inside you, thought processes that give you your sense of self. So the sense of self is derived then partly from the physical body. For some people it's a large part, for other people it's a smaller part of their sense of self.

The next step, you derive your sense of self from your mind and the emotions. Thought activity, the mental image of who you are, the self-talk in the head that you may be familiar with. The storytelling of the mind that you may know.

Me and my life. Listen to my story. And that's where it stops for most people.

Sense of self derived from the body plus the mind, which includes emotion, mental emotion. And that's what there is for most people. So you have body and mind, but where is the spirit?

Now for most people spirit is just a concept. If you go to church or temple or wherever, you may hear about spirit, you may repeat words that refer to the spirit.

But is that anything other for you than a thought in your head, just another thought that's added?

Or even one gigantic thought that controls all other thoughts? God. So far there are people in whom the mental concept of God has taken over their mind and has become the controlling thought.

And through that controlling thought they perceive everything else. They think that's spiritual. Of course what that really is, is what's sometimes called radical fundamentalism.

Actually a form of insanity. One thought has taken over and controls all other thoughts. And that is a gigantic ego.

And then you share that with other people who have the same dysfunction. And you have this gigantic collective ego. It's a form of insanity, not uncommon.

But anybody who is not yet aware of the spirit in their immediate experience partakes to some degree of that dysfunction. It might not be as gigantic and as potentially violent as the dysfunction in the fundamentalist or the terrorist. But it is a dysfunction when you only know yourself as the physical body and whatever your mind is telling you.

With all its conditioned patterns. But it's so easy to take another step deeper into yourself and also know yourself as spirit. And that's so simple as the question I asked you at the beginning of our session today.

As you look at me, can you sense that in you which is looking? And I don't mean the physical eyes. I don't mean what you are looking at.

But the energy behind the looking. The consciousness that makes the looking possible. And that is your simple presence.

I trust you are okay with stillness. To be okay with stillness you have to access the stillness within you. Otherwise it gets uncomfortable.

If you experience joy or moments of joy or beauty, aliveness, a sense of aliveness. A loving connection with another human being or a loving connection with another life form. Or if you have any creative idea in your life or anything creative comes to you.

All those things that I just mentioned imply that you have some access already to the stillness inside you. Because all those things, the joy, the sense of aliveness, the lovingness towards others. The creative impulse, the creative idea.

All that comes from that dimension in you. Now many humans have some access to that dimension. That's why they feel it's good to be alive.

And for most humans that access gets for long periods of time covered up again by excessive mind activity. And then it resurfaces again. It's not recognized usually directly for what it is.

It is recognized indirectly. So you may be aware that suddenly you feel a sense of joy and aliveness. Or you look at another human being and you feel a deep sense of connection.

So what happens there is that dimension arises. You don't recognize it directly. You recognize it as joy.

You recognize it as a loving connection or loving kindness. Or a creative impulse or a sense of heightened aliveness. Or the recognition of beauty.

You look and, oh, isn't that beautiful? And in the looking and the recognition of the beauty you may not realize that what underlies that, that which makes it possible, is that for a moment there was no thought activity. In your mind a space opened up.

That space, that is the stillness. And that is why you could recognize the beauty. Or that is why you felt the connection with another human.

Or a simple aliveness arose within you. So it comes spontaneously to you. There are some humans, quite a few, who almost never experience that opening into the alive stillness.

And their lives are truly miserable. Miserable. They may not even know that.

They may not even know that their lives are miserable. They think it's normal to be continuously immersed in the thinking. Isn't everybody else?

Now a deepening happens when you recognize that stillness directly. It may happen spontaneously in a situation. You're looking at a tree and for a moment there's no thought.

There's just the perception and the stillness in the background. So you begin to recognize it directly as the foundation for joy, for love, for also compassion, empathy with another. You can't arrive at empathy through conceptual thinking.

You cannot sense the aliveness of another human being through conceptual thinking. But only thinking needs to subside for a moment and then the sense of separation that's created by continuous thinking disappears in that moment. So I'm inviting you to enter the stillness.

Another way of putting it, I'm inviting you to stop thinking without falling asleep. That's one way, but that's not the way here. And this is the next evolutionary level for humans, rising above thinking.

Not abandoning thinking altogether, transcending thinking. Thinking can still operate much more powerfully, by the way, when it's rooted consciously in the stillness. Now if you're still thinking, this becomes boring or uncomfortable.

If it's not boring or uncomfortable, then you are in that state of freedom from thought. You may sense your presence, so to speak, the presence that you are, the essence of you. Sense it as a whole body realization.

Just a sense of presence throughout the body as you sit here. And that is a sense of heightened aliveness. And if you choose to look around, still sensing this heightened aliveness in your entire energy field, if you then look around, you see that also whatever you are perceiving feels more alive.

Even inanimate objects have a certain beingness. They are. Even a table, chair.

Even there, there is some life. They are called inanimate, which means, I suppose, lifeless. But if you look more deeply into the molecular structure of the chair or the table, you would see intense aliveness and intense movement.

So at this very moment, the universe, we could say, appearing as you experiences itself. Of course that's the truth. You are not separate from the universe.

It's an amazing thing. The universe appearing briefly as what we call a person, a cell within the totality, experiencing itself both on the level of multiplicity of life forms, which has included everything through perceptions, but also on the deeper level, the universe experiencing itself as the unmanifested underlying life. The manifested is the world of form.

The unmanifested is the formless one life. Timeless, that which preceded the Big Bang that the physicists talk about. The timeless one that did not cease to exist when the universe came into existence, but this timeless one that continues to be at the core of every life form.

That which gave birth to the universe did not cease to exist by giving birth to the universe. Exist is the wrong word because it doesn't exist. Because exist means to stand out.

Ex is out, Latin. To stand exist means to stand out, so that's all life forms exist. But the one unmanifested life does not exist because it doesn't stand out, it is in.

It is, you could say. It's being but not existence. No, everything that exists has being.

Being is at the core of each thing the unmanifested timeless one life. Don't think about this. I'm not using this so that you conceptually arrive at some conclusion, but for you to experience within yourself that this one timeless unmanifested life that precedes the Big Bang is the very cause of who you are.

And it's absolutely still. And it's absolutely alive. And it's absolutely empty and absolutely full.

And it's you. It's I. The one I.

Appearing as many I's and U's. Now you can only really become comfortable with the continuous flux of life forms that come and go and are born and die, are born and die. You can only really become comfortable with that when you are aware of the core of yourself as the timeless stillness.

Otherwise, the continuous birth and death around you is upsetting. The continuous gain and loss and birth and death and the continuous coming and going and change is no foothold. And we have the two dimensions expressed beautifully in very ancient Greek philosophy.

I may have mentioned before, Heraclitus, Heraclitus, Heraclitus, says, you cannot step into the same river twice because of this continuous flux. It's not, it's different water. It's, it's, pantare is the Greek.

Everything flows. Everything is subject to continuous change and metamorphosis. Everything around you.

He said that's the basis of his philosophy. 500 B.C. And then came another philosopher, Parmenides, I believe, who said nothing ever changes. It's all an illusion.

And he's right too. They're both right, of course. Heraclitus talks about the manifested world.

And Parmenides talks about the unmanifested one life. What the Buddha, I don't know whether the Buddha actually used that term, but I think he probably did, or whether it comes later. It's sometimes hard to tell in Buddhism scriptures whether they go as far back as the actual Buddha teaching.

The unborn is a Buddhist term, meaning that which is prior to existence, the timeless one. The unborn within you. So the wonderful thing is the heart of the universe, this vast incomprehensible thing that you see the tiniest fraction of when you look at the stars at night.

It's a tiny, tiny fraction of what's there. And even that's not just tiny because you only see a few thousand stars out of billions and billions and billions, but also tiny because of the limitations of what your senses can perceive. And the heart of it all, the core of it all, although on the outer level you seem pretty insignificant, and me, we look pretty insignificant when we see the vastness of the universe, but there is something within you that transcends the world of form.

And that is why the secret of the universe is in you. And obviously you can't comprehend it conceptually, but there's a realization there. And it's only there that there's deep peace.

That's the only place where you can find true peace. You don't have to be always a heavy person, carrying the baggage of past and a mind full of stuff. There is another way of being in this world, and that's to be the presence.

And this is all meditation. And even as I speak, you can be the presence because there's nothing to think about. What I'm saying is so simple that you cannot figure it out by thinking about it because there's nothing to figure out.

You can't work, what is he saying? He's saying exactly what he's saying. You can't say, oh, I'm trying to understand what he's saying.

There's nothing to understand. Stepping out of thinking does not involve further understanding through thinking. That may be a little insulting, particularly to those of you who are highly educated and identify excessively with the content of your mind.

That thinking is not the highest faculty in a human being. And that is a revolutionary statement that not many people in the mainstream culture would agree with because all they know themselves is as thinking entities. But once you discover that thinking is not the highest because you've touched something, a dimension in yourself that's beyond thinking, that is an evolutionary leap.

If you fall back into thinking, for a moment you've leapt like the first fish trying to leap out of the sea because they say life has developed in the sea and trying to crawl on land. That is you stopping thinking. And then it gets too difficult and the fish gets back into the sea.

There's a common belief that when you meditate your eyes need to be closed. But they don't need to be closed. It's wonderful to realize you can meditate with your eyes open.

Of course, what do I mean by meditate? Quite simply, being in thoughtless awareness, that's meditation. And as I speak and as you listen, you can be in thoughtless awareness.

Just a presence. Why not? You don't have to be always a heavy person carrying the baggage of past and a mind full of stuff.

There is another way of being in this world and that's to be the presence. And this is all meditation. And even as I speak, you can be the presence because there's nothing to think about.

What I'm saying is so simple that you cannot figure it out by thinking about it because there's nothing to figure out. What is he saying? He's saying exactly what he's saying.

You can't say, oh, I'm trying to understand what he's saying. There's nothing to understand. Stepping out of thinking does not involve further understanding through thinking.

That may be a little insulting, particularly to those of you who are highly educated and identify excessively with the content of your mind. That thinking is not the highest faculty in a human being. And that is a revolutionary statement that not many people in the mainstream culture would agree with because all they know themselves is as thinking entities.

But once you discover that thinking is not the highest because you've touched something, a dimension in yourself that's beyond thinking, that is an evolutionary leap. Even if you fall back into thinking, for a moment you've leapt like the first fish trying to leap out of the sea because they say life has developed in the sea and trying to crawl on land. It's you stopping thinking.

And then it gets too difficult and the fish gets back into the sea. But that analogy, of course, we need to forget now because it's not going to take us several million years as it took to the fishes before they could start walking on land and if that whole story is true, who knows? It doesn't matter.

So as you might have noticed, what I'm talking about is very simple because I'm simply guiding you into presence, that's all. But more important than the words is what's behind and in between the words. And we could call that spaciousness or we could call that stillness.

Doesn't matter what you call it, but you become more aware of the spaciousness than the words and the spaciousness is within you. It's there at the moment the stream of thinking subsides and there's only the presence left. If your mind still tends to interfere and take you out of presence, allow the body, your body, to participate in the meditation so that you become present with every cell of the body.

Every cell of the body becomes present. Now somebody might say, please explain what you mean by that. No, I won't.

It's too simple for that. Just sense the aliveness in your body. Anywhere where you can feel it first is fine, the hands or the legs or the feet.

And then the entire energy field that pervades the body becomes part of presence. And at first it seems that you, the consciousness, are observing the inner body feeling. But if you go into it more deeply, you realize that there's no longer a subject-object relationship between you, the presence, and the feeling of the inner body.

You, the presence, and the feeling of the inner body merge, and the totality of that becomes the state of presence. So it's no longer an observer and the observed. There's a merging of the observer and the observed.

So it means the entire being becomes aware. And that's a lovely state. Peaceful.

And then it's fairly easy not to drift off into thinking tomorrow's breakfast or next week's problems or last year's disappointments. And many other things that thinking is concerned with. My problematic life.

Somebody, perhaps it was Carl Jung, I'm not sure, said you cannot solve the problems of this world on the same level of consciousness that created the problems. So you can't solve your personal problems, which everybody has, unless you rise to a different state of consciousness, which is why we are here. And when you solve your personal problems, that a sufficient number of humans do that, then that will affect the world problems.

And that's how truly you can change the world, or to put it more accurately, how that change can happen through you. It's not you, the doer, who is going to change the world, but it can happen through you. In the meantime, there's nothing wrong.

In fact, it's wonderful to alleviate suffering where you see it in this world, where you feel called upon to help in your immediate environment or elsewhere. That's a wonderful thing to do. But the causal level of the world's problems lies in the collective consciousness or unconsciousness of the world.

And that is the only place, the consciousness, where deep and permanent change can happen, so that eventually you don't need to help other humans anymore. They don't need your help anymore. You can just commune joyfully with them.

So you deal, of course, with the effects of unconsciousness in this world. There's a lot of suffering, physical and psychological. And your focal point, even as you help others, your focal point needs to be this shift in consciousness.

So the entire body is meditating, so to speak, is present as you sit here. And you can now perhaps easily verify the effectiveness of a meditation question that was one of the favorite meditations of Ramana Maharshi, the Indian sage, and that was the simple question, who am I? He said, just ask yourself that question and go deeply into it and then see what happens.

Who am I? And a little hint, I don't know if he gave that hint, the answer is not in words. The answer is, let's see if it comes to you, who am I?

And you need to be, of course, alert and still after the question has been asked so that you can find out, who am I? I'll give you another hint, you can't think about it. Then you get confused.

And then you will say, either you'll say, of course, I'm so-and-so, of course, then you're certain, but you're well below the answer. Or you say, I don't know, I'm so confused now, you're confusing me. That's because you're trying to find an answer through thinking.

Who am I? What remains is just an alertness, an alert space. That's consciousness, let's call it your consciousness, but it's not yours.

That's your consciousness minus the content, minus forms. Who am I? And if you had, if somebody were forcing you to give an answer in words, the truthful answer would be, I don't know.

Because it is not through any word or concept that you can know who you are. So on the level of words or concepts, you have to say, I don't know. And yet there is undoubtedly a presence there that has no name and has no content and has no past and no future and no problems.

Totally intangible, formless, this was what Jesus referred to as the kingdom of heaven. Heaven, the vastness of sky, heaven and sky in some words are the same word in some languages. He had to find some kind of word to describe the spaciousness of that inner state.

So he called it the kingdom in modern terminology, the dimension or the realm of vastness or spaciousness. But it's not the outer spaciousness, it's the inner. But of course, all words refer to outer things.

The kingdom of heaven is within you. And that's why, as it has no content and no form, God called it emptiness. This is a question about unconscious people in group situations that draw others around them into their negativity.

I've seen this, especially in meetings at work. Yes, that is very common. It happens even at church meetings.

And meditation centers, when you go to a committee meeting, Center for Inner Peace committee meeting. I'm not referring to anything. I don't know if there's a Center for Inner Peace.

If there is, please excuse me. I'm sorry. What do you recommend that would help change this situation?

And while it is happening, is there something I could do or say in the moment with this person to get the meeting to a more constructive place? Yes. I cannot specifically say what you could do or say, but the most important thing is that you don't react to the unconsciousness in the other, because that's the easiest, the most seductive thing is that reactivity arises.

And the moment you react with negativity, even saying, why don't you just shut up? We are fed up with listening to you. And we'll see what happens.

If you can be free of reaction or rather reactivity, then something is possible. If you react, you are being drawn into unconsciousness and the same level as the person you're reacting to. So in other words, you become what you are fighting against.

And this is not uncommon. There are ways in which you fight against unconscious people or people. They might do things that look evil, but of course it arises out of unconsciousness and the fight without you knowing it, gradually you are at the same level as those people.

So that's very, can happen very easily. So let's come back to the meetings. So to be intensely present is so that your state of consciousness is one of intense presence as you look around the room.

So in intense presence, there's no reaction. And you see everything for what it is. You don't personalize the unconscious behavior of another person.

You don't say what a dreadful person that is. No, it's not a dreadful person. It's just human unconsciousness in action.

A manifestation of the current evolutionary stage of the majority of humans. That's all, nothing personal about it. Manifestation of the current evolutionary stage of most humans' consciousness.

Nothing personal about it. Oh, well, that makes it perhaps a little easier, but you don't have to tell yourself even that in order to be present. You're just present and you feel go into the body so that every cell of the body is alive with presence and you feel the aliveness in every cell of the body.

Because otherwise the body and the emotion that lives in the body will react to this person's emotion. It'll come from there if it doesn't come from the mind. Be in the body.

The body's your anchor for presence. And there you are as a point of presence in this room. And whether or not you say something or what you say or what action you take, I don't know because it can only come out of presence.

Or whether you say anything at all, or whether you just totally ignore this level of discourse that the other person is involved in and just continue presenting the situation, what we need to look at. In some cases, you completely ignore. In other cases, you might address this person and speak to the sanity that's hiding somewhere underneath the insanity.

You might address that, that might work. We don't know, but you will know what the right thing to do is or if there's anything to do in that situation. But it's vital to be absolutely present, especially in the presence of very unconscious people.

Sounds a little contradictory. I'm using presence in another sense. When very unconscious people are around you, then it's extremely important to be highly present so that you don't get drawn in.

And then something can happen. The situation can change. And so you represent a different level of consciousness there.

You can probably even, I'm saying probably because I have little experience with it, you can probably even do it on the internet because the internet is full of things that have come out of very unconscious minds. And so it is sometimes possible to just give your contribution as a conscious contribution that will contrast with all the unconscious, very negative or aggressive contributions of people, what they have said. Someone says something that is, and a few people will respond to that and it might make some difference.

So you're never attacking anybody, of course, in any statement that comes out of consciousness. There's never, you're not attacking anybody. You might rectify a lie.

You might rectify something that's totally false. That's a different matter. In extreme cases, of course, if the entire room becomes wildly unconscious, you may have to remove yourself and you will find the right, when the moment comes, you'll find your body is getting up and you find yourself walking to the door.

And it could even be that you never return to this office. If you live in a very unconscious business environment or office environment, then it may be a place where no matter how present you are, there's not much that you can do. Perhaps we can affect one or two people, but if the entire, the collective energy field, because a company is also a kind of a collective entity consisting of all these humans, and if the majority or all of the humans are deeply unconscious, then you have a company structure that is deeply unconscious.

And the company has its own, is more than the sum total of the parts that make up the company. So it almost has its own ego identity. A company is an ego too.

Even a nation has an ego identity. So a company has an ego identity too. And it can do bad things that the individual human, although they are unconscious, might not be capable of doing if they were acting on their behalf, on their own behalf.

But if they are drawn into identification with the, I hinted at that yesterday too, last night, I believe. If they are identified with the collective, insane collective ego structure, then humans are capable of atrocities that as individuals, as individual egos, they would not be capable of. And this applies, for example, also to cults and sects where people within the cult and sect, people are very honorable and helpful and loving to each other and give up their personal ego, but they have exchanged their personal ego for the collective ego.

And the collective ego, with reference to the outside world, is insane. So if you are in a totally insane environment, you may not, your presence may not be enough to bring about much change there. So there are certain environments that it is better to remove yourself from.

But there too, it's good to be, just to be present because then you don't have agonizing decision-making involved in should I stay in this company or should I not? For security, I should stay because it offers some kind of security. But of course, I'll be happy for the next 22 years until I retire.

Am I going to stay in here and be happy for the next 22 years for security and for my pension that I'm going to get afterwards? No. No.

I'm not. I'm not staying in an insane environment for the sake of delusional security because it's not even security because in 21 years' time, your whole pension fund will have collapsed anyway. I forgot to say hello to all the people who are watching us in different parts of the world.

And what parts of the world? I don't know. Or maybe you're in an office building right now watching this on your computer when you should be doing something else.

But of course, that's what the company says. But you know that you're doing exactly what you should be doing. Adversity is a wonderful opportunity because adversity forces you to go deeper.

Are you able to dig and find the foundation within yourself that frees you from fear? Certain actions take place. You do things.

You know they're not the optimal things to do, but you can't help it. It's something that acts through you. There seems to be some power there that makes you do things that you know are not right or not good for you, and yet you can't stop it.

That seems to be the case. And that, of course, is often the case with people who are... With you it might be many different areas of your life, but this is also the case with addictions, for example.

People who are addicted to a certain substance or who are addicted to eating too much or drinking. There's something that overpowers them in you that seems to obscure the awareness or the awareness is pushed to the side and this powerful thing does it anyway. And again, my answer is a little bit similar to what I said to the first questioner tonight.

The power of presence needs to grow in you so that it is strong enough not to... It's not willpower because willpower is not the best way of dealing with these things, but it's... What I'm talking about could sometimes be confused with willpower, but willpower includes the application of a force to hold something down.

Let's say if your addiction is to have a... to indulge in intoxicating beverages, then... and you can feel it, it comes on, there it comes, you know the bottles are there, there they are, and you feel you have to go there and you have to reach out and you have to pour yourself a drink.

Now, when you're not aware at all, you don't even know what you're doing, you're so unconscious that you're already holding the drink and you're drinking, then at that point you don't even know that you're drinking. The same with food. I've spoken to people who have had addictions to food.

They often say they wake up, they've already eaten in the middle of the night, they've already unconsciously gone to the fridge, taken out the chocolate cake, and they're already halfway through the chocolate cake and suddenly they're like, they hold an urge down that say, they have to pull, or even the example you gave, you want to turn on the TV and you know it's not right because I'm not here for that and he actually told us not to do it. But I can't help it. I have to go.

Now, willpower, you would say, I'm going to hold this down, I'm not going to do it. And I can feel the urge, but you're holding it down. When you hold things down, often after a while an explosion happens.

It's like a boiling kettle. Can't hold it for that long and then you have some kind of rationalization in your mind. But you do it anyway.

The mind will give you a reason. I spoke to a man who was addicted to food and his body was very unhealthy, he was extremely, dangerously overweight. Unfortunately he's passed away, but he was a wonderful man and he talked to me and often before he goes to indulge in excessive eating, his mind would say something like, you've had a rough day, you really deserve a treat.

It explains why it's the right thing. I'm not going to do it for much longer, but just today I really need a treat. Life hasn't been treating me but it's the only pleasure I have.

What should I do? It's all I have. There's no other pleasure in my life.

I'm going to the fridge. Listen, I attempted to be able to show him that this thought is a deception and I had a little bit of success, but unfortunately it was too late to save him. Well, he is no longer in the body, but that's okay.

He probably reincarnates now into the opposite perhaps in order to learn a lesson. Again, what I said to the first questioner, to practice presence power when you're not particularly tempted by anything and you're just in your room there's no particular temptation, go into the body, feel the body, feel the inner body, be aware, be present. When you sense perception, I recommended that practice.

Sense perception, feel the presence pervading every cell in your body, the inner body awareness and so that there's enough presence for when this impulse comes, you use it as, don't say go away or something like that because it won't go away, it'll do it anyway. The impulse comes, whatever it may be, and you observe, you realize it's not a good thing that it wants you to do and if there's enough awareness, use it as every time an impulse of that kind comes, this is your special spiritual practice. So instead of wanting to get rid of it, welcome when an impulse comes and see that this is a spiritual practice specially designed for you.

Of course it is. And so how do you transform this into spiritual practice? First you realize this is an opportunity for practicing and the first thing you could do is you practice delaying, obeying the impulse, not obeying it immediately but delaying it and you observe then, let's say when you wanted to go to the TV and turn the thing on or you feel the impulse or say okay, here's my next spiritual practice, I'm now going to delay the turning on of this show on TV for three minutes and during those three minutes you observe this, the impulse in you, you observe, it's an energy form and you observe it, oh there you are, there you are, hmm, do you feel it? It's like a little gremlin or something. And so this time gap can be a very useful first practice that you introduce a time gap before you give in and so you're not saying I'm not going to give in, no you say three minutes, during those three minutes I'm going to observe you and you shine the light of consciousness, the light of awareness on this impulse which is an energy form and it can be an energy form that is in you as a kind of emotion, it can also dangerously invade your mind and make you, the explanation I gave just now to a friend of mine, the thought comes into your head that explains why you should give in to this impulse that can happen easily and there too you need to be present enough, sufficiently aware so that you do not believe in every thought, especially those kinds of thoughts, you don't believe in every thought that comes into your head, you observe the thought because the thought is part of it and even to the thought you say oh there you are, there's the thought and there's the feeling behind the thought and you set aside three minutes during those three minutes you observe isn't that interesting, wonderful spiritual practice and while you observe you grow in consciousness, you apply consciousness to it, only three minutes, three minutes and after the three minutes see how you feel, it may have dissolved but probably not yet, it's still there and then you can see can I do another two or three minutes, am I strong enough for that, is my awareness strong enough and yes it is, don't believe, stop this nonsense, do it anyway and so you achieve five or six minutes and then what happens after that we don't know, it is possible that the impulse has receded, gone back to a dormant state and you suddenly you don't have to do it, it's also possible that the impulse has receded is still there and you cannot, after five minutes there's not enough awareness left and you have to go and do it but at least the five minute interval the time gap was very important and anything like that happens you always introduce a time gap for your spiritual practice during which you do not hold it down but you observe it so you don't push it down you observe, oh there you are so if it's a gremlin you don't say hold you down there's a gremlin you look at it there it is, oh now the interesting thing when you apply awareness to something the possibility of transformation is also there it arises as you shine the light of consciousness on it this is the famous example from fairy stories and so on the frog you don't kill the frog or do something with it you kiss the frog and the moment you kiss the frog it turns into the prince so the frog stands for this is like mythology there's some wisdom embedded in these fairy stories which by the way many of them were not created by the people who wrote them they were already orally transmitted over long periods of time so they are mythologies that often contain a lot of wisdom and there's certainly a lot of wisdom in kissing the frog which then turns into something beautiful so there's something ugly but you give it you give it an acceptance a love, you look at it and then transformation happens so that is the spiritual practice and after a while you will find that initially perhaps after the time gap you still do it but the time gap gets longer and then you may observe that the energy behind the impulse weakens and it subsides until next time but gradually it weakens and all these self-sabotage mechanisms then begin to gradually disappear if you apply the awareness to it observe them, there it is so think of the frog these are all the frogs there are gremlins, frogs that live in you as energy fields and the energies are trapped there they are not in themselves bad they are trapped like the pain body is an energy that is emotional energy that's trapped when the pain body dissolves it's transformed into presence it's like a fire you put a log into a fire it's consumed and transmuted perhaps is the word it's transmuted into presence and here we have again the famous example in middle ages certain philosophers were very interested in alchemy alchemy was supposed to be the transformation of base metal into gold through a chemical process and the idea behind alchemy was the transformation of human consciousness they have many images and so on they could not speak and write about this openly because they would have been executed by the church at the time so they had to hide all these symbols as if it were to do the transformation of base metal into gold which were not very desirable into something wonderful and that's the alchemical process of transmutation which really is something in the human psyche there's an entire long treatise written by Carl Jung the psychologist on alchemy with countless illustrations and just fascinating things but it's all undesirable initially into awareness into consciousness so you're lucky to have that tailor designed spiritual practice for you so it's wonderful practice that's your practice it doesn't matter where you practice wherever you are in your life you practice every situation every moment and the end of fear comes with that fear being a normal human condition for most people sometimes buried under something else fear in its many manifestations nervousness tension anxiety anger really comes out of fear stress really is a form of fear all many forms of fear quite normal why? that's all you know that's fear you don't know that once you know that also it's the end of fear because there nothing can be destroyed that's why the Course in Miracles starts which is all you need to know the prologue the first before it all starts it says this course can be summarized in the following words nothing real can be threatened nothing unreal exists herein lies the peace of God nothing real can be threatened and that is here because nothing unreal ultimately exists in the world of form the form is ultimately not real in itself nothing unreal exists herein which means knowing that lies the peace of God God of course is the formless, timeless, eternal, unmanifested that is both within and beyond the world and some of you as I mentioned earlier are able to step out of their mind and you can practice that through a conscious choice be present nothing to think about right now just be present you don't carry your you don't carry your history with you when you are present your life situation I use that word in Power of Now very important your life situation everybody has one past future relationships job, health finances where you live what happens to you and all your life situation you have a life perhaps you are here with you have a life situation of course you do but you also have it's not that you have a life you are life itself and when your life situation is all you know about yourself which is another way of putting that's all you know then you miss life now you are very good at dealing with your life situation but you miss life you do all the right things but it never really gets you anywhere because you miss life life is now and life is not in the doing life is in the being now step out of thinking into alert stillness if you can and also another way is not to completely believe in every thought that comes into your head realize it's a thought it's a position it's a judgment not completely identified with it it's a story that you are telling yourself it's amazing how many stories people tell themselves in their head but many are completely distorted it's not the reality it's the story it's how you see the reality the reality usually is much more simple and more benign than the story one of the early lessons in A Course in Miracles says you are supposed to look at things around you in the room and say nothing that I see in this room means anything this table doesn't mean anything this glass doesn't mean anything this hand doesn't mean anything this floor doesn't mean anything now what does that lesson mean? it doesn't mean anything what it means is it's attempting to erase the continuous conceptualization of reality like scribbling on a blackboard because whatever you think it means is a concept in your mind and if you deny the continuous and compulsive conceptualization of reality it's like erasing the conditioning of your mind and coming to the place where the Dalai Lama is don't know so this lesson in A Course in Miracles all it's teaching is to come to the place of spacious emptiness alertness not no longer trapped in conceptual thinking doesn't mean anything and of course that's another you're moving into a different dimension by living in this way it's just you inhabit suddenly life opens up and all the narrowness that the mind had imposed on it dissolves and life becomes spacious because you found the space within there's suddenly a spaciousness to life not a threatening place anymore what's life going to do where's my next threat coming from and again the same thing for example there's an entire spiritual teaching based on denying the reality of your story and Byron Katie's teachings is based on the simple fact of denying your story how do I know do I really know that this is true no I can't really know that so you get to get to the same place where the Dalai Lama is don't know so it's a wonderful thing if you can enter that not knowing and then but it's only not knowing from the viewpoint of the conceptual mind you're actually connected with a deeper intelligence unconditioned and if you really need to know something it comes but it comes out of the spaciousness of not knowing well it's a little bit like jumping off a cliff and then seeing if you can fly to the ego it's a little bit like that the ego says don't go there because the ego has worked it all out it explains the whole it has its philosophy of life it might be very defective limiting philosophy but it has some kind of philosophy of life every person has their story through which they interpret reality and usually it's a it's not a pleasant work of fiction but at least you think you know it gives you some illusory foothold and of course the ego thinks if I let go of that I won't know anything anymore which in a way is true but not completely true in a deeper sense you only let go of a distortion of reality created by the conditioned mind which is part of the collective human mind in its present state of evolution and so the collective mind of which your mind is part has created this human made world which is full of problems and they seem to be they pop out one after another when you think one thing is better now suddenly oh god now it's the economy and then it's that and then it's that another war what has happened through the gradual evolution of thinking is that now humans tend to overthink there is a lot of not only unnecessary thinking that generates unnecessary and in many cases non-existent problems such as when you lie awake at night in bed and start worrying it generates a lot of unnecessary unhappiness so people don't realize that a significant part of the unhappiness in their lives is actually generated by unnecessary negative often destructive mind activity and they don't even know it mindfulness is first of all discovering the simple fact that there is a voice in your head that continuously comments on your life or on what's happening around you it's the self-talk everybody knows what the self-talk is in the head you talk to yourself sometimes you talk to yourself in the first person I some people talk to themselves in the second person you so you can get annoyed with yourself and then you say you shouldn't have done that and then you have another thought that says yes but I couldn't help it and you might even get a third voice coming and whatever it says why can't I why can't I get out of my self-talk that self-talk too but it's an amazing first thing what I call the first awakening spiritual awakening is something very basic and something very simple it's a discovery that there is a voice in your head that always talks talks to you but mostly silently if it talks out aloud then you're continuously and there's nobody around then you're considered insane but and that's only if it's loud but most people have that inside their heads and they are not considered insane it's considered normal but there's not such a big difference between the two and sometimes when you when you listen to there might be a man walking in the street muttering and you say oh he's really insane but it might be that you are doing the same but it's just not out aloud it's in your head why didn't I I should have said that why didn't I say that next time he does it I'm not exactly know what I'm going to reply and it goes on and on or you lie awake at night and start worrying you wake up and what happens oh my god what's going to happen what if that doesn't work and if that goes wrong and what if he does that and on and then you go into you get drawn one thought leads to another thought and another thought oh my god and then the body the body cannot distinguish between an actual reality an event that's happening in the real life and what your mind is saying so when you have fearful thoughts the body reacts to every fearful thought but the and that's an emotion the body reacts with an emotion the emotion you feel in your body the body cannot distinguish between an actual event and a thought so when you think fearful thoughts the emotions you feel are the emotions that are saying I am in danger there is an actual danger here so you feel the emotion of fear anxiety you might you might you feel agitated and it's not it's not only not pleasant if you indulge in that kind of useless dysfunctional destructive thinking year after year after year it has its effect on the body and it decreases the ability of the body to have the energy to fight disease even mainstream medicine is discovering the connection between your state of mind and your state of health and so gradually we are seeing in the past they denied it completely they only looked at your body and not only at the they not they not didn't just look at the totality of the body even within the body they just looked at one particular symptom what's wrong with that particular organ and you have of course in mainstream medicine you have specialists I'm a specialist for the liver a specialist for this and this and that not only not taking into account the totality of the body but more importantly not taking into account the totality of the person which includes the physical body and the mind so it's vitally important to discover first of all that there is a voice in your head that indulges in self-talk most of the time and for many people interestingly enough that self-talk for many people is not always negative but for many people it is more negative than positive a good event that happened yesterday a nice you might have gone to a nice reunion or you went out into nature and you witnessed a beautiful sunset okay you can remember it today and think that was a beautiful sunset or we had a nice talk yesterday but you can't do that much thinking about a nice event but the mind when there's something negative that happens yesterday somebody offended you or didn't give you the attention that you needed that you wanted from him then you can start thinking of how oh my god what he did he's really next time he just said I'm going to say that or he's really sure why doesn't he you can go on for a long time dwelling on something negative much longer than dwelling on something positive seemingly a negative event is much more food for useless mind activity than a positive event and this is why for many people a significant percentage of their mind activity is negative for some people it is almost 100% negative but it is unlikely that these people would get a job in this company and I mean that because the your predominant state of consciousness your predominant mental emotional state there's a certain correlation between who you associate with where you find yourself and even what kind of things happen to you there is a correlation which is not always immediately recognizable but there is a correlation between one's a person's predominant mental emotional state and who they are with who their friends are what where they work and even what happens to them so if you are in a very negative state a long time you tend to attract also negative events but you can only have to find that out for yourself I'm not saying believe me I know it from my own life because when I first discovered this I was still very young I discovered that there is a correlation between my mind activity and what happens to me I found a I found a book that somebody several books that somebody left with us when I was 17 and there for the first time I read about a person's mind and I suddenly realized my mind was predominantly negative because I was a very unhappy child and so my childhood was not pleasant and so the initial conditioning of my life was that my mind was continuously commenting and saying how bad my life was and whenever something bad happened to me I had a phrase that would occur again in my mind that of course bad things always happen to you don't they they're bound to happen to you it always happens to you so I was talking to myself and saying that bad things would always happen to me and they did so you can discover first that the spiritual awakening is to discover that there is continuous mind activity and for some people it's the discovery that a significant part of their mind activity is negative but the vital thing is to discover that there is this continuous talk in my head which is considered the normal human state and of course you cannot abolish thinking of course there will be thinking but the question is is there an awareness behind the thinking if you can become aware that you are indulging or caught up in that useless mind activity and you suddenly become aware of perhaps certain repetitive thoughts that tend to recur in your mind again and again you might see it in others too more easily especially in others when you go for your Thanksgiving dinner I think is it next week you will meet your family members or relatives and some of you may realize you already know what they are going to say this year because it's the same thing they said last year and five years and ten years ago and if they have negative judgments about you or somebody else then it's the same thing you will hear again next week when you go to them so it's easier to see how others are caught up in repetitive thought forms not as easy to see it in oneself this is why there's a saying that self-knowledge is the most difficult knowledge it's easier to see others but if you can discover even in the midst perhaps in the moment of a certain thought appearing in your mind realizing oh that thought is I've had this thought for years it comes again and again and again and so there is an observing presence from there and that observing presence isn't a thought it's just the ability to realize that there is a voice in your head and that there are thoughts and you realize that some of those thoughts are negative and many of those thoughts actually are not only unnecessary but make your life very difficult such as worry so most people live with what I call a cluttered mind a cluttered mind means they are completely unaware that there is a continuous stream of mental commentary and wherever they meet somebody and immediately certain judgments form and everything they feel they need to immediately adopt a position towards it immediately say I'm against it I dislike it so immediately adapt a mental position and being identified with one's mental position which is a thought and a few more practical tips so that you don't get distracted too much while you take your attention more deeply while you're here take your attention more deeply into being or into attention itself purely practical don't turn on the TV in your room please I have not installed hidden cameras to check on you second limit your interaction the interaction with your devices if you cannot eliminate interaction with your devices completely and I understand that you may not survive if you do at least put aside just maybe once a day 15 minutes when you check your whatever it is that comes through whatever text email Facebook Snapchat Tinder it's all very important but there's something more important and that's why you're here if you so now let's see I suggest to you that you make an agreement with yourself that not to go there unless any more than is absolutely necessary and I mean if you occasionally you have you get it out and to take a photo is okay but also don't interact with things around you only through imagining what it would look like as a photo on your phone and then say okay I'm going to fully experience this beautiful thing when I get home and look at my photos in the meantime I'm more interested in taking this photo because that's what the as a species that has developed out of homo sapiens a branch species called homo touristicus and they they walk around continuously with either camera or things but then you see them every day they come in buses and then in the evening the homo touristicus goes home mostly and then you are left here and you might notice it becomes quite still outside at this time and the days are very very long here you may find it unusual if you come from a more southern place there's still daylight around even at 1030 there's still light in the sky so and then it becomes very still here so you can walk along the lake or just wherever you are and just become aware of that that surrounding stillness and as you become aware of the surrounding stillness of course you become still yourself and if you are still it means you are not thinking or very little thinking and it means you are aware it means you are present it means you are living through the deep eye so use nature that is around you live through the deep eye and during the daytime if you're walking and there's lots of there's a long weekend here and tomorrow is a holiday in Canada here so there's more tourists homo touristicus than usual and if you get upset by the fact that there's so many tourists walking around then you just practice this beautiful spiritual practice of acceptance of the isness of this moment and immediately you become still too without needing external silence complete acceptance of this moment including the tourists and you're still oh I don't know how tourists will develop in the future as a species in Thailand in just near Bangkok somebody they interviewed some near Buddhist monastery they interviewed some farmers and farm workers they would give food to the monks that's the tradition in Buddhism in Thailand in the south Theravada tradition of Buddhism the monks come with their begging bowls every morning they just stand there and then the local people come and put food they're dependent it's done on purpose there's a wisdom behind it on the western they would say why don't they work for a living it's the monks stand there with their begging bowls and then the poor people who hardly have enough who hardly have enough themselves they come and put some food a bit of rice whatever in the begging bowls and the monks just stand they don't say thank you because it's a privilege for you to give food to the monks that's part of the tradition so the westerners interviewed the farm workers they said why do you give your food to the monks when you have so little yourself and they began talking to each other well because we want a better incarnation next time so we are accumulating merit so next time we come we are born into a better condition and then the westerner asked so what do you want to come back as in your next lifetime and then they talked amongst each other and finally the agreement was we want to come back as tourists because they observe these people like they are they are out of their step out of their buses they're well dressed and some are obviously so privileged that they are quite big bodies which means they have plenty of money they can eat as much as they like so that's a great thing and then they do all kinds of things they they seem to have sex all the time and so it's a great thing wouldn't it be great in my next lifetime spend my whole lifetime as being a tourist they don't realize it would be a dreadful nightmare oh yes one more practical thing intoxicating beverages there's no prohibition here on anything there's just a recommendation and that is to refrain as much as possible from intoxicating beverages if English is not your native language it means alcohol refrain as much as possible from intoxicating beverages however if you cannot enjoy dinner without a glass of wine then you can have a glass of wine one glass of wine would not unduly interfere with the arising presence in you but two might and three will unless you're really already deeply engaged in presence deeply rooted in presence in which case you wouldn't even want to drink too much and you certainly wouldn't get drunk so as little as possible I recommend none at all alcohol would be great but since everybody here is spiritually advanced if you do have a glass of wine you will not be judged I'm not one of these spiritual teachers who are very unconventional ways of teaching for people I know of two or three that did that they give their students as much alcohol as they want and said drink drink up in order to observe if they can stay conscious even while they are intoxicated a very questionable practice but I won't do that here with you I think one or two are feeling sorry now so we've talked about the distractions on the external level television devices intoxicating beverages or other intoxicating substances I would advise against it at least here and never indulge even when you are not here as you probably know I've already mentioned I tried it a couple of times I have to because people ask me questions about it I cannot answer if I haven't tried it it wasn't that great I prefer my normal state of consciousness it felt a little bit almost oppressive but I can see a person who is tortured on a daily basis by their mind it can be a relief to have a smoke but here we have something better we are not falling below thinking we are rising above thinking and that is the next step in human evolution and as you rise above thinking you don't need to fall below thinking anymore because you become liberated from your mind in the dimension that is transcendent to thought so and another practice of course here is the daily moment to moment practice of um accepting the isness of the present moment just that's a powerful way of and a quick way of going beyond the surface self the egoic self which means stop complaining either internally or externally of course if there's something that needs to be changed of course you go to the reception or you make a phone call if suddenly there's water coming through the ceiling hopefully I'm not manifesting it by talking about it there's water coming through the ceiling and the mattress and you on it are getting drenched you don't say accept what is stay stay on the bed Eckhart said don't complain so that's that's not the practice but it does mean that when you finally go to the telephone and tell them what happened it's not done in a complaining manner that says how dreadful this place is how can you allow something like this to happen to me this is dreadful that strengthens the ego no you just explain what is and what can we do about it and in the meantime you surrender to the fact that you're wet so I'm not going but that's what is the dark night of the soul is a term from goes back a long time maybe goes back to the spanish mystic saint john of the cross I'm not sure if it does but it goes back a long time it describes something well the questioner seems to imply that he is he or she is going through something like this at the moment the dark night of the soul which yes I have also experienced that's a term then used to describe a what one could call a collapse of a perceived meaning in life an eruption into your life of a deep sense of meaninglessness and the the inner state in some cases is very close to depression maybe some dark night of the soul often to do with what is conventionally called depression but it is basically a sense of emptiness or meaninglessness nothing makes sense anymore there's no purpose to anything and sometimes it's triggered by some external event some disasters perhaps on an external level external rather than within the death of someone close to you could trigger it especially premature death for example if your child dies or you had built up your life and given it meaning and the meaning that you had given your life this is what my life is about your activities your achievements where you're going what is considered important and the so the meaning that you had given your life for some reason collapses so as I said it can happen if something happens that you can't explain away anymore some disaster which seems to invalidate the meaning that your life had before and really what has collapsed then is the whole conceptual framework for your life the meaning that your mind had given it and so that results in a sense of darkness a dark place but people have gone into that you're in that dark place for a while and then you emerge out of that there is the possibility that you emerge out of that you can emerge out of that into a transformed state of consciousness where life has meaning again but it is no longer a conceptual meaning that you could necessarily explain it is often from the dark night of the soul not necessarily but quite often it's from there that people awaken out of their conceptual sense of reality which has collapsed they awaken into something deeper which is no longer based on concepts in your mind a deeper sense of purpose or connectedness with a greater life that is not dependent on explanations or anything conceptual any longer it's a kind of rebirth and the dark night of the soul is a kind of death that you die what dies in the dark night of the soul is the egoic sense of self and of course yes death is always painful but nothing real has actually died there only an illusory identity now it is probably the case that some people who have gone through this transformation they have been through the dark night of the soul and they discovered that out of that a new self emerged that was a non conceptual self but a deeper being the awakened consciousness and they somehow looking back they realised that they had to go through that not everybody does of course have to go through that but some people do and they've even in some spiritual traditions they try to recreate the experience of the dark night of the soul in order to bring about a spiritual awakening and that was probably part of the so called mystery schools of ancient Greece and Egypt which were designed they even survived into Roman times mystery schools and with rituals and so on not much we don't know much about it because they were kept secret not much was written about it and in one tradition you spend a prolonged period of time in darkness sometimes even in a coffin coffin like place in complete isolation and darkness that is an attempt I would say on the part of someone who has gone through the natural dark night of the soul to recreate the experience of it in a kind of artificial more artificial way of actually experience that utter darkness where things break down and whether to what extent that worked when it's not a natural experience but a created experience for how many people that worked and actually did bring about an awakening and a collapse of the mind made self I don't know how it whether it truly worked for many people but it must have worked to some extent because the tradition went on for a very long time they are other in other forms of in mythological forms also they speak of similar things sometimes described as the the night journey in mythological tradition or also the descent to the underworld they all point to the same experience which is not ultimately negative it just seems negative when you are in it but it is part of a larger purpose it's part of a the awakening not for everyone it doesn't have to be but often it is part of the awakening process the death of the old self the birth of the true self so once you know that if it should come or if you should even be in the middle of it now you can just the more you surrender the more quickly you go through it surrender means don't judge it anymore you accept whatever it is it's your experience at this moment but as I said not everybody has to go through that for many people the awakening process starts and begins without that sometimes even after the awakening process begins it might still happen and then finally you will break through but that's fine allow life to do what it does you don't need to seek that and we don't need to recreate it in some artificial way so don't shut yourself in a dark room for days on end it's unlikely to work it's unnecessary the first lesson in the course in miracles says nothing I see in this room means anything and you're supposed to look around the room and whatever you happen to be looking at you say this doesn't mean anything that doesn't mean anything this table doesn't mean anything this hand doesn't mean anything what's the purpose of a lesson like that well that's a little bit like recreating what can happen during the dark night of the soul which is the collapse of a mind made meaning conceptual meaning of life believing that you understand what's it all about so with the course in miracles in lesson one it's a voluntary relinquishment of the human mind made meaning that is projected and you go voluntarily into saying I don't know what this means this doesn't mean anything you wipe the board clean in the dark night of the soul it collapses and in some spiritual traditions then you can actually you're encouraged to relinquish your conceptual reality and so you're then meant to arrive at the a place of conceptual one could say meaninglessness or one could say a state of ignorance where you don't things lose their the meaning that you had given them which was all conditioned and cultural and so on and you can then look upon the world without imposing a mind made framework of meaning I'd like to share with you a short passage from the Bible doesn't happen very often that I read from the Bible as part of a teaching this is from the New Testament and it is a parable that Jesus tells that is very profound and absolutely relevant to the present time so here we go everyone who listens to these words of mine and does them will be like a man building a house who dug deep and laid the foundation on the rock the rain fell the floods came and the wind blew and beat against the house but it did not collapse it had been set solidly on rock and everyone who listens to these words of mine but does not do them will be like a fool who built his house on sand the rain fell the floods came and the wind blew and beat against the house and it collapsed and was completely ruined so let's understand the deeper meaning of this everyone who listens to these words and does them means obviously anybody who listens to the teaching and practices the teaching and of course Jesus teaching is find the kingdom of heaven that is within you not anywhere else in space or time find the transcendent dimension the kingdom of heaven that is within you which is a deeper dimension or higher dimension of consciousness accessible to everyone and the man that building the house is you the house is you the floods come the rain comes beating against the house of course obviously means some form of adversity you encounter as you inevitably will in your life some form of fairly extreme adversity whether it's a personal level or as we're experiencing now on a collective level now if you haven't gone deep enough because remember you are the house if you haven't gone deep enough you have not found anything beyond the conceptual thinking mind then the floods the rain the wind the adversity whatever it may be in this case we know what it is will devastate you and even if you do not fall ill or contract the virus the fear will consume you as it's consuming millions of humans at the present time and why do you fear or does what is fear fear are certain thought forms you project yourself into some future moment and you're not present because if you were present you would realize that in this moment there's nothing to fear only when you leave this moment fear arises as a thought form which then creates an emotion so what does it mean then to dig deep and to find the foundation on the rock what is that rock the foundation for the house that you are you are that house and I'd like you to take into a little meditation now in order to illustrate and to enable you to experience it first hand what it means to dig deep for a moment just become aware that you're breathing become aware of yourself not the conceptual self not become aware of your personal history or become aware of some imagined future moment but become aware of yourself as the conscious presence a field of conscious presence and thinking does not help you there thinking is an obstacle so you go deeper than thinking and you can be completely awake and present and yet with very little mind activity and that is the beginning of the realization of your deep identity what I sometimes call your essence identity and your essence identity is inseparable from the present moment it is the timeless eternal present it is a deeper dimension of consciousness than the one that you ordinarily identify with and that is the meaning of digging deep and finding that unshakable foundation that is deep within you within everyone adversity is a wonderful opportunity because adversity forces you to go deeper adversity forces you to awaken to the deeper dimension of who you are why does adversity force you because life becomes almost unbearable when you live only on the surface the surface of sense perceptions and your conceptual mind and then you listen to the newscasts and you read all kinds of things and everybody's in a state of fear that is the house built on the sand that when the floods come the wind comes the storms come the house collapses meaning since you are the house in this parable you are devastated in a state of extreme anxiety extreme suffering although nothing actually has happened yet unless you contract a disease and this is something we'll talk about next time right is the house your house the house that you are are you living on the living on the surface is your house built on sand or are you able to dig and find the foundation within yourself that frees you from fear now when things are going well it's unlikely that most humans can't be bothered with going deeper what for if things are going okay I'm looking forward to my next vacation weekend is coming up and whatever it is a nice meal is waiting for me everything is comfort zone you're in your comfort zone I've never heard of anybody who awakens in their comfort zone there's nothing wrong with comfort zone enjoy them when they're there they last for a while and then some form of adversity arises either on a personal level or on a collective level minor forms of adversity and occasionally huge forms of adversity potential calamities whether it's you could suddenly confronted with the fact of mortality some great loss serious illness on a personal level or on a collective level war civil strife civil war financial collapse invasion of your country all kinds of things can happen and at the present time we are experiencing the so-called pandemic collective adversity not affecting just one person now affecting millions at the same time and this is an invitation to go deeper because if you don't you suffer unnecessarily millions are in a state of fear and anxiety but use this as an opportunity to either awaken out of the mind identified state of consciousness that continuously project itself into the future that you have no control over it is never present this mind identified state of consciousness that's the house built on the sand avoids an opportunity to come to this realization that you are much deeper than you had known before you are forced to go deeper because you can't stand the suffering anymore the unhappiness or whatever you want to call it the anxiety and so the most vital thing in any situation is the state of consciousness with which you meet the situation and you should pay more attention to that than to the newscasts and whatever it is that you listen to and watch yes you can do that also but what is your state of consciousness that's something you can do something about is not very much that you can do about the external situation you can take precautions you can help other people to the extent to which it is possible all that's good you do all the things that you need to do and perhaps many people are now forced to stay at home and suddenly they have to you have to be on a suddenly on a private retreat at home now that's an opportunity too so use this precious time that is here because it is part of the awakening consciousness of humanity it seems almost paradoxical to say that something that on the surface looks very negative and looks like an obstacle to the well-being of humanity and yes it's an obstacle to the well-being of humanity on a purely physical level perhaps temporarily yes but something that looks like an obstacle from a conventional point of view is actually an opportunity for you to awaken to a deeper or you could say higher level of consciousness humans don't awaken when they're in their comfort zone they awaken when they are taken out of their comfort zone not everybody does it's an opportunity if you do not awaken when you're no longer in your comfort zone you suffer you're unhappy you're anxious you're fearful you haven't found the rock now the difference between this parable and actual life is in this parable the man had already dug deep and he had already built his house on the rock and then the floods came and so on and the house was unshakable in real life often it is the case that the wind the floods the rains beating against the house which means adversity arising in your life the adversity forces you if you haven't already gone deeper it forces you to go deeper and so it's not too late to start digging now in the face of adversity many of you already in the process of awakening probably most of you listening to this and what's happening to us now is a wonderful opportunity for you to go deeper a deepening of that an acceleration of the awakening so as much as possible especially whenever you feel you feel as well drifting off into a fearful state of consciousness and a fearful emotional state whenever you realize that realize that in this present moment there is nothing to fear and you have to verify this for yourself whether this is true or not when you fear something it's of some imagined future moment am I going to catch this disease am I going to die is a loved one going to catch it is a loved one my child are they going to die imagine it it could happen but it's right now it's not happening so whenever you feel yourself drifting off into fear realize okay I have lost the present moment and I and I lost myself in my mind in the thinking mind and then the emotion reflects that mind activity so the moment you notice it okay I've lost the present moment I am lost in the mind come back into the present moment a few little things are helpful be aware of your breathing be aware of the inner energy field in your body the body is alive there is an this energy this life energy that pervades the body you feel that you're breathing you feel the aliveness in the body you're aware of sense perceptions you look around you're present and then you become aware of that presence that is inseparable from who you are that presence that is inseparable from who you are that's an amazing realization there's more to you than the person that presence is deeper than the person and you had you needed the adversity either to find it or to deepen that which you had already found it but it was not not yet a deep realization so this is a time of great opportunity use it don't waste it there's a saying that goes when the ego weeps for what it has lost the spirit rejoices for what it has found so what looks bad on the surface has a an essential function I will speak to you again soon in the meantime be here be present don't lose yourself in the mind don't lose yourself in fear find and be rooted rooted in this rock that is your essence identity thank you I always have a constant fear to try new things in my life because I'm afraid of failure since my failures in my life have dominated my successes I think you mean there have been more failures than successes therefore every time the idea comes for me to learn or to try new things I freeze and my path to any kind of achievement and the ability to get in touch with my inner guidance is blocked can you please help me to get in touch with the wisdom within me fear of failure yes that's not uncommon of course it's also a manifestation of ego because the most important thing for the ego is to the result of your action it's focused more on what it wants to get out of the doing than the doing itself the most important things in a person's life is their failures because you're more important I would say than the successes your main learnings and your main transformations you experience through making mistakes and failing the successes are nice for the ego but the spiritual breakthroughs they come when you fail at something so failure is not to be feared first of all it's it often opens you up to the spiritual dimension and takes you beyond your ego if you have the courage to do it anyway but also you begin to learn what it is that is right for you to do in many cases only by trying by learning through failing at this and this and this that these things are not do not resonate with what you really want to do there was a time i was spared quite a few things in that respect but once i applied to become a banker in the city of london the city of london means financial district i had an interview at a merchant bank how could i have been so misguided to seek an interview at a merchant bank in the city of london incomprehensible the miracle is that they actually invited me for an interview the only reason being that i was at cambridge university so they said okay we'll talk to him and so i didn't get the job that was very lucky because if i had gotten the job i would have been a dismal failure and probably would not have lasted more than a few months and that would have been a wonderful learning but it got shortened for me i didn't have to go through it i realized shortly after the interview that it would have been a terrible mistake but not really terrible there was a learning there would have been a deep learning in it later i applied for a job at a university as it's called in england a lecturer assistant professor would be here they invited me for an interview and that was after i'd already gone through a shift in consciousness but wasn't it hasn't wasn't fully integrated with my personality my life so i applied for a job got interviewed by five professors around a big table and i said a few things that might have given them an indication that i wasn't really into the academic world one professor asked me at the end of the interview and what do you really want to do that was an important learning so when i walked away from there of course i didn't get the didn't get the job luckily that was a learning i said what do i really want to do and i knew it's not this i didn't know that i would become a spiritual teacher because i hadn't met this first person on the park bench yet that asked me a question so to know what what it is that you want to do you may have to try out quite a few things and fail at them and then finally find what it is that you really want to do i talked to somebody relative of mine who hasn't displayed any ambition in his life and stayed in the same job simple job for 25 years and he said to me we talked about failure and success and he said i have never failed at anything because i haven't tried anything and it's true so he was able to avoid all failure by not trying anything but it does not lead to a fulfilling life and sometimes failure means this is not for me sometimes failure means try again and you fail and you perhaps try again especially if you enjoy the doing of whatever it is that you are doing but then the result is not what you expected but you enjoyed certainly enjoyed the doing of it try again let's say you want to become a musician now the ego may have an idea it might have an image you've been to a concert halls and you saw these soloists on stage receiving applause and you say oh i want to do that says the ego but you're not really you don't really have the love for music you have the love for being a famous musician so if you then start learning then you won't be the greatest musician because the love isn't there and if you then try again you still won't succeed and you try again you still won't succeed because the entire premise is wrong you have an egoic image of you as the great the final result the final outcome of your endeavor is to be the musician on stage that's famous and is being applauded and you go that's me this is what i want to be but in the meantime you dislike the practice and if you want to be on stage as a musician you have to practice five or six hours a day and you say okay i just have to get through this because i want to succeed at being a musician and whatever it is you practice and then you get stressed and it doesn't feel good but let's say you enjoy the practice because you love the music and then you go to the conservatory to get and then they turn you down they say okay i failed but you love the music continue try again it might lead to something else or either next year they accept you at the conservatory or it leads to some other kind of music does not require the conservatory if there is a love for the doing then failure does not necessarily tell you that you should be doing something else so and whatever it is that you attempt to do the vital factor is that you enjoy the doing and not just have a mental projection of where you want to get to which is often an egoic image of yourself over there that is the so observe choose things to try out that you actually enjoy doing without having an excessive focus on the end result the so called success at the end of all you are doing that is the success is to be aligned with what you are doing so if you are practicing music you are succeeding all the time if you are enjoying the doing of it that is success not some final outcome the world is full of people well not full but there are many people who have succeeded at what they wanted and were not satisfied by their success they are still dissatisfied and unhappy because the ego hasn't found real fulfillment in it was that it? so enjoy the doing seek out things that you enjoy then success being if success is the final outcome if there even is such a thing as final then that is secondary the enjoyment of the doing is primary I met a girl I was at university and there was a girl who worked there she said I asked her she worked in the restaurant I asked her what do you want to do with your life I said I want to be a brain surgeon okay that's funny why do you want to be a brain surgeon I think is the greatest the most advanced thing that a human could do that's what I really wanted to do are you interested in biology are you interested in the in the body in medical no but she had an image of me as the great brain surgeon for some reason her ego thought this is the highest a human being can achieve to be on the working on somebody's brain so to have to project some kind of outcome and not realize in the meantime the years in between how about and it's always you're always traveling you're on a journey there's never an really an arriving even the famous musician then has to there are other challenges there don't be afraid of failure ultimately there is no failure there's only it's a it's an essential part of your learning process it's only the ego that is afraid of failure because it it has certain image of who it is thank you this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation but the more grateful you are for what is the more things will come to you would really have chosen for yourself as your life purpose perhaps it's not even that great a job but nevertheless you honor it in this moment you give it attention you do your best and then it will evolve into something else

hello

[Speaker 1] (7:03:55 - 7:03:55)
hello

[Speaker 5] (7:03:56 - 7:04:11)
so unlike you with oprah i am bursting with excitement right now so thank you so much for having me and um i also just want to um give you a giant virtual hug oh thank you as i'm sure so many in the room would like to do as well

[Speaker 1] (7:04:11 - 7:04:12)
thank you

[Speaker 5] (7:04:12 - 7:05:24)
and uh my question is around manifesting uh i get twisted in my head about that because uh all my life i i have felt i have a purpose and the purpose is connected with joining and being of service and support and expansion of consciousness and i know it's out there i know that that's going to be something i'm very involved with at some point and i am familiar with manifesting and the deep knowing of you know what that is and at the same time there are a lot of spiritual teachers that talk about being very specific when you manifest something and i have no idea what it's going to look like i and i most of the time when there is something related to my deeper purpose if i try to go you know left and make that happen usually i go right though like it's the invisible hand guiding me right and i feel like well i'm not man you know what i mean so i don't really feel like i know i'm the right one to manifest my purpose because i don't know as high as my deepest self

[Speaker 1] (7:05:24 - 7:05:32)
yes so um are you manifesting your purpose in your life

[Speaker 5] (7:05:32 - 7:06:04)
well i know that it's going to be there i i in the sense that i've always had the sense you know once i retire in five or ten years or something that i'll be doing something else right that has to do with that and but i don't know if it's here i don't know if it's there i don't know what it looks like i don't know if it's working for eckhart teachings or whether it's you know working at a wellness center or participating in something i have no idea what it looks like i just know that that is my purpose

[Speaker 1] (7:06:04 - 7:06:10)
yes can you summarize my question is do

[Speaker 5] (7:06:10 - 7:06:21)
i need to be specific because all right that's so much of what the spiritual teachers that i was just listening to one recently right be specific when you manifest your purpose

yes for some people that works but it can also limit it um if uh if i had been specific i would probably have limited it sometimes the universe have bigger plans than you have and so um my first experience of manifestation which is a it's a form of spirituality to to manifest it's important it's not the deepest the deepest is to realize the essence of who you are then you can still manifest if you want to and you'll be quite good at it but it's secondary so for me there was a kind of spiritual awakening when i was 17 years old in the sense that i had always been very very negative and um always one of the mind patterns thoughts that could go through my head was bad things always happen to me of course they always do they always and they did uh and then i accidentally came across some books that at the time i was living in spain with my dad and a german woman had gone back to germany and he left some books with us they were spiritual a teacher who is not well known anymore a german spiritual teacher with a chinese name and um i started reading these books and they were about the there's a relationship between your external life and your inner state and if you change your inner state you change your external life that was such a revelation to me i'd never heard that before and at the time i was learning to type teaching myself on a type writer they don't exist anymore to type and i remember i copied practicing typing i copied many pages of those books and then i started practicing changing my thoughts and becoming feeling good things were going to happen to me i was not very specific because i didn't know what exactly would happen i attract good things into my life i attract whatever and then a few months later shift happened i was longing to get away from the where i was living with my dad and his second wife that was as dysfunctional as his first wife my mother with the living together i need to get out of here please take me out of here and finally i got a job offer in england without an interview it was a miracle and it was a good job and had virtually no qualifications it was an absolute miracle and the and i knew that i had created i had manifested that just amazing and one of the happiest moments of my early life was saying goodbye goodbye i'm off that was so wonderful and and in england things many things developed miraculous things that could never have expected so if i don't think you need to be too specific unless there's something that you desperately want or need but hopefully since you've gone deep enough into yourself there's nothing that you desperately want or need because whatever happens on the horizontal dimension is an adding on as jesus said whatever you manifest in this external life is lovely but seek first the kingdom of heaven said all the things that you think that you need will be added on to you so what he's saying is the world of external manifestation yes you have to deal with this world and it can be a lovely practice but it's an adding on and there may come a time when you don't need to manifest anything anymore things think i've acquired a certain momentum and it's growing the i've asked some successful people did you practice this manifestation before you achieved your sex and one or two said yes yes i did one specifically said i think he's probably told about it publicly so i probably don't need to keep his name a secret but i'll do it anyway just in case well he said he had wrote himself a check for i think it was i can't remember how much it was 10 million dollars something and put it in his wallet and he always poked at it and three years later he got a check for 10 million dollars for a movie role and he got it then i asked oprah did you ever practice but he said no it just came what she does practice is a gratitude book everyday she writes something to be grateful for or several things to be grateful for it's a very powerful tool to help you be present to be grateful means an appreciation an alignment with what is so that's a powerful thing that is non specific but the more grateful you are for what is the more things will come to you if you honor honor this moment then the future the so called future which never comes except as a present moment will reflect that mindset so there are others sometimes people just start an activity which they enjoy and then enthusiasm comes in and they do more of it and more of it first on a small scale and they continue, perhaps they are musicians like the Beatles I don't think they ever thought we are going to be the greatest in the world, the greatest group that ever lived they just enjoyed the music and then they played and played and played and that's the famous 10,000 hours of practice that somebody wrote about in a book that he observed many people who achieve mastery in one field they have 10,000 hours of practice and then at that point an additional element comes in that energizes and amplifies what they do and enormous inspiration can suddenly flow in so that is a good preparation to enjoy what you do is in itself a tool for manifesting good things and even if whatever you do is not what you would really have chosen for yourself as your life purpose perhaps it's not even that great a job but nevertheless you honor it in this moment you give it attention you do your best and then it will evolve into something else but just so the gratitude journal is another thing that we would recommend to everybody but gratitude do you do that or have you done that?

I've done it but I haven't been doing it lately

but I feel grateful it doesn't have to be a journal but it's helpful however gratitude can also be misunderstood people say okay I'm grateful because my life is I have so much that other people don't have and I should really be look at other people and I have so much more in whatever better looks or more things look at these poor people I really should be grateful for what I have that's not it if you're only grateful when you compare yourself to others who have less one way or another that's not real gratitude it's not really even gratitude for some life situation the more powerful thing is gratitude for whatever is this moment the little things of this moment for this beautiful flower you appreciate it you give it attention that's all gratitude an appreciation of the aliveness of the world around you in the present moment that's so on the whole I would advocate for less not necessarily too specific in most cases it would limit you there may be exceptions to that but non-specific does work very well and often the as you know the camel driver has his plants so the camel might have much bigger plants than you and I have found the same I could not quite have imagined the growth of the teaching I had some vision it would grow but not that much so don't limit yourself and you're doing fine

thank you thank you

[Speaker 11] (7:17:02 - 7:17:05)
it's a phenomenon on YouTube

whereby people often don't say anything but they engage in seemingly pointless activities modern technology which in many cases amplifies human unconsciousness is in itself neutral so it can also be used to help in the shift to a higher level of consciousness so if you feel you a contribution may be happening through you you may want to consider using a platform and disseminate in whatever form spiritual teaching of consciousness infinite possibilities possibilities if you're too afraid to speak maybe if you feel a little inhabited in front of a camera or your phone you could just do meditations gazing meditations make sure though you're free of thought otherwise it doesn't work there's no predicting how many subscribers you will get on YouTube or if that doesn't appeal to you you could become what is known as an ASMR artist some of you may not know what that is it started a few years ago I've spoken about it a few times it's a phenomenon on YouTube whereby people often don't say anything but they engage in seemingly pointless activities that make certain noises and that require the viewer's presence it happened spontaneously it developed, somebody must have started it ten years ago or whenever and then it caught on now there are hundreds or thousands of people doing it some very successfully the good ones have a spiritual dimension to it and there is a need for it in humans perhaps don't realize it that there is a spiritual dimension and that need is to get out of themselves to transcend temporarily the person or the personality by the act of giving fullest attention to certain sense perceptions which in this case is also visual and the auditory people are encouraged to put headphones on while they watch these videos and then you have people the people who produce them they may just have something here that they have usually very sensitive microphones and they may for example be shuffling papers for 15 minutes that make certain noises or they have a hairbrush they go or they make strange sounds with their mouth it seems very weird if it's done well it puts the viewer into the state of presence although some are actually designed to put people to sleep, so that would be the opposite the whole phenomenon is called ASMR, people claim that it produces a certain tingling sensation in their head and their back that is one phenomenon that happens, but the other that's not clearly recognized is that people become still while they listen and watch and they have a state of attention the mind there's a cessation of thinking while they watch and listen somebody produce these noises so that was just a suggestion for you

when I took the time to kind of go into me and to become silent when I started talking I first realized I'm talking slower, exactly as you said but also what I realized that my face so basically my face had been really before that it has been blocked in a sense the face muscles so when I first talked I must have done this under some kind of pressure or it was not natural it was me talking to someone but I realized the second time I said the same words basically that I could feel that my facial muscles were relaxed relaxed and no I realized that had been before so much tense and they started relaxing when I became aware of the fact that my facial muscles were tense before yes so kind of make me really realize that if one is not conscious we just run this mental thing the way we talk to people just without thinking about it and how artificial that is in a way so it's just like a machine talking

condition self yeah very good very good and that's a really good observation that you notice that your facial muscles were tense before compared to the second time and when we act from the condition mind so when we speak from the condition sense of self from the mind we do contract our whole body actually contracts and it's this almost like this squeezing and this anxiousness instead of just being you just being yourself into that relaxed awareness so Eckhart used the words intensity intensify your awareness another way to also look at it in which I teach in the presence through movement is and his is not wrong it's just a different pointer and mine is just a different pointer I use the words relaxed awareness because when we come from that still place there's something in us that just relaxes unwinds and we then communicate we be with people we be with ourselves in this kind of relaxed awareness something happens something arises the practices just to relax that body and just become that relaxed awareness so then we can make the right action from there and that right action may be no action just as when somebody was doing this when I did this exercise and with another group and they said we never even talked there was no desire to talk there was nothing drawing us out we just wanted to sit silently together so when we live from the conceptual mind habitually and it's a habit to do this just like it's a habit just it's almost like a habit to keep thinking and thinking and thinking our bodies will just go but in the moment of realizing yourself there's this Krishnamurti called it ease of being it's this ease I call it this relaxed awareness just to observe the world observe your mind observe everything that arises in this relaxed awareness it's acceptance when we accept there's no tension when we're grasping there's tension when we're wanting something when we are looking only for solutions through thought instead of going into stillness and allowing the solution to arise there's tension so really good observation thank you for sharing that

there's a sentence in I believe it's in the book the little classic by Saint-Exupery the little prince see that book and I believe it's in that book there's a lovely sentence that says what is essential is invisible to the I the I what is essential is invisible to the I now I stands for all sensory perception it's not just the visual so what that points to is that the essential reality is hiding behind phenomenal reality and you also every one of you and myself are you can't really put a percentage on it but let's just say you are 90 percent invisible who you are actually all what we can see is the outer form of you which is a physical body that senses can see but now we can even one could cut open hopefully not your brain or whatever and look for you there on a physical level on a material level with the most powerful electron microscopes and you would not find you at all that's the strange thing that you are you are not a material physical entity all the things that make up who you are are actually invisible and they remain invisible even if you cut open your brain or other parts of your body and examine what's there including your millions of memories where do they live could you find a memory that you have of your first teacher walking into the classroom when you were 5 or 6 years old there here she is hadn't thought of her in a long time but suddenly there she is where did she live all this time in your head in what form did she live in the form of certain molecules that are the memory of your teacher would you ever find your room if you had a room or the living room of the house that you lived in when you were 8 years old I could go there I could go there and I can even touch things still and feel that's what that felt like and there was that table and that curtain where do all these countless things live in you and these are just mind forms just memories not to mention the deeper dimensions within you but even those relatively superficial dimensions of just memories are all totally invisible and can never become visible as material entities so you are and every human being is almost entirely invisible all you see is the surface shell of the body and all your thoughts science we don't even know what a thought is and how it survives in you not really so it's all invisible and you cannot find it in the sensory realm and so the same of course applies to your dog what is it that you love let's talk about human too it's surprising that there are quite a few, many people who feel more deeply attached or connected to their dog than to another human being and I'm not saying that that is bad or that should not be the case because I can see how and why that happens because being is less obscured in the dog than it is in the human in the human the being dimension depending on who it is depending on the density of your mental emotional conditioning is obscured by that sometimes you can get beyond it and you can deeply connect with a human and recognize the consciousness that you share with the other and when that happens we call it love but with a dog it's easier to do but it's important to realize that what you love in the dog is the invisible dog although the visible is pleasant it's pleasant to the touch when you look into the eyes of a dog then you can there you can sense the consciousness of the dog so what you really love in the dog is the consciousness of the dog otherwise you could have a stuffed dog or you could have one with a have a little electronically controlled dog maybe one day they will have it and it goes but it's not the real thing so with a dog you look into the eyes and next time with your next dog realize that the essence of the dog is not what you see you can sense it when you look into the eyes of the dog you can sense the invisible essence of the dog but but only if you have some access to this invisible essence the beingness in yourself and as I mentioned yesterday probably the it happens that even people who normally don't have access to that dimension within themselves they feel drawn to the dog or the cat because for very briefly the dog or cat by connecting with the dog or cat very briefly it enables this person to have a glimpse of being within themselves and this is why I don't know if there is a little book that I produced together with a cartoonist and since I have a bad memory the name escapes me at this moment and the title of the book is Guardians of Being and it's mainly about dogs but I believe there are also some cats in it and it's based on a few quotes of things I have said or written I don't remember what and wonderfully inspired drawings that go with the text I call dogs guardians of being for humans because I have a theory that millions of more humans would go insane without their dogs their mind would just they keep they provide a kind of anchor into the realm of being so the realization that the essence of the dog is invisible and also indestructible and then you still love the dog but the excessive attachment to the form of the dog might not be that strong anymore you would still be sad when the dog passes away but you won't be devastated this applies now obviously also to humans when you connect we are deeply connected with another human being one of the most difficult experiences in your life is to experience the passing away of a loved one especially if it seems to come prematurely, then that's even more difficult and therefore it is advisable that at all times you keep alive within yourself the realization that this human being is essentially a being and the human is only a very small part and this human being is essentially invisible and what you love in him or her is invisible. Love is the recognition that you share the same essence and this essence, we could call it consciousness it doesn't matter what name we give it but that's what you share you recognize yourself the essence of yourself in the other how can I balance altruism and follow my inner needs or longings brackets if they would hurt someone can you say something on how it works ego versus altruism, following your inner true needs altruism meaning selfless action doing something for others and then there are inner needs or longings that might hurt someone if they actively hurt someone they are not true needs they would be egoic needs, egoic needs sometimes actively hurt another for example unconscious behavior such as diminishing somebody else verbally in order to feel one's own ego growing people do it all the time it's unconscious so if somebody has a success or has something that you don't have the ego in its absurd sense of self feels diminished if somebody else has something that you don't have and then the ego sometimes makes a remark that is designed either to hurt the ego of that person or to diminish the value of what that person has achieved or possesses so even children sometimes do it the ego already of course at school when you listen to children talking to each other you can already often detect very clearly the ego there the sense of identity that is based on identification with things other than yourself that you take on board to enhance your sense of self and you not that you can't stop them it just is part the natural progression I would suggest is for human being to develop an ego as they are adolescents in childhood and adolescence then when they reach adulthood begin to go beyond ego so that ego becomes a symptom or manifestation of growing up of immaturity that would be we may be going in that direction but of course the way it is now it's not the case the ego continues to grow and seek to grow sometimes until you reach your death bed and then you remember the gravestone where it says I got here first so I won that's the last triumph of the ego and so listening over hearing children you can say my dad just bought a bought a BMW what car does your dad have oh he has a VW but I know someone he carries on he says but I know someone who has a friend whose uncle has a Bentley it's far superior to a BMW got him the ego says I got him ah but it's owned by VW isn't it that's a long story altruism inner needs that hurts I just gave just one small example of hurting others other egoic manifestations of hurting others would be to actually to sabotage somebody else's success or what they want to achieve to take something away from somebody to spread rumors about some bad things about another human being in order to create suffering or stop them from doing or achieving what they want to achieve so many ways in which the ego would hurt someone for its own in order to strengthen itself the illusion of itself so those are not your true inner needs they are egoic needs you need to recognize those things in yourself then there is an indirect way of hurting someone that may not be egoic for example you let's say you are a young man or woman 20 years old 19 years old and your parents or your mother or your father want what's best for you they clearly have designs on your future and your dad was a lawyer and he has a flourishing law practice and obviously you are supposed to follow in his footsteps there's no question about it and if you didn't you would make your parents really suffer of course that is indirectly inflicting suffering if you are true to yourself and your longings which are not egoic you may feel inclined towards something else there's nothing wrong with law but it's not for everybody you may feel inclined to follow a totally different path would you and some people do that in order to spare their parents from suffering they do what makes them happy it might not be your parents do what makes somebody else happy and so you are doing something that does not corresponding that does not correspond to your true inclinations desires where you want to go but you want to spare someone else from suffering now that is not the most conscious cause of action because you are condemning yourself to unhappiness and frustration you are denying those deeper things they are not egoic they arise from a deeper level of your being and you are not making these people suffer they make themselves suffer so they have to learn their lesson of letting go of expectations and if their lesson involves suffering that's just how it is another matter would be if your parents are old or there's only one parent left your inclination may be to move somewhere and do something but then there's nobody else to look after your father or mother who needs somebody that is a moral thing that you need to become very present with to see whether there is an alternative solution or whether you will give up one thing in order for the love of another human being and if you do so you would have to be total in your doing so that you are not unhappy looking after your aging parent continuously regretting that you were not able to do what you really wanted to do whatever course of action you choose you need to surrender to and do it totally these are all a lot of presence is required altruism, helping others is wonderful but it needs to come from a deep not from some mental to help somebody because in order to improve the mental image you have of yourself but to help somebody because it feels right and it feels good and you've seen the other as yourself and to give something to another feels better more often than to give something to yourself this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive, to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation the most important spiritual practice is to bring together the stillness and the doing

[Speaker 3] (7:50:02 - 7:52:17)
I can experience since a few months better the stillness in myself and but I'm not sure if this is the full experience because I don't have that oceanic feeling, I don't feel myself expand into the universe or I don't feel myself being one with you for example when at the end of your last lecture you can feel that something unites us it pretty much seems to end at about my body so I don't know if that is awakening light or if I'm simply at the beginning of the process and my second question is when I sense that stillness I usually look in I cannot combine it with looking out or perceiving what happens on the outside or speaking to someone then I lose the stillness again and you also say attention cannot be divided we do we feel the inner body or we watch our breathing in order to remove the attention from our thoughts so that the thoughts don't bug us as much and so how is it possible to clearly feel stillness yet have full awareness of the outside that's the second part sorry I have a third part that you don't have to answer but that is when I feel that stillness I don't perceive any transmission to my body is there any contact point or any point where consciousness moves the body or affects the body but that is that's probably maybe nobody knows okay thank you very much

well thank you there are a few questions there but all connected with stillness so that's the common thread stillness it's already a wonderful thing that you are able to sense the stillness which is of course the temporary cessation of thinking that's really what stillness is so a momentary gap whether it's a few seconds or a few minutes in the stream of thinking but no loss of consciousness but rather one could almost say an intensification of consciousness you're very alert but still is that what you experience yes that is what yes now the rest is the mind comes in again and is asking questions about it and it might say as it does in your case which is not uncommon the mind says is that all there is there must be more I can't quite feel what some other people talk about that's unnecessary to go there and try to figure out mentally or from somebody else to tell that there is more you should let go of that really is connected to the desire of the mind to understand the stillness that's often part of that and you cannot understand it I don't understand it understanding understanding can arise out of the stillness that is true deeper understanding of certain things arise out of the stillness but the stillness itself you cannot understand and that's the very reason why Jesus described this inner peace as I think it was Jesus or was it Saint Paul I don't remember the peace that passes all understanding this peace which is the inner peace which is stillness you cannot understand it passes all understanding you cannot understand it understanding involves concepts and concepts is thought so the stillness you cannot understand in fact it is the stillness comes when you relinquish the desire to understand understand yourself understand the world when you relinquish the desire to understand then the stillness is immediately there and then don't fall into the mistake of going back into thought and say yes but I need to understand whether one can go deeper or whether that's all there is it is sufficient if you are able to relinquish your need to understand and that looks like almost a sacrifice but it isn't the most important renunciation which is a term that is used frequently in many spiritual traditions, renunciation you can renounce possessions, you can renounce position and worldly position, you can renounce money, you can renounce personal relationship you renounce your name sometimes when you enter a monastery or something in various traditions you renounce many many things and but if you haven't renounced the fundamental thing then none of these renunciations actually are very helpful and the true renunciation is the renunciation of thought you can still use thought when you need it for practical purposes but for awakening to a deeper dimension of consciousness, thought does not help you but is a hindrance then once you are connected with the deeper dimension of consciousness then it can sometimes the inspiration from that level can sometimes flow into your mind and use your mind in order to speak or to do something, to create something that is possible but before that became possible there needs to have been the renunciation so that you are not trying to understand this anymore that by Socrates said Socrates the Greek philosopher I am why do people call you the wisest of all men they asked him and he said well that is because I am the only one who knows that he knows nothing he in other words he was comfortable with not knowing not knowing is an interesting state to be in not knowing is really to become comfortable with the state of not thinking because all thinking is a kind of knowing or wanting to know so you become comfortable with not thinking which is not that you fall below thinking which is can happen when you drink alcohol or take certain drugs or all kinds of things can take you below thinking there is a longing in every human being to become free of the thinking mind because the thinking mind is so troublesome and so heavy and most humans seek some kind of liberation through falling below thinking a few drinks whatever else they do sensory experience or some there are many ways of falling below thinking that is not the way to go because then you go into unconsciousness rising above thinking is the conscious renunciation of thought when it is not needed then when thought in other words you are no longer looking for yourself in thought you are no longer looking for your identity in some increase of mental knowledge or whatever you are not looking for yourself there anymore and then the thoughts that arise are no longer imbued with a sense of self so you can think without egoic contamination of your thinking and that's great when thinking does happen but you are able to become still and become comfortable with not knowing and in that not knowing but this is not knowing conceptually when you no longer know anything through thought then suddenly a deeper knowing arises that is non-conceptual you may not be able to talk about it but there is a deep knowing there some people can verbalize it in some way because their mind can kind of express it to some extent and others cannot at all and so it always gets distorted the moment you talk about it so first of all then be content that you are able to access the dimension of stillness but the next step is how not to lose it completely when you start thinking again how not to lose it completely when you start acting when you start taking action in this world as you have to do because that's part of your question so in a protected setting perhaps you can be still you sit in your room close your eyes or look around and become alert and still, it's wonderful and then somebody comes into the room why didn't you do this?

I asked you to do that says your wife that sometimes happens immediately it's completely gone it takes just one little challenge I'm not talking necessarily in your case, just in general terms so how do you having a conversation with somebody discussing something let's say you're discussing there's somebody who says we are totally overreacting to the virus it's what it's doing to us this is terrible and you say no, well, we had to do that, it would be irresponsible not to do all the lockdown and all this and then you start discussing do you lose yourself in the movement of thought or are you able to when you speak in particular when you listen to somebody are you able to have still have this alertness that is inseparable from stillness so that you can introduce these alert spaces into a conversation that's a kind of spiritual practice one could say are you able to introduce these alert spaces when you're talking to somebody and let's say every time he or she says something are you preparing the next thing that you are going to say or are you already dismissing what this person is saying mentally or are you able to listen in a state of alert presence let's say the person is talking and you are if you are able to listen in a state of alert presence then you haven't lost the stillness, the stillness is still there and the amazing thing is when you start speaking again you are uttering something that is unprepared so there is suddenly you may find your intuition, intuitive realizations and there's a certain power behind what you speak because it comes from a deeper level, you're not just repeating something that you read somewhere or whatever bring in alert spaces of alertness into a conversation then that is a practice of so that you don't lose the stillness, another thing is when you take action when you take action usually you want it to be over already the action, you're going from here to there you're doing this or that it's easy to lose the present moment when you want to achieve something even just you have to go to the supermarket it's all your are you able to to be, when you take action to be, not to devalue the present moment not to always make it into a means to an end but are you able to just honor the present moment, every step you're taking now while you are walking to the supermarket or whatever if it's or well these days people don't go anywhere but you get from one room to another you have to go to the bathroom even that can be a practice, you take one step at a time so that the moment of arriving at the destination where you want to get to is not more important than this moment, this moment is actually more important than the arriving this applies on a small scale as well as on a large scale this moment is of primary importance because it's all there ever is so it's more important than arriving at the yet you're achieving your goal or arriving at your destination that is a spiritual practice also when you're present in what you do instead of losing yourself in the doing, then the stillness is still there in the background when you're listening to someone while you're having a conversation if you can be so alert that you can just listen when the other person is speaking then you're not losing yourself in your mind and the stillness is still there in the background so both when you take action and when you speak and when you think let's say you're alone and you're thinking are you losing yourself in your mind, anxiety thoughts, all kinds of thinking arises and the moment you realize very often the realization will be I'm unhappy I'm anxious why am I unhappy and anxious my mind is making me unhappy and anxious right now because in this moment I'm not being threatened my mind is creating unhappiness when you have that realization meaning you've lost yourself in your mind the opportunity is there for you now to direct your attention away from the mind and into your breathing or into the body for example you realize the futility of making yourself unhappy and then you decide otherwise for that freedom to come in you need to have already achieved a certain level of awareness because if you had not achieved a certain level of awareness you would be so identified with your thinking you wouldn't even know it identified means you are your thinking so even to say you can you can become aware of your thinking if there's not enough awareness then you can't but for you of course there is enough awareness you can become aware that you're thinking for example is making you unhappy or is creating anxiety or fear and then you have a choice now you can carry on or you can remove your attention from the thinking movement directed into the body so it merges with the body and then stillness is back suddenly and you may notice the mind wanted to come back in and pull it wants you to reincarnate again into another thought come this way you can feel the pull because it's been there for thousands of years the pull comes again and then maybe you lose yourself again or maybe you're able to say no thanks stay present this is for you and many others the most important spiritual practice is to bring together the stillness and the doing which really means the being and the doing and which really means coming back to what I talked about earlier it really means bringing the vertical and the horizontal dimension so that you have you exist in both dimensions instead of having them separately so that you're so this is the practice and the more challenging a situation is the more alert you need to be so when you are a spiritual in the process of spiritual awakening everything that is particularly intense challenge is also a particularly wonderful opportunity for you to become present through it and intensify your presence through it and this is whatever whether the challenge is what everybody is now experiencing or personal challenge collective challenge doesn't matter challenge can come as a difficult person all kinds of things can be challenging and that's particularly important to every challenge is an invitation to intensify its presence and then whatever happens is great because it can only intensify your presence so that's the practice I wish you well I hope it makes sense

completely thank you so very much

[Speaker 11] (8:11:39 - 8:11:40)
thank you

[Speaker 1] (8:12:05 - 8:21:48)
questions people have sent in and voted on everybody wants to know the answer to me including if if let's say we love all if let's say we love we all love each other unconditionally how can I decide who is to be my partner is this based on physical attraction isn't this a contradiction with this higher state of consciousness okay so if you love everybody unconditionally how can you possibly decide who is going to be your partner that's the question because it seems there's no preference anymore or if it's physical attraction isn't there a contradiction if you're in a higher state of consciousness then shouldn't or not be physically attracted to anybody is that the implication the question well the love we're talking about the unconditional love towards human beings and life forms is a let's see what is it that you love in the other when you love unconditionally you don't love their physical form you don't love their psychological form their personality the unconditional love goes deeper it's a transcendent love that what you love is not the form but the formless essence of the other and you can only love that when you can sense within yourself that dimension the formless when you can be still and present enough and then look at another human being then you can recognize something what you recognize is for lack of a better word the consciousness which is the essence of the other human as it is the essence of who you are consciousness prior to the consciousness being born into some kind of form personality which is there and the physical form which is there but in every being there is still the dimension of consciousness that is prior to form although the human being has become form consciousness has assumed form has incarnated so to speak but that doesn't mean that the formless and timeless consciousness is lost it's still there as the essence and when you can sense it in yourself you can sense because you are still and present enough from that dimension in yourself you can sense it in the other and that is love it's basically a recognition that in essence the other is the same as you but then of course there's always that is the transcendent dimension to every human being in addition to that transcendent dimension there is a form identity of every human being every human being has a physical form and emotional form and a mental form that's the inner, that's the personality so the physical appearance and the personality consisting of mental, emotional, conditioning and so on so there are the two levels the unconditional love towards all humans is the transcendent love you love the formless, you recognize the formless as yourself in the other but then you are still here as a form too and the form may respond to another form the physical, there can be physical attraction, it is not incompatible with the transcendent realization although some ancient or not so ancient traditions may tell you that it is not incompatible you can have physical attraction on the level of form you can also have an attraction towards the mental, emotional form of that other human being because it resonates with something in your own form so that means you may be drawn to another human being physically or mentally, emotionally because you resonate with that and then perhaps you enter into a relationship so different levels operate the transcendent remains it can become obscured through excessive attachment of course to the mental or emotional dimension in the other so in a relationship the realization of essence identity as I sometimes call it can become obscured when form identity takes over completely which could happen through the pain body which could happen through emotional getting identified with arising emotions and losing touch with the transcendent, yes that can happen but it's not incompatible everybody's challenge is to balance the two in their lives in their relationships to relate to the other on the transcendent level and at the same time if it's there on an emotional, mental physical level without the transcendent dimension in a relationship it's not ultimately satisfying and it cannot really truly work for long if the transcendent is missing completely in a relationship it's physical attraction and attraction between personalities is not enough to keep it going, it can be going for a while but then it becomes frustrating and you see more and more of the limitations of the other person and the other person sees more and more of your limitations which are always there and when you live together it becomes very obvious that the other person has his or her limitations now as long as the realization of the transcendent dimension is there that's fine, those limitations can exist within the space of the transcendent they're not destructive of the relationship now you may find with it's sometimes easier to have this unconditional love towards people that you don't know so well than people, easier than towards people that with whom you share a lot of past because they're the past the form identity of that person can be very powerfully there in your mind, in your interaction so that's the challenge of being present with family members parents parents grown up children and so on and of course as you know, Rumdust recommends if you think you're enlightened as a test, he recommends that you spend two weeks with your parents and that will tell you whether you're really enlightened or not go and spend two weeks, stay with your parents for two weeks in most cases that is a good test unless your parents are enlightened in which case there's not much point in using it it doesn't tell you anything

so last year I asked you a question about my two year old son Teddy and I look back on it now and I feel like I've awakened more because the the question the question was asked in more fear than presence and today I stand here and I have so much enthusiasm because my son who's three years old now, he has this childlike trust and faith that has not diminished from he had severe acid reflux when he was a baby and he went through intense physical suffering because of that since he was born and it was hard for me as a mom to be present with that because for a long time I didn't know how to help him but now he's three years old and now he can look in my eyes and say mommy, don't think be happy or oh your pain body mommy mommy I feel like it's a big irony because this whole time I've been thinking oh what can I do to protect his innocence and his childlike nature and his consciousness whereas the whole time he's my spiritual teacher and I feel like children and also elderly people who've gone through life have this innate knowing, they have a knowing and for me to have that realization and to dive deep within in that stillness that they have and to know how precious it is is the biggest joy of my life and so also my father has cancer and in the midst of my son having reflux and my father just getting diagnosed with stage 3 cancer I was looking on the surface, there was much suffering on my part and trying to be present with it but now, three years later looking back and seeing how my father has transcended his physical body and is in much greater peace than I could ever exude and as well as my son as well it's just a huge blessing.

[Speaker 1] (8:24:47 - 8:31:30)

Yes, oh thank you for sharing that and I'd just like to comment on some of those things very young people you mentioned and older people and you mentioned your father who is suffering from that illness it often happens if there's suffering at an early age like the physical suffering of your child at an early age can sometimes accelerate the awakening of a human being now this could be physical suffering or it could be other forms of suffering at an early age for example when there's a young child and one or both of the parents suddenly die in an accident or whatever and so the child is deprived of something that would be regarded as absolutely essential but the child is in deprivation early in life and again this is a huge challenge for a human being to have this great loss or physical suffering early in life but sometimes it happens that this challenge then generates the transcendence already at an early age it can also of course have negative consequences so then the child becomes an adult and then has to live with the burden of past pain for a long time until perhaps finally at that point more awareness comes in and dissolves it but it does happen sometimes that early suffering brings about already a very early transcendence in a human being and that probably happened to your son and that's just wonderful and then the child can become your teacher so to speak and you mentioned old people again there's a huge potential in old age that is still unrecognized by mainstream society and that's the potential of letting go of ego when you see the end of your life span approaching why hang on to this entity in your head me and it still needs to be right and still complains and still has its old patterns to step into no thought become nobody I would highly recommend not to wait until old age but old age is a wonderful opportunity for opening up and our society doesn't need to know what to do with old age I think it's just a waiting room you wait to die but of course it there was more wisdom in some traditional societies where they recognized the value of old age and the most highly respected people in those older societies were old people the elders because they recognized that there was something was just prior to the dissolution of the physical form somehow the psychological form was already dissolving before the physical form dissolved and the me entity and so humans recognized that old people would often become luminous in the last years of their life and wisdom would speak through them so traditionally you go to they go to the elders if they have important questions to ask because they realize there is an intelligence that comes through them that is not there in the young people who are still identified with their form psychological and physical form so old age is wonderful if you but don't wait for it, I would say this is, there is no need to get close to physical death to become present wait for that or what was it that Saint Augustine was it who said God he said something like God save me but not yet because he still wanted to enjoy the things of this life I want salvation but not yet so we have young people and there are more young people being born now who have a high degree of readiness for awakening so now and then we come to an illness that comes into your life like cancer and again it has that can also bring about the flowering of consciousness because it can also erode, we talked about it yesterday, it can also erode in you the egoic entity and so you time very little time left, you cannot project yourself anymore into the future you are forced into the present moment if you leave the present moment you suffer you become very unhappy so it applies to people in prison for a long time or people with a serious illness and in your case of your father this shift has already happened in him and that's wonderful and of course in you also without having to wait for old age and an illness so thank you

thank you

[Speaker 1] (8:31:49 - 9:00:01)
I've been working for 13 years in an office and I feel that my job is boring and useless I learned to surrender but I'd like to change my job but don't know where to apply how can I find out what will give me joy and happiness and a feeling of meaningfulness well start with where you are rather than trying to get away from where you are you start with always the present moment and you say you have surrendered but have you surrendered enough, have you truly surrendered so I suggest when you travel to work every morning enter the state of presence rather than drifting off into thinking so that your present every moment whether you're driving or taking public transportation or walk to work be there absolute presence and when you're at work do one thing at a time and bring in spacious moments as much as possible, they can only be a few seconds one spacious breath after you made a phone call two spacious breaths and then when you go to have lunch, wherever it is either you eat the lunch that you brought with you or you go to the restaurant or the canteen again present with every moment, so you use what otherwise would be a boring situation and just use it as the background for presence so you're not ultimately you're not looking for some satisfaction in the work but you bring a different state of consciousness to it so in a way your work situation becomes like a canvas it's just an excuse for practicing presence and so that is, and you're lucky that you have a relatively boring job gives you great opportunity for practice, if you had a very stressful job that kept you in a state of excitement all day long, would be more difficult so be thankful that life has given you something relatively boring and then you make it interesting not in the conventional sense of interesting, but you bring that the alertness to it so you're not working at the stock exchange shouting like a mad person sell, sell, buy be on the computers now if there's any stock broker wanting to ask me a question please do, that'll be a different answer I don't know what I'll say there's a way there to what it is, I don't know until you ask the question but yes use the situation and so that as you do that discontent disappears and that is true surrender, you say you practice surrender, the questioner says but if there's discontent, of course there's still not complete surrender I'd rather be somewhere else or the mind telling you it's been 13 years how many more years to retirement and then you start counting the years to retirement so you're losing yourself in past and future and you're carrying the burden in your mind of past and future missing the opportunity of the present moment because it's not interesting enough, says the mind so that's good practice and you may find if you come into such an alignment with the present moment you feel more alive even within the routine activities there is then an added dimension of aliveness that comes in and you perform even the routine activities with a greater sense of aliveness and it is often then that change comes into your life when you align with the present moment instead of trying to get away from it, internally align yourself with it so that any kind of no to the present moment dissolves in a no and so you're so aligned that actually power begins to flow through, that's why I call that the power of now, it's the power of life itself, begins to flow through you at first it flows into your routine activities and the way in which you relate to your colleagues at work becomes more present, different somewhat different some people may notice it, others may not and so gradually the universe or life notices that you are in a different state of consciousness and often it is then that change comes into your life either through a chance event or a chance encounter or a sudden idea or realization that comes into your head one morning in whatever form it comes or some drastic thing like suddenly your company goes bust, the company that you worked for for so long, suddenly they close down, everybody loses their job, wow you're free but you were free already because internally you already became free, so in what way change comes into your life we don't know it is much more likely to come in, but you no longer depend on external change for your inner state that's the main thing that you don't depend on it anymore and even if nothing else came into your life, you would continue practice until your last breath and your last breath would be your conscious breath and you would have fulfilled your purpose on this planet, in this form which is to be a vehicle for consciousness, to come into this world so you don't need to depend you don't depend on anything, change is more likely to come, yes, but the presence practice is not a means to an end you're not practicing, you say ok, I'll practice, but if nothing happens within six weeks, I'll stop practicing laughter laughter or the lady do you know the lady who a church going lady who saw she lived in a house and outside her window there was a hill that blocked the view of the ocean so just a little hill and of course if that hill hadn't been there, her house would have been worth much more, so because of that hill her house wasn't worth that much but in church she heard if you only have faith of go big as a mustard seed, you can sail to this mountain, move from here to there and it will move for you she heard that in church Jesus said and then she said, oh, ok I only have a hill there so I can let see and said, ok I'm going to believe that this hill is going to move and then tomorrow morning I'll open the curtains and see what happens so she in the morning she got up and opened the curtains and the hill was still there and she said oh, I knew it wasn't going to work laughter laughter laughter laughter laughter laughter that's the face laughter so to all of you who are bored at work laughter there may be quite a few make it into a spiritual practice a consciousness practice bored at work also means you're not particularly challenged at work and in the absence of life challenges there's always the danger that you fall below thought and you come into a routine where you what you think is acceptance but you're really falling below thought and you you go you go to work and there's a decrease in your sense of alertness and aliveness and you become dull and you go and sometimes you see people who've been working in the same place for a long time they're gone that's not surrender or presence, they've just gone below thought, not risen above laughter laughter if you want to learn about not having a mental self image watch your dog or your cat they don't they don't have an opinion about who they are they just are who they are how can I love myself what is this I don't remember ever saying that you should love yourself so is it bad to love yourself no, of course not is it better than to hate yourself yes, of course let's start with many people are uncomfortable with themselves they dislike who they are perhaps they dislike their body how they look perhaps they dislike who they are as a person don't feel they are good enough or are self critical a lot many people live with a negative self image which of course all consists of certain types of mind activity and that's not pleasant and it may be for some of those people once they realize that they live with a mind pattern that continually criticizes them and says negative things about them they begin to realize that it's a mind pattern this self hatred is a mind pattern and that it's harmful it's not pleasant and they can go beyond it and begin to replace it with more negative thoughts more positive thoughts about themselves and having positive thoughts about yourself that kind of thing which perhaps usually be called beginning to love yourself to feel good about yourself but it's not it's not easy that shift from feeling bad about yourself to feeling good about yourself sometimes it requires a lot of convincing I would regard loving yourself as perhaps an intermediate stage in one's awakening but the essence of the awakened consciousness is that you go beyond having a particular idea in your mind that represents yourself a mental self image that you relate to because basically it's ego a mental self image you think this is what I am, this is who I am if you want to learn about not having a mental self image watch your dog or your cat they don't have an opinion about who they are they just are who they are so that removes an enormous amount of problems from their lives of course they don't have the mind activity that creates a self image in their head they are pre mind and therefore their life is far less problematic than human life you can see how wonderful it is not to have a self image you can even look at an ugly dog or an ugly cat they don't have a problem with that even an overweight dog or cat they are ok no self image or a dog that has lost it's sexual powers it doesn't become part of the dog's self image, the dog says oh my god I can't father puppies anymore I've lost my male power, how dreadful the dog doesn't have a self image if there is no sexual desire there is no sexual desire there is no thinking around that nothing to do with me there is no problem or the cat can't jump up this fence anymore it's getting too old the cat doesn't say oh I've become useless now what's the point in caring it just is it doesn't detract from the self image of the cat because it doesn't have a self image so it's wonderful to live without an image of who you are because you are the presence you are not you are not the form that's a temporary expression of you but you are the underlying presence and when you feel yourself as the underlying presence you don't need to live through some mental image of who you are and that's where you go beyond hating yourself but you also go beyond loving yourself it's just being yourself similar to the dog but it's not a regressive step it's a step forward for humans you go beyond the mind made sense of self you don't fall back to the pre mind made sense of self you don't need to live through a self image of who you are the more presence that comes into your life the more you feel yourself to be the presence not some mental construct of course somewhere on the periphery of your mind there may still be some there is a little bit of a mental construct but it does not provide the basis for your sense of identity anymore of course yes you know your body is too thin or too fat but that's just how it is or this or that lacking there is some vague self image still there but it is not the foundation for your sense of who you are the foundation for your sense of who you are is you are awareness, you are presence and that's a liberation from the self image and that's wonderful so it's not go beyond hating yourself and then also go beyond loving yourself if you need to go through the stage of loving yourself because you cannot go directly from hating yourself to presence then do go through the stage of loving and then step beyond that and it's not as stressful running anymore and if you miss the plane what does it matter it's just you're standing somewhere else and you're sitting somewhere else but not on the plane and you're breathing somewhere I need to be on that plane maybe not is it really possible somehow to be present and work fast and nevertheless be conscious at the same time interesting yes it seems at first that when you are in presence it almost seems to people they are forced to do things slowly and sometimes I'm described as slow by some people close to me and it's true but sometimes I can be fast too there are occasions there are occasions when I'm quite when it is demanded I can be fast it's presence does not have to be slow remember the famous Zen saying hurry slowly hurry slowly translated into Spanish date prisa lentamente I think that's a good translation so what does that mean how can you go fast and yet be present at the same time it has a lot to do with the focus of your attention so you're working here if a large part of your attention is where you want to get to the result you want to achieve then you're working here if you said one can't really put it in numbers or percentages but I'll do it anyway so if 80% of your attention is where you need to be I need to get this finished and in the meantime it creates a tension in you there's a mental projection where you need to go and in the meantime you're doing this in order to get there if you can be more present and have 80% of your attention reverse it have 80% of your attention in the doing itself and 20% where you want to get to because you have to get somewhere then you can work fast and working fast with presence implies enjoyment of the activity and not being present usually implies lack of enjoyment of the activity and the rising of stress or to be working with distaste or some kind of resistance and that's not good for anybody it's not good for you for your physical body the people around you so you can practice with practical things or even pretend that you're in a hurry if you want to have just a trial practice pretend that you're in a hurry and you need to get these things or maybe you don't even need to pretend because it happens often enough in real life that you're in a hurry, you need to get ready in order to leave the house or go out is it possible to do what you have to do within that space of a few minutes or whatever time you need to get ready and do it actually being fully conscious of every movement and enjoy the energy behind it which is really getting in touch with your conscious attention enjoy the energy that's behind the doing rather than mentally projecting to the future do it hurry slowly is the meaning is what that means running the same if you have to run to catch a plane or a train or a bus or whatever you can run and be totally centered and yet run fast so it's a different kind of running it's a smooth more smooth less stressful running you actually enjoy every step of it because you're not excessively focused on the next moment and of course realizing as the Zen master says Zen is doing one thing at a time that's another way of pointing to this way of acting and working Zen is doing one thing at a time which means giving your fullest attention to whatever you're doing at this moment then you know peripherally of course why you're doing it where you want to go to but in the meantime and then you're running and it's not a stressful running anymore and if you miss the plane what does it matter it's just you're standing somewhere else and you're sitting somewhere else but not on the plane and you're breathing somewhere I need to be on that plane maybe not so it's a practice of hurrying slowly there's also a tendency in our civilization to create more deadlines than are actually necessary for good functioning of things I find there are often people create for themselves organizations and so on create unnecessarily tight deadlines that often do not allow things to mature and so this has to be done by tomorrow night why? and often they don't even publishers do that sometimes they bring out books some books have a slow time they gradually acquire their readers by word of mouth and so on and some publishers, many publishers say if not enough books are sold in the first six months it's never printed again there's not even given a chance there are some TV series that may actually be quite good and they have one run and say not quite enough viewers but it was so good just allow things to mature a little bit why the constant deadlines but you may be trapped in an organization that does that more likely than not because that's how this world functions so it's ultimately you may have to create your own organization or if the organization is flexible enough you may be able to create a different environment I'm famous for not meeting deadlines and the world hasn't collapsed for some reason but if I were an employee I would have lost my job many times or probably would have walked out unless I could have introduced a different way of doing things, if there's room for that that's good

Namaste

Namaste First of all I'd like to thank you for before I ask you my question I'd like to thank you for your teaching it has helped me tremendously I'd like to thank Eckhart the form for withstanding that suffering that brought out this teaching to help all of us my questions has to do with issues of abandonment and feeling of unworthiness for about four decades I walked around with a story in my head and the story was that I was abandoned life abandoned me my life situation had it so that my mother did give me away shortly after birth and so I grew up with someone else but I felt abandoned by my mother and then later on with more challenges of life I felt that life abandoned me even though I reconnected with my mother later on but I always had this issue so I heard of your teaching I read your book and then I realized I could have never been abandoned by life I am life all one how could I have been abandoned so I thank you for that thank you from the bottom of my heart I brought tissues but having said that as you know my conditioned self always came back to remind me of that so I have issues when I'm around people powerful people you're powerful but I don't feel like that around you

[Speaker 1] (9:02:46 - 9:02:48)
I hope not

[Speaker 4] (9:02:51 - 9:03:49)
when I'm around wealthy people especially like if I met the president you talk about the story of the CEO versus the janitor in your book and yeah at work I can talk to the janitor I feel like he's the janitor so I have a chip on my shoulder but when the CEO is coming I'm like oh I'll get the door for you so how can I stay present I feel like my ego has moved into that direction because I can be around here I feel okay but when I'm with those people I mentioned I lose it I feel small I feel insignificant if I could become an aunt in the room I would yes okay thank you thank you

you may remember I gave the example that is very much related to this in in a new earth about the the zen the abbot of a zen monastery who was waiting to receive the governor of the province who was going to arrive for some ceremony and while he was waiting to receive the governor of the province where the monastery was the abbot of the monastery noticed that his the palms of his hands were sweaty and so he had a lot of of course already a lot of self awareness and he noticed that okay the next day he went in front of his all his monks and said I'm I resign from my position of abbot I have more work to do and he went to another monastery to study under another master for a few more years and then he came back to the monastery and that was gone so what he noticed of course was that he was not sufficiently deeply connected with being he was becoming nervous in the presence of somebody who in the eyes of the world was important and that showed to him that he wasn't deeply enough connected with being the same what you described in my twenties I had similar experiences and when I met occasionally people in Europe for example I met I was introduced to a young man and they said he is the he is the great grandson of the former German emperor and I felt oh I didn't remember the mess that his great grandfather had left behind but but I had this image of him living in a growing up in a palace and I knew I had grown up in a one bedroom apartment with my parents so I felt smaller than him I was identified with form with position with the history of me I had a mental image of who that person was or is I had a mental image of who I am and I was still living through a mental image and when I compared the two mental images the one I had of him the one I had of myself the one I had of myself felt much smaller and insignificant than his and then the mind kicked in and said oh he would be if his great grandfather hadn't made such a mess of things this guy would not be the emperor or become emperor and a few more times similar things happened so there is still not the connectedness with being needs to deepen so that you can sense who or shall we could even say you can sense what who or what you are at the deeper level that transcends the form and this is of course what this our work if we want to call it work is all about is to take our attention into ourselves so that our attention and our sense of identity of self is no longer derived from mental images including mental images we have of our body or mental images that we have that are connected with our history and whatever it is our upbringing our social position they are all thoughts or mental images now most this is very normal for people to derive their sense of self from those things but it's extremely limiting and it makes you uneasy very often in the presence of others on the other extreme of that kind of limited behaviour would be that you probably don't do it, you could look down on people who you think are inferior and treat them less well and so you feel bigger than them and then you when there is somebody else you have a mental image that he is more than you, you feel smaller or you want to ingratiate yourself or whatever or want to disappear not be seen so this is why I mentioned in A New Earth to observe yourself to see and again self observation not easy it needs a certain degree of awareness you already know it but I'm just briefly saying for others to observe yourself to see whether the way in which you behave with different people differs according to social position and or whatever you want from those people, I mentioned the example in A New Earth is the way in which you speak to the janitor the same as the way in which you speak to the CEO of the company or is it different?

You need self observation to know that and that will tell you to what extent you identified with the conditioned me in the head so if you become still and discover your essential reality as the being not the human to use this terminology to feel the consciousness that you are, the life the consciousness that you are as you know you were never abandoned by life because you are life without life there is no you you are an expression of the one life so you were never abandoned you were always one with not more than supported by life one with life because if you say I'm supported by life you are still creating a duality of me and there is life somewhere supporting me you are life the life that you can feel within the consciousness is the consciousness of is life so if you can feel yourself as the unconditioned consciousness the awareness the presence, another way we used the other day here was to ask yourself what does it feel like to be you not the mind made you but the essential presence of you if you can feel that essential presence and then meet with the janitor or the CEO you will meet exactly the same person there is no longer any difference and you will never again feel either superior or inferior to anybody and that's a wonderful way of relating to people because as long as you are trapped in ego whenever you meet somebody it's very rare that you, well occasionally you might meet equal ego saying oh he is my equal but a lot of the time especially when you meet new people the ego immediately goes into comparison mode how do I rate relative to this person, physical appearance social position wealth, possessions education knowledge power how do I relate and then you kind of see and if you if you think you are less then immediately your behavior changes according, you think you are more you feel superior so you talk down to that person but it's this is a conditioned not deep way of relating to other human beings so if you the more you connect with being the easier it will be when you meet somebody not to relate from the level of position or anything else to do with form but to feel the being that you are which is precious which is like a like some jewel it's a most precious thing being is the most precious it's not a thing, we are just using language it's the most precious thing there is there is intense aliveness there there is intense joy, it is life itself then you can feel that and you will no longer be better or not as good as the other you can relate to the other as a human being a very important thing in decision making process is not to come up with a decision but to ask the right question now it's very easy to mistake an impulse that comes to you for some deeper answer that comes out of the stillness and so in any decision making process you have basically two factors well, most people only have you have the information that's available to you and so make sure that you have the information or the facts that you need sometimes before making a decision you may have a few, a number of facts and sometimes these facts may not be sufficient, so then you go within and see what questions you can ask in order to elicit more facts or information from whoever is capable of giving to you that information I'm talking very general terms whether you're in business or wherever you are or some personal decision that you need to arrive at, on one level facts need to be looked at what is the situation and sometimes the facts are not clear enough or you have not enough facts and you become still and see what questions you can ask somebody may be able to supply more detailed facts but in order to ask the right question you already need a moment of stillness so you may not immediately get an answer through stillness the first step as you become alert and still is another question a very important thing in decision making process is not to come up with a decision but to ask the right question that can elicit what you need in order to arrive at a decision and in order to ask the right question there needs to be that alert stillness for a moment and in that alert stillness you kind of listen within and then a question comes, this is often when somebody call me and say we've had this or that offer, somebody wants you to do this, somebody wants you to do that interview, somebody wants to do that, very often I don't immediately say yes or no, I usually come up with a few questions in addition to the information that they gave me well what about that and that and that and they say oh ok, I'll get back to you I'll find out then they call again, then I know a bit more and sometimes on the basis of the factual information you already know whether you want to do it or not you more easily know that you don't want to do it just by looking at the facts but it may well be that you have all the facts and you're still not clear what the right course of action is so you've exhausted the avenue of asking more questions probably, unless something else comes to you and then it's usually a question of becoming still and that's the added dimension to the decision making process it works together with looking at the knowledge that you have in the mind conceptual knowledge factual knowledge works in conjunction with a deeper intuitive knowing and you bring the two together it's not just the intuitive and in the end you completely disregard the facts so even with your bringing your ex-girlfriend it's a relatively simple thing perhaps there was an impulse that or some believe that you should obey your impulses now and just do it but you didn't and you also have some knowledge in your mind about what kind of a person she is what your relationship was like, how it ended how she might react these are factors that you also consider is it a wise thing to do just on the level of thinking, you think about it and then you go within become still an impulse to do something does not necessarily come from the deepest level it could be an emotional impulse it could be an impulse created by the ego to see itself as very spiritual that you reconnect with her many different levels it could come from also it's good to deal sometimes it's good in this case where immediate action is not required if you delay it a little bit, wait a day and see if the next day you still feel the same or the day after because in this case for example, immediate action is not required so it's often helpful to know whether something is real comes from the deepest level give it some time, if it's still there tomorrow or next week it's more likely to be true and come from the deepest level an impulse can dissolve very quickly an impulse came to me many years ago as I've told before on various occasions when I lived in England in the country one morning not an impulse but a strong knowing was there that for some reason I had to move to the west coast of North America but I didn't know why but I didn't immediately pick up the phone and make a reservation and sell everything I have I waited and days passed and every day that was still there several weeks passed and it was still there and then I couldn't I knew this I had to do it was not a temporary impulse or an idea that came into my mind it came from a deeper level if I had not obeyed it probably I would have fallen ill or something would have gone very wrong because I would not have gone with that deeper flow where the universe wanted to move me so if there is time give it time and if something is still there after a few days or even a few weeks then it probably comes from the deeper level so in many cases it's a question of balancing factual knowledge and going beyond factual knowledge and again to repeat sometimes factual knowledge is all you need and it's immediately very clear from just looking at the facts that this for example is not feasible at other times the mind could create prematurely the idea that this cannot be done because nobody has done it before and might be wrong so don't be too certain that when the mind says no you really have to be very clear and if you are not totally clear go within so what's your add on?

With regards to choosing spiritual practice, for about 25 years I've had different regular practices and I step back and go gosh have I really made any progress and is my lack of progress from not sticking with just one, be it Goenka Vipassana or Tibetan, whatever and I know sometimes in a practice we go through darkness and that it's good to push on through to the other side and sometimes there's no other side, you're just going into more and more darkness, it's the wrong direction could you recommend on how to decide what is the right practice? The right practice underlying any practice is presence, no matter the externals of the practice may be different but what every practice points to and eventually if it succeeds and you end up with is presence remember our definition I quoted Ramana Maharshi when he was asked how do we know, because that's your question, whether we are making any progress on the spiritual path and of course you may remember his answer the degree of absence of thinking is your criterion for judging progress on the spiritual path, that's all, so to what extent is there space in you a cessation of thinking when it's not needed, rising moments of spaciousness as you evolve spiritually the spaciousness deepens and there's more of it so that eventually half of you is spaciousness don't take it too literally half of you is spaciousness and half of you is form mind, knowledge and so on if half of you is spaciousness and half of you is form you would lead a very balanced life and it could be that as in the case of Ramana Maharshi when he was a young boy and he just had the death experience he became 90% spaciousness and he couldn't talk anymore and he still had a body that's the 10% and he sat somewhere but then he came back to well very few humans are actually it's hard to quantify anyway I'm just, it's more or less speaking metaphorically very few humans are totally balanced between moving in the world of form using their mind and their knowledge and interacting and being busy and active in the world of form and at the same time not losing the deeper dimension of presence so not having two separate compartments in your life some spiritual practitioners meditators develop two compartments my spiritual practice which they do when they meditate or go on boot camp retreats and then my daily life of course the two need to come together so that your spiritual dimension shines through all the things that you do.

In other words everything you do there's spaciousness there's a sense of peace that comes even while you're engaged in activities you don't get frantic and upset about every little thing there's a spaciousness in your human interactions a sense of presence that pervades even your business dealings that is what Ramana Maharshi means when he talks of to be free of thinking that spaciousness are moments when you're just alert and present even while conducting a business there's an alertness and a presence and then you become more creative. The person who created the iPhone the main Steve Jobs I haven't read his entire biography and he had certain personal idiosyncrasies which were very much egoic conditioning but apart from his egoic conditioning he had areas he was a practitioner of I believe of Zen and meditation he had these areas of stillness out of those came the creativity so he did not represent a complete balanced coming together of very few people have that a complete balanced coming together of spaciousness and form and you don't have to achieve that I don't have it I don't have 50% effectiveness in form and 50% spaciousness I have I'm just taking a figure 80-85% spaciousness and 20-15% form in other words I'm not that great at dealing with stuff when I do I'm spacious with it my preference is not to so I'm not that balanced Oprah is much more balanced than I am she is very effective in doing has seemingly inexhaustible energy I can't keep up with her and yet she does always return to stillness so she doesn't lose herself in the doing and there are some people but not many Oprah is a bit more in the doing than the being but there's still enough being to keep her rooted and to make her work fruitful and contribute a lot to the consciousness of the planet

[Speaker 11] (9:28:38 - 9:29:21)
I don't really have a formulated question but I'd like to hear you talk for a second it's kind of been hinted at here and there but talk more specifically about the the situation of the planet, the ecological situation, you know, without panicking, without getting self-righteous and all these other things clearly a change of consciousness is necessary but things also have to be done in real time because these are processes happening in time and so just if you had anything at all to say about that and how these two processes of consciousness and also changing things, doing whatever would be necessary for the planet how this works together

yes, thank you are you engaged in that kind of work?

to some extent and hoping to be more well one thing, as you know, I don't need to say it again, the foundation for any action you take is to be let it arise from presence rather than from a feeling of fear or anger because those two are not very productive what comes out of fear or anger is not productive presence is much more powerful there's an enormous power in presence and true intelligence intelligent, really intelligent action comes out of presence so that's vital to know there are many things that need changing in our relationship with the planet things seem to be going the wrong way right now all I can say is do as much as you can to help change the way in which we live on this planet, do what you can, with peace in your heart that's the main thing, with peace in your heart, because otherwise without peace, the opposite of peace is war and conflict so if we don't destroy the planet, we destroy ourselves through war and conflict the planet there's more to the planet this is my intuitive realization by the way there's more to the planet than we realize the planet is a being it's not a rock floating in space with things growing on top the planet is a living being that many humans or scientists cannot accept what I mean is it is pervaded by an intelligent energy field in the same way that your body is pervaded and held together and run by an underlying intelligence that keeps everything the thousands of functions in your body because the planet is another kind of body the thousands of functions that need to be constantly coordinated and controlled that keep this body alive, keep the atoms and molecules together, keep the organs from cooperating no human or the greatest computer could possibly do that even now we only understand a fraction of how our physical body operates there's a vast intelligence built into it when that intelligence says goodbye then very quickly the atoms and molecules say goodbye to each other too and then they depart and then the form dissolves the planet is also an intelligence a being that is intelligent and it has produced us in a way, not alone there have been other factors the sun is also more than a fireball we think the sun is a ball of just energy there's more to it than that we think the sun is extremely hot well hot is one way but really what that means is the energy of the highest intensity which our physical body register as extreme heat the sun is also a celestial being you don't need to believe me by the way maybe I'll just tell you what my intuitive realization is and the planet has an intelligence also that we need to one reason why we need to be active in protecting the planet so that we don't use these absurd ways of the resources of the planet, the absurd ways of getting energy that needs to, we need to go beyond that there are other ways, the universe is infinitely abundant the energy on the external level the energy obviously inexhaustible energy comes continuously from the sun, and all the other energy forms that we discover on the planet are really transformed sun energy it was once sun energy so, and to use those is a very primitive way of using energy and we need to as soon as possible and this is the task of scientists and so on who also need to be present to go beyond those primitive ways of using the energy that's left over by sun energy on the planet the planet if we do not take action, I do not believe that the planet will become destroyed but we will destroy ourselves or the planet which has an intelligence but is just slow, because to a planet 100 years is nothing 200 years is nothing one second in your lifetime or less the planet, if the planet feels threatened by by humans I firmly believe that it will eliminate humans it can do that very easily we are because we are connected our physical form is connected to the energy field of the planet it's come out of the planet so the planet could easily even without violence, the planet could end all humans within 100 years without any act of violence by simply making males and females infertile that would be an action taken by planetary intelligence, say these humans we can't have them anymore that's too much or let's just get rid of 95% of them and then they can have a new beginning and can try again but it doesn't have to come to that so before the planet takes action if the planet is slow we need to take action but with peace because otherwise we are unconscious beings, we'll just contribute even if in our unconscious action we could save the planet, we still wouldn't save ourselves, because we would create warfare if we are unconscious there are many ways we can destroy ourselves not just through destroying nature there are other ways we can destroy ourselves and we will if the shift in consciousness does not reach a sufficient number of people but the essence of what I'm saying is peace in your heart do not fear there's more to the planet than you realize if the planet needs to get rid of you it will

as a trauma surgeon

[Speaker 10] (9:38:29 - 9:39:24)
South Africa, working in Somalia I encounter and help victims of the suicide bombings and you tell us when we are dealing with pain body when the pain body is too big we need to retreat how can we as a collective deal with such severe pain body and it's really a collective question because we face it September 11 Boko Haram, ISIS so your comment just comments on something like enlightened military defense, I know it might be an oxymoron but sometimes as a collective we need to defend ourselves when the unconsciousness is so bad that you prepare to strap bombs to yourself and going

yes, well certainly thank you

[Speaker 10] (9:39:29 - 9:39:30)
thank you

[Speaker 1] (9:39:35 - 9:46:53)
certainly there are extreme manifestations of unconsciousness and it is sometimes necessary to defend yourself against that in the right way so we all know that in the past when for example 9-11 happened the reaction to 9-11 was not to put it mildly the most wise thing that could have happened in fact it made everything infinitely worse because that was not a defense, it was an overreaction of the ego in the absence of complete absence of even the slightest trace of wisdom and insight and repercussions not to mention other cultures and so on so we the unconsciousness that we see being perpetrated in those parts of the world is connected to the unconsciousness of the reaction to 9-11 of course everything is connected it's not there is not one entity to blame but the unconscious affects not only one area of human culture or one religion it manifests in different ways even in seemingly more conscious places like here politicians were extremely unconscious at the time and that opened the gates of hell and amplified the latent unconsciousness that was there in millions of other human beings or hundreds of thousands of other human beings so the everything is connected defense may be necessary sometimes if it's done wisely and if it's not reactive but a response to the situation wisdom is an absolute requirement for taking right decisions but unfortunately wisdom is hard to come by in political circles it seems that as people go into politics they might even have gone in with wisdom but then it grinds you down and it seems very hard to stay conscious once you are in the political system but there are people here and there who realize the importance there is a congressman I met from Washington who is deeply interested in mindfulness and meditation and spirituality and here and there there are people who realize the importance of wisdom so any decision one takes of how to defend oneself wisdom is required so that whatever you do does not make things worse so yes in the face of extreme unconsciousness you may need to defend yourself certainly another more general remark about these events this is only one example of humans creating something that looks actually quite insane it looks what they are doing like the suicide bombing it looks quite insane but that is how is it possible for humans to behave in such a way and is this not evil, go back to Europe in the first part of the 20th century the whole first part of Europe in the 20th century the first half of the 20th century was a nightmare and what what humans did to other humans at that time, first world war second world war infinitely worse than what is happening now with the terrorists infinitely worse just unimaginable horrors and the so that at every time period the human collective, the unconsciousness that is embedded in the collective will manifest through certain groups of people and if you close one door, another one opens and it manifests over there in the same way that the need for an enemy that is also there and manifests the cold war came to an end and said oh how wonderful there is no enemy anymore and not many years passed and quickly another big enemy arose somewhere else and now we need to fight that one I saw a funny movie about, it's a comedy about a fictitious American president who is, probably won't get re-elected in the next election and he says we need the cold wars and this was done before the whole terrorist thing happened but the cold war had come to an end the president says ok, the advisor, you're not going to get re-elected, your opinion poltergeist, we need an enemy and so they who can be our enemy because if a country has an enemy, everybody will unite behind the leader and they think ok, we got it, Canada Canada and then the rest of the movie is the humorous how the media manipulates public opinion to convince people that Canada is the great enemy the most unlikely enemy perhaps of the United States except perhaps Switzerland or Denmark but Canada is right next door so why not Canada oh yes, it's called Canadian Bacon that's the title of the movie now coming back to the atrocities that are perpetrated in different ways in different time periods

[Speaker 1] (9:46:56 - 9:49:55)
it's certainly the case that this is we need to recognize that this is insane it is a form of collective insanity, psychosis that is a benign way of looking at it you could call it evil, but I wouldn't I would say it's just insanity, because it seems to have no real purpose they achieve nothing through that so it's insanity now if we go then to a higher level a higher perspective then you see that the entire consciousness of humanity is involved in an evolutionary process and that evolutionary process if you look at humanity with one single whole, the consciousness of humanity as a single thing being just one aspect of universal consciousness so this consciousness of humanity at every human being is part of that one consciousness of humanity which in itself is part of the universal consciousness and consciousness, this consciousness of humanity is involved in an awakening process and you might know from your own life and I know from my life that the awakening process for quite a while involves intense suffering so you know that from your personal life I know it from my personal life the awakening process the intense suffering is part of the awakening process so humanity as a whole is going through also through intense suffering because we are all going through the awakening process when it comes to conscious manifestation my interest at this point is not in manifesting anything for myself personally but in wanting to help manifest a world that is more peaceful and just for everyone can how you teach conscious manifestation help with that?

[Speaker 11] (9:49:58 - 9:50:00)
good question[Speaker 1] (0:02 - 21:29)
Relevant, manifesting a world that is more just, I think that was the word, more peaceful and just for everyone. Well, that would be a good aim. Now, ultimately, of course, what you experience as the world is intrinsically one with your consciousness.

The only place where you experience the world is in your consciousness. Philosophers have even questioned whether there actually is a world out there independent of conscious perception. We don't need to go there, but there's no doubt that the entire world happens inside you, one could say.

You don't know what you see, what the eyes transmit, the senses transmit comes nerve impulses that are sent to the brain. That's just on the physical level. And then these nerve impulses are decoded.

And then some kind of words appears within you. But to what extent that corresponds to a world out there, we don't even know. So to change the world, so as you look at the world, in some way you could almost say, go as far as to say what you're actually looking at is a reflection in the external, in the world of form of your state of consciousness.

One could say, it's an interesting way to look at it. And the state of consciousness is partly your, there is your personal world and there is a collective world. So the two, they are connected, but they're not the same.

Because first of all, there is what you experience as a world in your personal life. All the people you habitually interact with, where you live, your surroundings. It starts with simple things like even the objects that surround you habitually where you live.

So your world is your personal, your relationships with humans that you live with, your relationships with other humans that you meet every day casually. The way you work, the people you work with. So all these things, your personal life, so-called life is one sphere that you move in.

And the important thing is not to neglect that in search of a better collective world. The two are related, but to disregard, this is a mistake that is often made, to disregard your personal sphere, the world that is immediately accessible to you as you and your life, the people in your life, where you live, all that, your work. To neglect that, it's very seductive to think there's so much wrong with the world out there, the collective, that's really what I should be concerned with because there's so much wrong out there, you can see it, you just have to turn on the, you turn on some kind of device, whether it's television or that brings you the news and the commentaries, continuous stream, and then, of course, that is already, that is the collective world that then enters your living room or wherever you are.

And then they get mixed up, they can obliterate, the collective can obliterate your personal life. And you think of your personal life is quite irrelevant now because what really matters, the world needs to change. It's so dreadful.

Well, yes, the world needs to change and the world is changing because humanity is a work in progress. Humanity is slowly evolving, fits and starts, and regressive periods, it takes a few steps forward and then a few steps, four steps forward, three steps back, then a few more forward. There's a gradual evolution of humanity and to focus only on what is going wrong within that process, that evolutionary process is also very misleading because that's what you see when you watch the media and so on.

It focuses not on what's going right or what has gone right, it focuses on what's going wrong. Then you give that more and more attention. By giving attention to something, you amplify it.

So whatever you give, now I'm not saying to completely ignore the world, no, but to give it an excessive amount of attention and only continuously think about what's wrong with the world, then you forget what's right with the world and that then diminishes. So we have the external world coming into your living room, for example, through the media. And it can be, as I said, you can sometimes believe that your personal world, your immediate sphere of influence is irrelevant, but that's not the case.

So the starting point with changing the world is to become aware of how you operate in this world. The starting point is how do you relate to the humans in your life? How do you, what is it, your mind, what is your mind doing?

What is your predominant state of consciousness? What are your predominant emotions? What are the predominant thoughts that go through your mind?

It's vitally important to become aware of that. If you're not aware of what the predominant emotions are, that the predominant thoughts are, plus accompanying emotions that go through your mind, you are unaware. And the emotions, the thoughts and emotions that arise continuously within you are a form of conditioning, and so they take possession of you.

So it's vitally important as the starting point for changing the world is to become aware of your world. But you can see how people cherish talking about what somebody did or failed to do. And then he did, they talk about it again and again and feel more and more aggrieved.

And again, it comes back to the state of connectedness with being. It's only from that state of connectedness with a deeper dimension of who you are. From there, it becomes easier to forgive because forgive means there was something that was done on the level of form, by one life form to you, perhaps another life form.

Pain was inflicted or whatever it may be, treat whatever the transgression is. And it's only from there that you can see the relative nature of what was done because you are in touch with a space within you that was never hurt by that. That dimension in you is beyond what can be injured.

It's only the form can be injured. The psychological form, somebody might have insulted you deeply. The psychological form of who you are can feel pain or the physical form of who you are can feel pain.

And somebody inflicted that out of unconsciousness. Then recognizing the first step in forgiving is to recognize that this was an act of unconsciousness and you do not equate what this person did with who that person is. And it's only from the place of connectedness with being that you can say, no longer hold a grievance about that because you are in touch with that inside you that is beyond what can be injured.

If you're not in touch with that space, then you're still, it's hard to forgive. Forgiving means not to harbor grievance or resentment or any negative feeling about it. And really that's only possible when you are connected with the formless in yourself.

As Cause and Miracle says, nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

Nothing real can be threatened. This means what is ultimately real cannot be threatened. But what is ultimately real is not the form.

It's that which is deeper than the form that cannot be threatened. Nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal ultimately exists.

It just seems to. Herein lies the peace of God means in the knowing of that lies the peace of God, but it needs to be not conceptual knowing, but a knowing on the level of the depths of your being. And then from there, you can look at anything anybody did to you and say, it's almost as if it didn't happen.

For a while, for example, I harbored grievances against my father for many years because he was, he suffered from enormous amount of bottled up anger and living with him as a child was like living with a powder keg or an unexploded bomb somewhere in the house. And everybody, one knew that at any moment, the slightest thing somebody said, and usually it was my mother, the slightest thing somebody said and this bomb would explode and the entire house would be filled with destructive energy. And for a sensitive child and any child is sensitive young child, it's a terrible thing to live in constant anguish at an explosion could be happening at any moment whenever he's in the house.

So I had the ambivalent feelings of fearing his return home after work and wanting him to come home, divided. And that was expressed once in a dream that I had as a child. And in the dream, I had cut my father up into little pieces and put in a plastic or some kind of sack and hidden under the bed.

And after I had done that in the dream, my father arrived home and I greeted him and loved him. And of course, all this resulted, even after when I was an adult already, resulted in quite a bit of grievance towards him because my childhood was fearful and unpleasant as a result. And it was only when a transformation happened inside me and there was suddenly that deep inner peace that I realized he did what he did according to the way in which life had conditioned him.

He had, when he was a child, he had enormous amount of resentment against his family because of, and of course the story can go on many generations. He was the seventh child. His father died when he was 15 and they took him out of the school.

They had to pay for school, boarding school. They took him out of boarding school because they said, we can't afford it anymore. But his sisters were still kept in boarding school.

So, and then he had to do menial jobs. And every day he was, his anger was growing and growing and growing. He carried it the rest of his life.

There was not enough consciousness in him to disidentify from the anger. He was, the anger was using him. It lived in him as an energy field and he could come up anytime.

He was as much a victim as I was. And I saw that after I had gone through the transformation and found inner peace, I could see that he did, he was a victim of his own circumstances. There was not enough consciousness in him to see what he was doing.

And immediately forgiveness happened. I didn't even have to say, I have to try to forgive. He never did.

It was as if he had never done anything to me because basically he hadn't, he wasn't even there. There was only the unconsciousness in him acting up. And then as he grew older, some of that anger dissipated.

Remnants of it remained. He also came into touch with some spiritual teachings, especially the power of now. And that helped to some extent.

And so his ego grew less, not didn't quite disappear, but it grew less, which when I was a child, his ego was gigantic and it was continuously fueled by anger. And an angry ego is something, it's the incredible hulk that, and that, so forgiveness happened naturally. And very often you see that when an injury happens, very often it's, there's a mental judgment of a situation and actually beyond that mental judgment, not that much happened.

Let's take a simple example. You arranged to meet somebody or somebody, he says, I'm going to help you with your moving. I'm going to help you move house.

I'll be there at five o'clock to help you move with my car. And he doesn't turn up and that just is as it is. Now the mind then comes in and says, he let me down.

He, or he betrayed me or he was, whatever the judgment of the mind is. And it is very often, it is the judgment of the situation that creates the emotion that feels injured. If you can just be with, or he, you said he would come, but he didn't turn up.

That's the fact. Whatever your mind wants to add to it gives you the sense of injury and strengthens the ego. So if you can just be with the pure facts, this is why all that stuff, when people about talking about other people, what they failed to do or what they did, what he did to me, he betrayed me.

Well, what did he do? Well, he went off with another woman or man. He betrayed me.

Betrayed me is an interpretation. And the more you have that thought that he betrayed me, the more you feel the emotion that goes with that thought. And you feel, who is it that feels that emotion?

The egoic self feels betrayed because who you deeply are, who you are in your essence doesn't feel betrayed. The fact is he went off with another woman. That's what he did.

Is that all? Yeah, that's what he did. If you refrain from adding a story to it, then you don't experience the, this may not be, this comes easy when you are connected with who you truly are.

Then it is easy to let go of the unnecessary imposition of stories upon events. The event is neutral. The story interpretation of it is what creates the anguish.

And so if you can just be with what is, but you can see how people cherish talking about what somebody did or failed to do. And then he did, they talk about it again and again and feel more and more aggrieved in who they are. Nothing really happened.

He didn't turn up. He didn't return the money that I lent him. I lent him the money, but he hasn't paid it back yet.

That's the fact of it. He is dishonest. Well, you don't need that.

He did something to me. He defrauded me. Mr. Madoff did it. This, a deeply unconscious person I wonder what he's doing now. He's sitting in his prison cell and many, many people have not forgiven him. Interesting position to be in, to have aggrieved so many people and created so much anguish and suffering in humans.

But for every single one of them, beyond their financial loss, they have their own lesson to learn. He has his lesson to learn. And life has given you, if you lost money with Mr. Madoff or whoever else, yes, you lost that money, but there is a deeper lesson you can learn in any loss. Any loss is, of course, one lesson is, of course, don't invest with him again. That's understood. Or anybody else like that.

That's understood. That's easy to know. But beyond that, there's a deeper lesson to learn and that is any lesson that comes with any kind of loss.

Any kind of loss is a potential opening into the formless because what you lose is something on the level of form. Whether it's money or reputation or some possession or even an ability to do something and suddenly you can't do it anymore. Any kind of loss is a loss on the level of form.

Thank you, Eckhart, for sharing the presence once again. My question is somewhat related to that last one, but from a different perspective. As the consciousness rises around us, there are many more resources and many new technologies to ease the suffering of humankind around the world.

But the white elephant in the room that no one seems to want to acknowledge in that process is the fact that the population is increasing faster and faster, it seems. I guess you can phrase that question so the answer is included, but I'd like to hear your perspective on what we might do to facilitate that process or how that process will take care of itself.

[Speaker 1] (22:51 - 22:57)
Can you be clear what is the process you refer to?

[Speaker 7] (22:58 - 23:11)
How the strain on the planet's resources is a result of the population increasing ever faster. How will we be able to resolve that conflict?

[Speaker 1] (23:12 - 57:38)
Well, it's obvious that the population cannot go on increasing because that would lead to disastrous consequences. Ultimately, that's fine too, because the one consciousness will manifest through any form it chooses again and again and is evolving. But it is quite possible that the larger intelligence that is, that underlies the planet, the planet, there is an intelligence that pervades the planet itself.

The planet is an intelligent being, which mainstream science would, of course, not agree with. But I very strongly feel that and anybody who becomes sensitive enough and no longer totally absorbed in conceptual thinking can sense that the entire planet is an intelligent being. It has a regulating intelligence and I feel that if humans don't take action to reduce this proliferation of bodies, they continuously produce, if humans don't take positive action, then the regulating intelligence of the planet, planetary intelligence is just one another expression of the one universal intelligence.

We'll take action and we'll do something to reduce the number of human beings on the planet. This is my feeling. I cannot prove to you that this is a correct prediction or gnostication, but the intelligence will take action and whether the action it takes is a violent form of action or whether the action it takes is nonviolent, I don't know.

For planetary intelligence, it would be very easy to reduce humans within one generation by reducing the fertility in the sperm of men so that very far fewer babies are produced and within one or two generations, the population could be reduced by 50% if many men are not able to father children anymore simply because something is missing there. That would be problemless. So if I, I'm not in charge of planetary intelligence, but if I were, that's what I would do.

It's totally painless. Don't have to kill anybody. So, but we shouldn't wait for that.

We need to look and see if we, first of course, we need to discover the wisdom inside. If we only approach it from the analytical mind, we'll just create, we tackle one problem here and we'll create a series of more problems on top of that. So we need to become, go within, find the wisdom that is in the stillness, go within.

And then the question is whether those people who are able to do that are those people that take decisions, probably not because the politicians are not there yet, most of them. But we are making a start here. So first, so that you can take intelligent action go within, never act from fear or kind of panic.

We need to save the planet. Oh my God. This is you generate fear.

If you generate fear, nothing good can come out of that. Even if your intentions are good, any action that is taken on the basis of fear is going to have negative consequences and secondary effects. So first we become still and peaceful and realize the truth of the beginning of the cause in miracles, which says, nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God. And, oh, okay.

Now, what action can we take? If you are not in a powerful position, at least perhaps you can come up with ideas that come from out of the stillness. I don't have a series of actions that mankind should take because this teaching doesn't work in that way.

This teaching is designed to take the individual human being deep enough within so that they can connect with a source of who they are and everything else other people will have to do. So I can't give, tell you what course of action to take because the focus of this teaching isn't in outer action. But it goes to the source of all intelligence and all wisdom, but I have a feeling that you have some ideas already.

So, and that's a good start and see where that takes you because you are able to access the stillness and fruitful, creative ideas come out of that. So all I can say to you to carry on with what you're doing and see what else comes to you and in what other ways you can be helpful and useful so that planetary intelligence does not have to intervene. Hmm.

Compassion towards others implies that you have empathy and you can only have empathy to the degree to which you are in touch with the deeper levels of who you are. If you live exclusively through a mental sense of self, then you cannot have empathy because you are completely out of touch with who you are in the essence of your being. The capacity for compassion is something that is part of the evolution of the human being.

Humans, even nowadays, in this present time, there are still millions of humans who are so trapped in their egoic sense of self that they are incapable of sensing, feeling the reality of another human being. The word that we need to use here is empathy, which is closely related with compassion. Hmm.

There are still many, many humans on the planet who are so trapped in their egoic sense of self that they're incapable of empathy. And then there are many others in whom empathy is present to a greater or lesser degree. And without empathy, of course, there can be no compassion.

Now, this is particularly important when we talk about compassion with reference to other human beings or other life forms. For a moment, let's talk, though, about compassion towards yourself and what that means. Particularly as awareness begins to awaken in you, you become aware of your own patterns.

You begin to become aware of your own behavior, not necessarily in the moment that it happens, but in many cases, those people who are beginning to awaken, the awareness is beginning to arise. Those humans become aware, for example, after they have engaged in unconscious, speech, unconscious behavior, reactive behavior, and suddenly they become aware, oh, that's what I did. I got completely taken over by anger.

I got completely taken over by my overreaction. I said things to that person that I didn't really mean, that they just came out of my mouth, or I even, could even go to physical violence. I did that.

How could I have done that? And many humans who are awakening are experiencing these times when they begin to judge themselves as not good enough. So that is something to be aware of when you, as you begin to awaken, you become an observer of yourself to a greater or lesser degree, rather than just being totally identified with whatever comes into your head and whatever words come out of your mouth and whatever action you're engaged in, you're so identified that there's not the slightest space of awareness.

Now, there's no point in talking about compassion towards yourself to people who are so unconscious. So when we talk about compassion, it already implies that there's some awareness in you, you're aware of yourself, you're aware of your behavior, and you experience different levels of awareness at different times in your life from day to day. And then you become aware that there are times when you are unconscious.

And usually then you wake up, so to speak, out of it and say, oh, you're taken over by my pain body again. And for many people, that can become a source of suffering because they judge themselves as not good enough. And they even have a hostile, begin to have a hostile relationship towards the more unconscious aspects of who they are, their imperfections.

So compassion towards yourself is to still realize there are areas in your life where you're still unconscious, and that's how it is. And you forgive yourself. Again, forgiveness is related also with all these things that are closely related, empathy, compassion, forgiveness.

You forgive yourself for your moments of unconsciousness, or if you've done bad things in the past, and this is often people have asked me that question. You have, in the past, when you were not as aware or completely unaware, you did certain things that you now regret, you recognize them as very unconscious. And what do you do with that?

The compassionate way is to see that at that time, you could not have acted differently because your actions reflected your degree of unconsciousness, consciousness, unconsciousness. And that recognition is compassion. You forgive yourself.

Instead of making an identity out of your own past unconsciousness for yourself and say, I am this kind of a person, which is again a mental construct, instead of making an identity for yourself out of past unconsciousness, you recognized your behavior at that time as unconscious. So you manifested the collective, ultimately the collective unconsciousness that is in the human psyche, the collective psyche of humanity. And so when you don't make it into an identity, then you realize that it is not who you essentially are.

And so you become compassionate towards yourself. But it also applies to the present, at the present time, not making impossible demands of perfection, and then you fall short. There are certain things, certain areas in your life that will never be perfect on the level of form.

You cannot be a perfect human being on the level of form. There are always certain things that you are good at, other things you are not good at. That's fine, no matter how conscious you are.

So you don't demand perfection of yourself, not on this level of form. The realization is there is a deep, at the deepest level of who you are, there is perfection already. You are already perfect, complete, whole, at the deepest level, yes.

On the outer level, there will always be certain imperfections. And so you have compassion with yourself as far as your imperfections are concerned, which does not mean that you actually indulge in behavior that is harmful to yourself or others and say, oh, that's okay, I am compassionate towards myself, so I continue to get drunk three times a week and beat up my wife, and I'm just compassionate towards myself. This is not what I'm talking about.

You cannot become compassionate with inflicting suffering on others as you recognize it now. If it happened in the past, that is different. So there are some forms of behavior that need to be rectified through awareness, through presence, and other things you need to accept.

So there's wisdom required, but it's not that difficult to tell whether your behavior is truly dysfunctional and causes suffering, or whether there's just certain things that are not perfect, but there isn't much you can do about it. You might be too slow in certain, for example, myself. There's a huge area of imperfection in my life that there are many things that I don't deal with or don't deal with on time.

So sometimes things get emailed, emails are not answered. If you've ever sent me an email, we might not have received a reply. So I don't feel really bad about that because I'm compassionate towards myself.

But if that causes you suffering, not receiving an email, I don't suggest, I did not cause you that suffering. You caused it yourself through having certain expectations. So compassionate towards yourself is important.

Compassion towards others means, implies that you have empathy towards other human beings. And you can only have empathy to the degree to which you are in touch with the deeper levels of who you are. If you live exclusively through a mental sense of self, then you cannot have empathy because you're completely out of touch with who you are in the essence of your being.

The empathy that you have for others arises out of the realization of who you are in the essence of your being. And then, because then by recognizing your own essence, you recognize the essence of the other. But I wrote in, I believe in the power of now, that there are two aspects to compassion.

One is you observe and you recognize perhaps the suffering of another human being or another life form. You can almost feel it yourself. And you may want to do something about it.

That is often part of it. Compassion is the sensing, and it may lead to action, if action is possible or wise, or if you're able to do it. But that's one aspect.

The other aspect of compassion is not normally talked about. And that is to sense the essence of the other person underneath their suffering. Can only do that because you can sense your own essence.

By doing that, by sensing the essence of the other through your own and recognize that there's something in the other that is you, that is ultimately that's consciousness. So you recognize the consciousness, not the conditioned consciousness, but the unconditioned consciousness in the other, then you connect with the other at a very deep level. And by doing that, that is a level of perfection beyond form.

Then you recognize there is some, there is a dimension, a transcendent dimension in this human being that may be in suffering. There is a transcendent dimension in that human being that is beyond the suffering, but that human being may not know that. But you recognize it in the other.

Then you still feel the suffering also of the other, but you don't lose yourself in the suffering of the other. You recognize the suffering for what it is, but it does not draw you into suffering also. It's just on the, there is a, something resonates in you resonates with it, but you are not drawn into suffering by the other person because you're connected with the transcendent dimension in yourself and the other.

But now you can truly, because if you are suffering too, you can't be really of real help. You can truly help the other if help is possible. That if you are connected to the transcendent level at the same time, there are people who are very empathetic towards others and some of those people are called upon to become professional helpers.

You might become a therapist, you might become a social worker. So it's often people who have a lot of empathy for others. They choose helping others as their profession.

And many of those people at first, they are happy with what they're doing, but many of them actually after a few years experience burnout, experience depression. The suicide rate of among psychotherapists and psychiatrists is quite high. So they lose themselves in the suffering of others and make it their own.

That is not something that you want to do and is not something that is necessary. And this is particularly important, perhaps now what I'm saying now for to hear for those people who are professional helpers, the essence of who you are needs to be always in the background of whatever you do, whatever action you perform, whatever words you speak. You need to stay connected with that deeper essence so that there is a peace and a fullness, the fullness of life as Jesus called it, that you can sense that core of yourself as consciousness, you are consciousness.

And the other also ultimately is consciousness going through the dream of suffering ultimately, the nightmare of suffering, and you do what you can. So stay connected to the stillness within yourself when you help others, feel the stillness, the alert stillness, and then do what you have to do. I'll say a little bit more about compassion.

Compassion needs also to be, to exist within the larger contexts of awareness. Compassion is a wonderful thing. It is a sign that you as a human being have already evolved beyond complete identification with form, so that's, it's a wonderful thing.

Nevertheless, the application of compassion when it becomes action requires awareness. An example, one could give many examples. You may see a homeless person in the street.

Now, you can, you can, you can, you sense perhaps the suffering of that person, and you want to, out of that compassion that you feel, you may feel called upon to help in one way or another. You can buy a sandwich for that person and give it to the person. You can give money.

It's also possible that you might look and say, oh, I actually have a spare guest room in my house, and so you invite the homeless person into your home because there's a strong desire in you to help. But the question is, is there wisdom with it also? Let's say you invite this person to your house and wanting to help, which is a wonderful thing, and perhaps it works beautifully.

Perhaps it gives this person a new start in life. Or it could be that this person that you have invited into your house rapes your daughter, steals from you, inflicts violence on other members of the family, and then leaves. So you have exercised compassionate action without wisdom.

So what it is that you do as compassion arises, it requires wisdom. In what way can I help this person? And sometimes the help is not physical help.

It is help, for example, some people are in deep psychological suffering. The help that you can give that person is attention. You can listen to them, and perhaps out of this attention that you give, which is presence, this is what they need, perhaps help arises through something that you say to them.

How I started as a spiritual teacher, people came to me, they spontaneously, they asked questions. Then I said things. I could see their suffering, but I was not suffering with them.

I could sense their suffering, I could sense a small amount of suffering in me, but I was deeply connected already then with the essence of who I am, and I realized there was no suffering. So when I listened to these people, often there was a slight smile on my face, and that smile on my face was there, they were talking about their suffering to me, and as I was listening very attentively, there was a slight smile on my face, and some of them suddenly stopped talking and said, why are you smiling? Aren't you, do you think that is funny?

And I realized, oh, I mustn't smile, because I smiled because I could sense something beyond their suffering that they themselves could not sense. That was in me, but also in them. There was a dimension where there was no suffering, and occasionally they, by me sensing that, they also could sense it in themselves, and that is called healing, spiritual healing at the deepest level when that happens.

So I was helping many people, you can say out of compassion, but then I realized there are also other people who continuously come to you, not because they want to get better, they want to suck up your energy, which is you give them attention continuously, and they love that, and they come every day with new problems. They don't want the solution, they get addicted to your attention, and if you continue to give it, you will become depleted, you will become, ultimately you would experience burnout, and it has no purpose. Again, this is a similar case where compassion, the exercise of compassion in the practical realm requires wisdom.

So there were some people that I had to say, I'm not going to see you anymore, and they go, oh, how can you do that to me? But that ultimately was the best thing that I could do for. They were not ready for, but perhaps of what I said to them when I did see them, perhaps some of that remained in their mind, and at some point it actually did change their lives.

I don't know. But here again, helping people is great, being used by others who are unconscious beings instead of looking for their own being, looking for the source of all aliveness and energy within themselves, they look to others to give them that aliveness. So again, wisdom is required here so that you don't exercise compassion stupidly.

That's an extremely important part of awakening. In fact, you need that to provide fuel for the arising of presence.

[Speaker 7] (57:44 - 57:54)
Our listener writes, how can we stay present and in touch with consciousness on days when we feel depressed and lack motivation?

[Speaker 1] (57:57 - 1:10:59)
Right. When sometimes that is in quite a few people associated with periods of low physical energy because energy fluctuates. And so from occasionally you may experience low levels of physical energy and this can affect the mind too.

The important thing is first of all, when you talk about being depressed and so on, to see whether there is, what kind of thoughts are being created in your mind during that time. Ask yourself whether or examine whether the certain types of thinking create that feeling of depression. Thoughts like, oh, it's all pointless anyway.

Oh, what's the point of it all? I hate this world. There's no point in even struggling anymore.

I'm fed up, completely fed up with life. I can't take any more, that type of thinking. Are you aware, what is the relationship between the emotion that you feel and your thought processes?

Are perhaps your thoughts creating that emotion or could it be that the emotion is creating the thoughts? So when you are depressed, there will be certain thoughts going through your mind. And probably there will not be pleasant thoughts.

So be aware of the relationship between what you're feeling, this depressed feeling of sadness, depression, you feel dejected and your thought processes. And if in the moment of thinking, those types of thoughts that accompany the feeling of depression or pointlessness, if you can be there and observe those thoughts, then again, as in the first question, answer to the first question, when you recognize those thoughts, you no longer completely believe in them. You recognize them as a conditioned movement in your mind.

And then you may be able to come to an acceptance of whatever it is you're feeling at this moment without adding the baggage of thought to it. So what remains then is this feeling of perhaps low energy or it could be an activation of your pain body to some extent, you feel emotion in you that doesn't feel good, but you're then no longer fueling it with your thinking. So if there's enough awareness in you while you're going through a period of depression, allow yourself to feel what it is you're feeling, but be careful that you don't fuel it with your thinking.

And if you feel what you feel, that's all you have to do is surrender to your experience of this moment. You accept your experience of this moment, which at this moment may be not pleasant, but that's what is inside you. So probably the greatest spiritual practice is to accept whatever it is that you're experiencing at this moment.

So if you're experiencing depression, then that's the isness of the present moment. And as much as possible, you step out of your mind and just be the awareness. Observe, it may be the case that there is an addiction in you that periodically arises, and that's the addiction to unhappiness, the addiction to negativity.

And that is usually connected with a pain body that needs to renew itself periodically. If most of you will know what I'm talking about, you've read about the pain body, old emotion that still lives in you. Sometimes it's dormant, sometimes it needs to feed to take in more so that it can stay alive.

It's a semi-autonomous energy field in you. And so in the absence of, its favorite way to feed is on other people's reactions. So it will create drama, it will create, push your partners or other family members, people's buttons, so to speak, so that you get a negative emotional reaction.

And so it loves the drama of the emotional drama and will provoke drama. And that's how the pain body loves to feed. But if that's, for some reason, is not possible for whatever reason, the pain body is quite happy also to feed on your thoughts.

So it will periodically rise up into your mind and then you will think thoughts that feed the pain body, but the thoughts themselves already created by the pain body. And then it's a vicious circle. The negative thoughts that you don't want at that moment, you do not want to let go of that type of thinking because there's not enough awareness in you at that moment.

At that moment, when I say you don't want to let go, or when I say you are addicted to your unhappiness, when I say you, it's not really you, it's a mind pattern with which you are that moment completely identified. And that's why I call it you. So in that moment, it is you.

So there are many, many people who are addicted to their unhappy states, the unhappiness in them. And if some people have it almost continuously, but most people have periods when this happens and then it subsides, and that's the typical way in which the pain body arises from its dormant state, feeds on several hours or even days of deep negative thinking, and then subsides and then for a while you're free again. So addiction to unhappiness, this is one way of speaking about it.

Be careful to see whether you can detect in yourself when in the moment of it happening, you're almost, you're indulging in this feeling of could be self-pity or condemnation of life or others or whatever it is, you love it. You love that, you love those feelings and those thoughts. And you don't want to get out.

If somebody at that moment said to you to come out of it, you say, oh, shut up, I don't want to hear. Now, some people have them so strongly that the addiction to unhappiness has become part of their conditioned personality. So they are, part of their identity is a very unhappy sense of self.

And if that is a terrible place to be in, but again, the only way that you can transcend that and escape from that prison is to be aware when it happens. So a good question therefore is, am I enjoying my unhappiness in some weird way? Do I love my unhappiness?

And if I love my unhappiness, who is that I that loves unhappiness? It must be a weird and crazy I that loves unhappiness. So maybe that's not really me.

Maybe it's just an unhappy self in me that loves. I know that I had that very strongly for many years in my 20s. So you have to be really alert and see whether you enjoy your unhappiness.

And once you notice it, you say, oh, wow, I'm really enjoying this. In the moment of noticing it, you've made it conscious. And then it's very likely that you cannot go on very much longer enjoying it because this can only continue when you're unconscious.

It needs your unconsciousness, this false self. It's an aspect of the false self that is the ego. It needs your unconsciousness to continue to survive.

But when you make it conscious, then there comes a moment of surprise and says, oh, wow, I'm actually enjoying this. I don't want to let, I love this negative thoughts, love in a perverse way almost. This is the egoic kind of love.

And then you might even ask, is that who I am? Who am I? Why do I love this?

This awareness is coming. Awareness is arising. And then suddenly you step out of identification with that mind pattern, mental emotion.

And that is part of the awakening. So those things for many people are a very important part of their spiritual awakening. The very important part of spiritual awakening is to become aware of the unconsciousness in you, the various ways in which the unconsciousness manifests in you.

That's an extremely important part of awakening. In fact, you need that to provide fuel for the arising of presence. The dysfunctional states, the dysfunctional mental emotional states in the negative mental emotional states, the mental emotional states that create so much suffering, ultimately they provide not only motivation for awakening, they also provide the fuel for awakening.

So be grateful when you detect those things in yourself. That's a, it's not a bad thing. It's a wonderful thing to detect the unconsciousness in you, to become aware of the unconsciousness in you and realize that it is not you ultimately.

It, for years, it had been, it pretended to be you and you were so identified with it, yet you thought it was you. And suddenly or gradually another deep eye, it's the deep eye that is now awakens. And the deep eye, which is presence, recognizes that the surface eye is a conditioned entity and it's ultimately, it's not who I am.

It is there and that's a disidentification and that's all part of the awakening process.

I know you work with psychotherapists and therapists in helping others. And my question is, how can we follow up on the analogy of the caterpillar? How can we support others?

How can we know if they are there, if they are not there? Is it possible to help? I don't know what the question is, but it's, can we support someone in this process?

You obviously are and Kim is obviously supporting us. So is there different stages that we can support different people in different processes?

The moment the spiritual awakening, if we want to call it that, happens in you, which is the disidentification from the thinking mind and certain degree of arising of presence. Well, not the moment it happens, but a little bit after that, as this process continues, many people find that more and more people come, you meet people sometimes seemingly accidentally, or it might be people who you know already, who need you, who also are at a stage of readiness, but don't know it yet. And you may find and will find that these people are drawn to you.

You may not immediately recognize them. In fact, you may think, listen, this person is not going to awaken in this lifetime, but you can get surprise, big surprises. Sometimes the most unlikely people can come to you and you know that it's happening.

There's a moment usually when you notice there is a transmission either of presence as an energy field, or they ask you a question, you give an answer, and the answer has a certain power or aliveness to it. It comes through you spontaneously because the question was a genuine question and there was an opening in the other person. If it's not a genuine question, if it's a question asked out of curiosity, what's that spiritual stuff all about that you do or whatever, or tell me about that spirit stuff, but there's no real opening, then your answer will not be good, or there may be no answer.

But if it's a real question and there's some degree of presence in you, then there will be a real answer. And the helping then comes in two ways. One is through the energy that you emanate as you are present.

The second is through what you say to them. And that is the beginning of you becoming a spiritual teacher. And many of you, some of you are already spiritual teachers, whether formally or not formally, some of you will become formal spiritual teachers because the world is in great need of you.

Humans want you. They might not know it yet, but everybody, even if you do not become a formal spiritual teacher, you will do some teaching informally through everybody you meet because you spread, your state of consciousness spreads to others. That applies both to unconscious people who spread their negativity or the viral infection of their minds and to present people who spread presence.

And it's not that you are doing it. So an important obstacle could be if you think that you need to do something to help them. This is very seductive because it's a wonderful thing to help others.

But the obstacle is you think that it is up to you to help them. It's not. In fact, you wouldn't know how to.

I wouldn't know how to. So you have to allow it to happen by holding the presence, especially when somebody comes to you, ask the question or you say something, hold the presence and then see what happens. So it's not you who is doing it.

Sometimes I've met some people who said they've been asked to, first they saw some individuals, helped them, they're growing and growing in presence. And then somebody approached them, can you give a talk to our little group? And then they came to me and said, I don't think I'm ready to give a talk to a group.

Somebody asked me to give a talk to a group. I think I'm not ready. And I said, if you think you're ready, then that's not a good sign.

And because there's probably a little ego in there that thinks I'm ready to be a spiritual teacher. Just come to me and I will heal you. But if you feel that the most powerful place, whether you are with one person or with a group of people, the most powerful place is to not know.

But you have to be comfortable with not knowing. If you're uncomfortable with not knowing what to say, what to do, then you go, oh dear, what should I say? The mind says, quick, say something useful to this person.

And then you think of things you've read in a book. Well, Eckhart says that it doesn't mean you should never quote, but it's always more powerful if it comes from you. So it only comes if you are comfortable with, enter that space of not knowing, which is basically you surrender thought and you just look at the person and you listen and then see what answer comes, then see what you say, if anything.

In some cases, you might not say anything. So the help allow it to move through you. And that's a big relief.

It means you don't have to do it. You only become a vehicle for it, an opening for it. You become an opening for consciousness.

So you don't have to heal people, help people. I mean, you can help physically. That's a different matter.

You can give somebody food or money to help, but at a deeper level, you can't do anything. So getting out of the way, and then it will happen through you. In the Course in Miracles, it says, the moment you become a student of the Course in Miracles, which by the way, is a lovely teaching, but not for everybody.

So don't believe that because I mentioned it now, you have to go and get it. It's great for some people. It's a beautiful spiritual work, but for others, it's not the right one.

Nothing is right for everybody. Course in Miracles, however, says, the moment you start studying the Course in Miracles, which really implies the moment you begin to disidentify from the conditioned mind, you become a teacher of God. Now the ego, of course, would probably love that term.

That's just why I personally would not use it, but there is some truth in it. It's not a terminology that I would use, but the moment the presence arises, you begin to teach presence, but really, presence does it through you. Thank you.

Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (1:20:34 - 1:21:38)
How can we use the essence identity to help us determine in next steps or decisions or choices or responses to challenging situations?

You don't use it. You don't learn to use the essence identity. The essence identity uses you.

So you don't have to learn and figure out how to use essence identity. The more you become rooted in your essence identity, the more you will find that right action, what you need to do, what you need to say at any given moment comes from that dimension of consciousness in you. And then gradually we begin to realize that it's not you who is using it.

It uses your mind to manifest itself through you. It uses your body to emanate through. So that's the important thing.

The question then is not right. You cannot use it because who are you? You would be, it would be the form identity using the essence identity.

One, you could look at it like that, but it's not really how it works. Gradually, as your essence identity emerges more, it uses your body and mind to manifest in this world and to bring about change too. First it just emanates presence, and then it flows, it begins to use your mind, your speech becomes more, less repetitive, more interesting, more creative, probably you speak less than one used to, that applies to almost everybody, but what you say has significance and power to it.

And it changes the way you think. It's because it shines into your mind and begins to shine away all destructive, dysfunctional, and repetitive, and compulsive, unconscious thought movements and thought patterns. So it rises into your mind.

It uses you, and even that is a limited way of talking about it because it is you. It is the emergence of who you essentially are. But who you essentially are is not a separate autonomous entity.

Who you essentially are is deeply connected with the nature and the identity of the universe itself. The heart of the essence of you is also the essence of the universe. And when you go beyond this narrow identification with form, you are more deeply connected with the whole, with the totality.

And the totality of consciousness acts, speaks, emanates through you. So that is the shift, you become a different, and it's an evolutionary shift. You become a different being.

So it may sometimes look to you as if you were using it, but really it's using you. And that's how it should be.

[Speaker 16] (1:25:29 - 1:25:34)
Yeah. Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (1:26:02 - 1:26:05)
It doesn't mean you cannot seek a cure.

[Speaker 1] (1:26:05 - 1:48:53)

You can take steps. But while it's there, to see it as a purification because it has the potential of completely burning up your ego. So what to do, especially if you've already tried a lot of approaches, it's always easy to speak for somebody who is not experiencing physical pain.

At the moment, I'm not experiencing physical pain. I have known pain, but not prolonged period of time, not physical pain or a prolonged period of time. But I know suffering, there is such a thing as conscious suffering.

Obviously you should continue to seek ways of alleviating the pain or finding a cure. But in the meantime, while it's there, I suggest that you explore the possibility of conscious suffering that was practiced, for example, in Christianity. And it may still be practiced by certain people who are strongly identified with the Christian religion, but it was a very common thing in middle ages to when you had pain, to equate your pain with the suffering of Christ.

Christ was the archetype of suffering. It's a, whether you see Christ as a real person that lived, I believe he did, or whether Christ is a mythical concept, it can work in the same way. Christ is the archetype of suffering and of transcending suffering.

In the same way that Buddha's teaching, he himself described, Buddha said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering. The literal words of the Buddha, I teach suffering means I show you how suffering arises. The end of suffering is the transcendence of suffering.

Jesus didn't say that, but it's all contained in his life and the image of the crucifixion and the cross, because the cross is the instrument of suffering. It's a torture instrument. And then you see the God nailed to the cross or the man nailed to the cross.

It is the archetype of human suffering. In that sense, one could say, he represents every man and woman because every man and woman has goes through suffering, whether it might not be extreme physical pain, but it is human suffering, some more extreme than others. And then he died and then the resurrection happened.

And then the cross, the torture instrument, the very thing that gave him the pain symbolizes the divine. So it becomes a portal into the transcendent dimension by completely surrendering, which is the image on the cross is the image of total surrender. And that is in some traditions called conscious suffering, which is you don't need to necessarily, if you're not a believing Christian, it would be hard for you to say that you are suffering with Christ, but there's a deep truth in here.

And that is, and I have seen it in people that I have known, people who have had pain for years. It can, if used consciously, it can erode your ego completely. If you regard it as a fire, that's burning up, burning you up, the false you in burning up.

And so conscious is to actually not to resist it psychologically. It doesn't mean you cannot seek a cure. You can take steps, but while it's there, to see it as a purification, because it has the potential of completely burning up your ego.

If used consciously. And that is for those people who, you might as well practice that because that's all that's possible for you at the moment. If you then see there's a healing method or a healer somewhere, why not go there?

But in the meantime, you practice conscious suffering. So that is not only with physical pain, you can also do it with other situations that you may be in.

Suffering arises and you come to a complete acceptance.

If you completely accept, in a way we really, to be strict, we should differentiate between suffering and pain. Normally the way I use the words are, suffering is the psychological pain that is generated through resistance. So if you have a physical pain, it can be terrible, but you can have physical pain without suffering, meaning without any resistance, psychological resistance on top of it, that's the suffering.

And that applies to not just physical pain, but any situation in life, anything that goes wrong, there's the, the suffering is the psychological layer that is created through non-acceptance. So that's, that does not need to be there. That is a practice.

So we all, most of you, most humans on the planet don't have a spiritual teacher. They don't even, wouldn't even want, they don't, haven't even heard of a spirit, anything such a spiritual teacher, what's that? But they all have their suffering.

So I say that everybody has their spiritual teacher and for most humans, it's their suffering because eventually the suffering has an evolutionary function that is both the suffering that seems to come to you out of nowhere and the suffering that is self-generated in your mind and through unconscious action in the world, which then draws to you further unconsciousness from others. Nations, for example, go to war, that's unconscious action, then drawing further suffering to themselves. So there are two kinds of suffering.

One seems to come out of nowhere and other suffering is obviously generated through unconscious mind activity. And it is that kind of suffering that creates all the atrocities on a collective level and the personal drama that people are engaged in on a daily basis that is ultimately completely unnecessary, but it is generated by unconscious mind activity and the egoic self, which is mind made. So those are, that's the suffering that, now, if you look at the amount of suffering that humans encounter, you will see that the larger part of suffering that humans encounter is self-generated.

Yes, there is suffering that happens through earthquakes, natural disasters, and illness. Illness is already on the borderline between self-generated and something that just comes to you. Many illnesses are self-generated through dysfunctional thinking and emotion.

But if you look at the amount of suffering that's self-generated, it's far greater than the amount that seems to come to you from the outside. If you look at the history of the 20th century, especially the first half of the 20th century, how many people died through natural disasters or died prematurely through an illness compared to the people that were murdered by their fellow human beings? Far more were murdered by their fellow human beings in the 20th, especially the first half of the 20th century than people who suffered through natural disasters or natural causes, just amazing.

It was hell for millions, millions of people, 150 million, who knows the exact figure who were murdered in the first half of the 20th century alone. Many of them, not even many, yes, between nations, but millions and millions of others murdered by their own governments in Russia, in Germany, in China, by insane governments, murdering or, as in China, bringing about through absurd policies, the starvation of millions. So if you want to, if you have any doubt about the dysfunction of the egoic mind, you just look at that, look at that history and see how much suffering humans generate for themselves.

So that is something that we no longer do and that's why we are here. We don't do that and there's still a certain amount of suffering that will come to us. Now, there is a belief, especially new age people, they will tell you whenever something happens to you, or you fall ill, or you have an accident, or whatever happens, they may ask you, why did you manifest that?

And that makes lots of people angry, understandably, because they say, I didn't manifest this accident, it just happened. There was a crazy driver and he comes coming towards me. Nothing I could do, I didn't manifest it.

Or I didn't manifest this terrible illness, I never wanted it, what are you saying? Therefore, I never say, did you manifest it or you manifested it, or you should look into why you manifested it. Why not leave it alone?

All I say is, whatever happens to you, once it's happening, accept it as if you had chosen it. That's the important thing. I'm not saying you chose it, you won't want to hear that.

And it's not even literally true, there's some truth hiding there, but we don't need to go there. It's more important to choose whatever is happening, whatever is happening in this moment or as if you had chosen it. And then the resistance goes.

No need to think right now. There's nothing to add to this moment by thinking about it. So all that thinking would do is obscure your awareness.

Your awareness of the present moment, which means obscure your awareness. If you have problems waiting for you, you can think about them when we finish. And even then, I would suggest and recommend that you set aside brief periods when you think about your so-called problems, if they are real.

In other words, a real problem is a situation that you need to deal with. Either right now, in the moment when it arises, in which case it's not a problem, it's a challenge. Or something that tomorrow you may have to do or next week or next month.

And you may have to think about what you're going to do to the extent to which it's possible to plan and set aside a period of time when you do that. And then when that's done, come back into present moment awareness. So the worst fate is for your mind to be occupied continuously with past and future.

And as you know, past and future exist in the mind. Remove the mind, thought. There's no past or future.

Past or future exists for you as thought. And it's indispensable for dealing with the practical aspects of life. But it's a huge obstacle for going deeper within yourself, deeper into reality.

A huge obstacle to finding that state of connectedness with a deeper reality. A huge obstacle to knowing who you are. So right now, all you need to do, and there's no doing, but just use the word, all you need to do is look at the image on the screen, listen to the words, which are all pointers, signposts, and as you look at the image on the screen and listen to the words, be aware also of yourself as the still space, the still presence, without which you would not be able to look at the image on the screen or listen to the words. It's only because there is that light of presence that receives the sense perception of seeing and hearing that there can be seeing and hearing.

The moment you start thinking about past and future, the moment you start thinking, some of your consciousness incarnates into form. The incarnation, I believe carnation comes from flesh, carnal, the word incarnation is to become form, to become physical form, but it's not necessarily physical. You become a psychological form.

Every thought is that. So some of the consciousness incarnates into mental formations. And that's okay, there's nothing wrong with that.

It's a good thing that you're able to think. It's not a good thing to lose yourself in the thinking. Why is it not a good thing?

Because it makes your life miserable. And if you make your life miserable, you make other people's lives miserable without even knowing what you're doing. That's the essence of unconsciousness.

The really unconscious people, which is still millions, billions on the planet, they don't know that they are making their lives miserable and other people's lives miserable. Or as somebody once put it, they know not what they do. And here you can learn to become comfortable with the beautiful, let's call it state, it's not a state, the beautiful state of not thinking.

Become familiar with that, experience how lovely it is, not having to think.

[Speaker 7] (1:49:29 - 1:50:02)
Here's what our questioner wrote in. I have an incredibly strong poverty mindset, which drags me down and keeps me continually worrying about small things. Don't ever waste food, this mindset says inside me.

I better keep this because I might need it someday. I'll never be able to afford that. Those thoughts are unending.

How can the power of presence help me shed this crushing burden?

[Speaker 1] (1:50:06 - 2:24:01)
Good, well, that's the good, the good news is that the questioner is already aware or let's say, I'm going to address the questioner as you because I assume the questioner is listening and watching. So the good thing is that you are already aware of those thoughts and this is not a natural thing. There are still millions of people who have these or other types of conditioned thinking and are completely unaware that they have whatever type of conditioned thinking it is that they have.

They are unaware because they are 100% identified with that conditioned thinking. So they don't recognize it as conditioned thinking. That is how they perceive reality.

That is what determines their reactions. And these are self-perpetuating thoughts that continuously create the same emotions. And this then becomes a person's reality.

They inhabit that reality and it is totally not just colored but distorted by the conditioning of their mind. So they think these thoughts, but they cannot differentiate between reality and those thoughts. So you already know that you have these types of thoughts.

So that's already an indication that there has been an awakening of consciousness, which is the arising of awareness. Awareness is a dimension that is deeper and vaster than thought. So when you become aware of what your mind is doing, then that is a sign that the awakening process in you has already begun.

So that's a wonderful thing. So now it does not necessarily mean that immediately you become free of the effect of those thoughts. So the thoughts still have a certain power and their power is to create certain emotions and their power is to create certain reactions and certain actions out in the world.

But while this still happens, there is in you an observing presence in the background. And that's also where the possibility of freedom comes in, the possibility of choice, the possibility of not acting out those thoughts, provided that in the moment of these thoughts or one of these thoughts occurring, you can still be there as the observing presence, as the awareness. And if you are, then now you may not fully realize this, but when you're able to watch a thought like that, then the possibility arises that you can, you no longer need to be controlled by the thought.

Let's give an example in your case. Let's say you have certain objects that you say, oh, I need to hang onto this because I might need it one day. I must keep this and I must keep that.

Perhaps you have already accumulated many things that you actually don't use. And whenever this happens, instead of letting go of something, your mind says, no, you must hang on because you might need it one day. So you can bring in, you recognize the thought and you realize you do not have to act out the thought.

So you can ask yourself what happens if I don't act out this thought and I do almost the opposite of what this thought is telling me. For example, in the case of needing to hang on to material objects that you probably won't need, you can make it a practice periodically to give things away. Despite the fact that your thoughts are telling you, oh, I must hang on, but you are there as the awareness and the awareness can override the thought.

You don't have to fight the thought. The awareness simply overrides the thought. And then from the, so then instead of acting according to the thought, your action then arises no longer from the thought, it arises from the awareness.

And then you can make it a practice to give things away. And you may still find your mind telling you, oh, no, don't do that. But this can actually strengthen in you the dimension of presence or awareness by simply observing a thought, recognizing it, and then realizing that that thought is not actually intelligent.

It's conditioned, part of the conditioned mind. And then what arises then is the true intelligence. So we could call it also the presence arising is also the awakening of true intelligence.

And then you make it a practice to give things away, either to somebody you know, or you bring it to a thrift store where somebody else will, you realize actually somebody else will perhaps be able to use whatever it is that you're giving away. And then you bring in gradually then the thought will have less power because you're no longer continuously reinforcing it by your actions. So that's one thing you can do.

And then this sense of lack, of course, is part of most people's egoic consciousness. In your case, it manifests as, again, let's take another thought that you have mentioned. Oh, I can't afford that.

I can't, I must keep my money for, I might need it for, but I can't afford to buy this now. So again, you can observe a thought like that. And occasionally, you may want to acquire an object that has inherent beauty or quality.

If you can afford it, you don't have to do something reckless with your money. But instead of always saying, oh no, don't, I need to keep my money, buy something as a statement of abundance, something that has quality, that has beauty or quality, or you respond, it doesn't even have to be expensive, or it may be something expensive. It could be that you buy a pair of shoes that cost three times as much as what you would normally buy.

And not just because it happens to have a label that's famous, but it could be that they're actually much better quality and they will last three times or more longer than other shoes. So as a statement of abundance, occasionally you may want to buy something that has beauty or inherent quality to it. Another wonderful practice to counteract this type of mental conditioning is to, I mentioned, it's another aspect of what I mentioned at the beginning, and that is to give away, not just objects, but occasionally to give.

To give is a powerful statement of abundance. So if you give to someone, what doesn't matter where it is, let's say it's somebody in the street. There's somebody, there's a beggar in the street and you give this person, not as a compulsive thing in your mind that from now on you have to give to everybody you see at a street corner, but you can make it a practice habitually, regularly to give as a spiritual practice because it's an affirmation of, it's the opposite of lack when you give.

It's an affirmation of abundance and it's a very pleasant thing to do. And then you might also want to give small amounts of money away, even if you don't have a lot, the act of giving is what really matters. So whether it is to a person that you happen to know who needs something or somebody you come across seemingly accidentally, or you give to a charity whose cause you believe in and feel good about.

And so again, and then you will probably encounter your mind telling you that you cannot afford to do this, you must hang on. And then you, again, you're aware enough to recognize those thoughts and realize that these are conditioned thoughts. And then you do the opposite.

And then gradually when you no longer reinforce the thoughts through your action, the thoughts will lose their power and gradually they will not appear again. So giving is a very powerful affirmation of abundance. And you may be surprised that when you give a certain percentage of what you have as a habitual thing, then the tendency is for more things to come to you.

If you give, even a poor, relatively poor person, unless you're absolutely and totally poor, there's always a possibility of giving even if it's small amounts. That's one. And another thing to affirm abundance is the appreciation of the aliveness and beauty that surround you in the present moment.

So there's a, when you appreciate what you perceive in the present moment, one aspect of this, what we call appreciation is to realize that these are all manifestations of the fullness of life, the abundance of life, the trees. Every tree has thousands of vibrantly alive leaves. The sunshine, the sun is a symbol of abundance.

It gives continuously of itself. It just gives and gives for millions and millions of years. It's just an outpouring of energy continuously.

It's a miracle. So even when you're aware of the sunshine and you appreciate that, that is already also any act of appreciation, one aspect of the act of appreciation is the act of the appreciation of abundant life, because everything that you appreciate is a manifestation of what actually, when I say the fullness of life, that's what it's an expression that Jesus used when he said, I want you to have life in its fullness. In some other translations, it's called, I want you to have abundant life.

What he was pointing to was, he always talks about state of consciousness. So when he says abundant life, he does not mean that he wants you to have a huge number of possessions. That's not necessarily, that possessions are a small aspect of abundance, but they're not the most important aspect of abundance.

It's a state of consciousness. Actually, the state of presence, one aspect of that state of presence is a feeling of the fullness of life, the aliveness of life. But ultimately, when I say life, you have, on the one hand, the manifested life that is in the external world, physical manifestations of life, but then there is the unseen life, the essence of life that inhabits every form of life.

So when Jesus uses the word life, he's referring to the essence of life, which is ultimately consciousness. And I want you to have the fullness of life, is to want you to have this realization of what the source of all life is. That is ultimately the fullness of life is the source of all life.

That's where the true fullness is. That is the fullness. So the appreciation of things that you don't need to, you don't need to own them.

You can just appreciate the beauty. You don't have to say, oh, when you see a flower, you don't need to want, oh, I want, I need to pick this flower and take it home. That's, no, you can appreciate, and then you walk on.

And you can even look into a shop window and see something beautiful. I sometimes do that, not that much these days anymore, but years ago, when I lived in London, I would often go for long walks in the city, just experiencing the aliveness of the city. And I would sometimes enjoy looking into shop windows and, oh, something beautiful there, but I didn't have the desire nor the money to buy it.

And even if I had the desire to, the money to buy it, I probably wouldn't have bought it and just, but there was an appreciation. And even now, I probably would be able to buy many things that I see in shop windows. I just don't have the desire to buy very much, but appreciate it and then walk on.

So that's a lovely, could even be a practice that you do until it becomes second nature to you. That you appreciate the manifestations of life because you're in touch with the source of aliveness, which is presence. And then you get the feeling of abundance, which does not really depend on how much you possess, how much you have, because you can have relatively little and have this feeling of abundance and somebody else might have huge amounts of possessions and continuously live in a sense of not enough, a sense of lack.

So that, to just add a practical afterthought to this, if possible at all, do not resent encountering difficulties or problems in your life because that's how it works. And it doesn't stop even if you awaken, even if you're awakened, there's still things that you get challenged further. Everybody gets challenged by life in one way or another.

You can't, even the trust fund baby gets challenged by life eventually. So when you encounter difficulties, small or big, see if you don't say this should not be happening. This is the underlying attitude.

If that's your underlying attitude, you're in a state of resistance. For example, many difficulties come in the form of other humans. Humans are difficult.

You might have noticed, many. So they come in the form of other humans. And then the underlying mindset for many people is, this shouldn't be happening.

These people shouldn't behave like that. What we're really saying is they should be enlightened. Why aren't they?

Well, what about you? So difficulties come in the form of other humans. And then you see, this is meant to be.

You're meant to be challenged by other humans. And you cannot not be challenged. No matter how conscious you are, you will encounter other humans who are not, or not yet.

And they will try to create problems for you. And sometimes they achieve that. And it is true also that you attract fewer unconscious humans into your life as you awaken more, the awakening.

It is true that you're not going to move in circles where you're surrounded completely by completely unconscious humans. But you cannot totally avoid contact with unconscious humans. In fact, they need to come into your field of consciousness because they can be helped in many cases by being in your field of consciousness.

But they can only be helped if you do not react when you encounter them. You see, you do what you have to do, but you don't, the underlying mindset is not, this shouldn't be, they shouldn't do that. They should know better.

Well, they don't. So then other difficulties come in other ways because you can encounter. So we just really talked about relationship.

Other humans means relationships. They can be the intimate relations of people living together. They can be relationships of people working together, other kinds of relationships.

Then, now this already makes up for a lot of problems that people face, it's relationship problems. And then you have others. If you don't have relationship problems, then life says, okay, I'll give him or her something else.

Then you have a work problem at work, usually connected with a relationship too, but maybe some additional factors. Or you have a health problem. You have a problem where you live.

You have a financial problem. That's a big one for many, not enough, or maybe is enough, but your mind says it's not enough. Who knows?

Shortage, the problem of losing your job, the problem of insecurity, which isn't a problem unless you think you should have security, that life is insecure. You don't know what's going to happen next to you. That can be a huge challenge.

But once you accept that, actually insecurity can contribute if you no longer fight it, if you don't demand that your life should be secure, it can contribute to the arising of presence because it forces you more into the present moment. Insecurity means you go into the future and see you can't control it anymore. You don't know what's going to happen next.

Oh dear, I wish I knew, I wish I had a secure job, a secure income, a secure family environment. I wish I had a secure pension plan. I wish I had a secure life insurance.

I wish I had secure this, insecure that. Then I would be okay. Of course you wouldn't.

These things are, if you remove the element of risk or insecurity from a person's life, this is similar to the trust fund baby, then you remove one of the most important areas where you can grow by being challenged. So sometimes the emphasis in our societies in the West is too much on security these days. I mentioned somewhere before, I read last year and I was going by a school, secondary school, and it was the beginning of the summer vacation and they had a big sign outside where there's always notices, they post notices.

And then on that big sign at the school, it said, have a great vacation, be safe. That sounds reasonable advice because you don't want to be unsafe, but is that the main thing of your vacation? I was, you come back after the summer, the teacher asks you and say, I was really safe.

What did you do? I didn't leave my room because I wanted to be really safe. So there is, life again needs to be a balance between security and risk-taking and accepting the insecurity, the basic insecurity of all life.

When I wrote The Power of Now, I was already in my late forties. And I didn't have a home anymore. That wasn't the time, the original time when I didn't have a home because after the original time, I did have a home, but then I let go of it.

And then I had a limited amount of money, as I briefly mentioned in the book, to finish the book. What would happen after that in my late forties? No life insurance, no job prospects, no income, no savings, except those that were running out, no home, no relationship even, nothing.

And that insecurity contributed to the intensity of presence through which the book came. It could have led to fear and it could have blocked me if I had demanded that my life should be more secure than it is. But I did not demand that security.

I accepted the insecurity and it became enormous presence because all security has to do with future orientation. So the more you have future orientation, the more insecure you feel because you cannot control the outcome. So the fact that my money was running out, that I had no home of my own anymore, I was just going from place to place, contributed to the energy behind the writing and the book.

So that's a wonderful thing. Some people cannot take that step, they feel, if I, that step into the unknown. The impulse that came to me was so strong at the time when I knew I had to leave England for the reason I didn't know.

And I had to move to the West Coast of North America, didn't know why, but the impulse was so strong, I had to obey it. Well, I didn't have to, but I did. But I'm sure if I had not obeyed that impulse, which didn't just come once, it was there every day, I would have probably fallen ill and maybe would be dead already by now.

So the life demanded that I step out into the unknown. If that is the case with you, then you know what to do. Without being rash about it, you still need to look at the practicalities.

So insecurity is one of the great challenges, wonderful. And all these things, of course, life insurance, these are just illusions. How can you insure your life?

First of all, life insurance isn't life insurance, it's death insurance, because that's what it is about. They just don't call it death insurance because nobody would want to buy it. So the universe, the one consciousness, whatever you want to call it, is awakening in every human.

And every human's essential identity is that one consciousness. So it's not a personal thing, because if you think yourself only as a person, then you have the delusion that you're an autonomous entity cut off from everything and everybody else. But you're not an autonomous entity, you are just a cell in this vastness.

And for a few years, the cell gives itself a name or is given a name, so-and-so, that's me. Me, me. It really changes your life when you, the way you feel, you sense your own life to be, you are the awakening consciousness in this body.

It's wonderful. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

First thing then, as I just mentioned, you may detect that very often you may be engaged in doing something, and yet there's something in the background that would rather not be doing it. Or there could be a complaining voice in your head in the background that says something about this situation that you are involved in, that you'd rather, because it might involve other people when they are not doing their best, and what am I doing here? All kinds of self-talk can come into resistance, can manifest in many ways.

It also manifests, we'll come to that in a minute, it also can manifest in the body. So you may find in any given situation, as your ability grows, your ability of inner observation, witnessing your inner state, you may find that you detect subtle forms of resistance. That's often to do with what you're doing, but you're not totally in what you're doing.

And another way of not being totally in what you're doing, of having continuous resistance running in the background is already wanting to be at the end of this particular activity, already wanting to be at the end of whatever it is that you're doing, let's say a simple thing, you're shopping, you're going to the supermarket, but you have so many other things to do today, so that the shopping in the supermarket is just an unpleasant obstacle because you're trying to get to the end of it as quickly as possible.

There's only one example, but there are all kinds of activities that can become unconsciously regarded as unpleasant obstacles towards where you really want to be or what you really want to be doing, which is in some future moment. So you want to arrive more at the end of this particular activity than be engaged in this particular activity. Now, many people live their whole life.

Almost every activity they do is of that kind in their daily life. Maybe when they're on vacation, if they're lucky, they have lived short amounts of time, perhaps they are free of that, but perhaps not even then. So this dysfunctional state greatly diminishes what we could call the quality of your life, the quality of the present moment because your life is the present moment.

So instead of fully acknowledging the doing of this moment, you would rather be at the end of the doing of this. Now, what happens then as a result, very often the result is what we call stress. That's what our stress arises.

You are here, but you want to be there, either in space or time.

You're here now, but you want to be in the later. When this now is over, that's where you want to be. Or you're here physically, but you'd rather want to be somewhere else physically.

You're doing your shopping, but you'd rather be at home. But when you're at home, something else arises where you would rather be or what you would rather be doing because then you're preparing your dinner, but you would rather be already done with it and finally able to relax. And when you're finally able to relax, some thoughts arise about what's going to happen tomorrow.

Problematic things never, never really aligned with the present moment. These are normal ways of living and they're not usually recognized as dysfunctional because almost everybody lives like that. When you watch movies, that's how they all live, with some exceptions.

And exception being, of course, humans who are beginning to awaken or are awakening or awake, whatever, you begin to live in a way that is more harmonious more and more aligned with the is-ness of the present moment.

[Speaker 4] (2:25:40 - 2:25:53)
And that is not to resist the is-ness of the present moment, what arises in the present moment.

[Speaker 1] (2:25:53 - 2:26:26)
So ultimately, since the present moment is all there ever is, since your entire life unfolds in and as the present moment, so therefore, when you resist the present moment, you are living in an antagonistic relationship with life.

[Speaker 4] (2:26:28 - 2:27:02)
And that is, no matter then what you achieve, if that is your conditioned mind pattern, you will never arrive at a place of real joy or happiness or inner peace, except when you are moving towards unconsciousness.

[Speaker 1] (2:27:02 - 2:28:50)
After a few drinks, you might become more into the present moment, but you're moving towards sleep. You're moving, falling below thinking. People are trying to get away from themselves because who they are is experienced as unpleasant because of that dysfunction.

So people are trying to get away from themselves in all kinds of ways, drugs and so on. And sometimes dangerous activities could help you to get away from yourself temporarily when you're climbing a rock wall or even when you're surfing, perhaps. You can't be thinking about your problems and you won't be then, and you can't be in a state of resistance.

You have to be fully there. Otherwise you will not succeed in whatever activity it is. You have to be fully there.

They have to be free of yourself, the resistant self, the egoic self. So that can temporarily free you too. But then once the activity is over, you go back into your normal resistant state.

And then you have to do it again. And then people then say, well, these people are addicted to the adrenaline rush they get when they're engaged in these activities, which is a physical thing that happens in the body. But there's more to it than that.

[Speaker 4] (2:28:51 - 2:29:01)
They are free of themselves for that. There's only the presence. There's no longer the person.

The person cannot be there.

[Speaker 1] (2:29:01 - 2:29:17)
The person ultimately survives the personal sense of self in the absence of awareness when there's only the personal sense of self. That's the ego.

[Speaker 4] (2:29:18 - 2:29:24)
And that cannot survive without resistance. It needs that.

[Speaker 14] (2:29:54 - 2:30:00)
Is the ego the source of our thoughts or are our thoughts generated elsewhere and pass through the ego?

Oh, thank you. There's no ego apart from the thoughts. The thoughts, identification with thoughts is ego.

But the thoughts that go through your mind, of course, are linked to the collective mind of the culture you live in, humanity as a whole. So they are not your thoughts as such, but you pick them up from the collective, most of them. And so you identify with thinking and the identification with thinking becomes ego, which means simply that you believe in every thought that arises and you derive your sense of who you are from what your mind is telling you who you are.

Opinions, viewpoints of that's me, that's some people talk to themselves and you are, oh, you are so good. Why doesn't the world recognize you? Or the mind says, you're no good.

Same thing. You're no good at all. You never, you fail at everything, don't you?

Again, and then you believe in it. And then you suddenly have a low view of yourself. Why do you have a low view?

Because you believed in your thoughts. And why are you thinking those thoughts? Probably you picked them up somewhere, maybe in childhood.

Maybe your mom was so stressed out that you said you're no good. And so you pick up certain thoughts and they get stuck in your head. Thoughts that you hear in childhood, they're little energy forms like entities and they get stuck in your head and don't refuse to go.

And the more you believe in it, the more deeply lodged they become in your mind. And so some people are stuck with very hostile entities. I'm saying entity, not in some spooky way, but every thought is an energy form and as such, we could call it an entity.

And there are many people in this world who are stuck with hostile, life-denying, continuously critical and attacking entities that they carry in their head and they believe that is who they are. And they are continuously attacking themselves. And if they are not attacking themselves, they attack others around them.

Let me tell you who you are. Of course, what they're really saying is, let me tell you who I am. So they project the famous, you know the famous saying, we don't see things as they are, we see them as we are.

Which means you look at reality through the screen of your thinking and your judgment, which is conditioned by the past. A dreadful prison to live in. It's like blinkers, worse than blinkers.

It's like looking at reality through heavy veils. Ooh, it looks so dark here. Is that a human being or?

So, and so the identification with thinking, believing in your thoughts, having no space outside of the movement of thought. Again, here we come to the vital thing, lack of space inside. That is the unconscious condition, spiritually, completely unconscious.

And then you are burdened with a heavy ego. You are the ego, which is not an entity apart from thought. It is thoughts that you have identified with.

And the first moment of freedom comes when you realize that certain thoughts have been going through your head for years, perhaps. And that they are only thoughts. And that you are not the thought, you're the awareness.

In my case, I became aware that I had a thought, for example, that started in childhood. One of many negative thoughts I had. Bad things always happen to me.

Bad things always happen to me. And that was, when I saw people around me, okay, they have got all these nice things. And always there would be bad things happening.

And of course, your perception then becomes selective. When you have a thought like that, you notice much more, because in everybody's life, things in daily life, things go wrong. You miss a bus, you get stuck in a traffic jam, or you lose some money.

But yes, this is normal. But if you have a thought, bad things always happen to me, you're extremely aware of those things. And they confirm to you that the thought is correct.

And this is the selective perception of reality through the screen of thinking. So the reality will confirm to you, not only that, that thought or any thought of that kind actually attracts bad things, negative things. Or if you believe people are basically bad, and that's a deep-seated belief, and you don't realize it's only a thought in your head or a belief, not only do you, would you single out where you observe unethical or bad behavior in others, you would, ah, there it is.

Not only that, you actually are much more likely to encounter people who manifest that kind of behavior, because you attract it. And so that's just incredible how people create their world. Through that, so freedom comes from stepping out, encountering, first of all, a little bit of space inside you, presence.

And then from there, you realize certain thoughts as repetitive and just a thought. Bad things always happen to me. Oh, there it goes again, I just thought that before.

So that's the, to become free of ego means becoming free of thought, identification with thought. That's the end of the ego. It may reassert itself from time to time, but at least that's the awakening.

What about your thoughts, habitual thoughts? Do you?

[Speaker 14] (2:37:38 - 2:37:45)
Probably that I have to get everything right. Those are the intents, you know, figure it out and get it right. It rules me.

[Speaker 1] (2:37:46 - 2:37:47)
And if it's not right?

[Speaker 14] (2:37:50 - 2:37:57)
I escape, I just won't do it. I pretty much predict ahead of time. So I won't try a lot of times.

[Speaker 1] (2:37:58 - 2:39:38)
Ah, yes. Yes. Some people are afraid of not succeeding in whatever they do, because they have a self, their self image, which is derived from thinking, would suffer.

If I fail at something, then I will, my self image will be injured. And therefore, I'm not even going to try. And again, that's to do with deriving your identity from thinking.

And even the thought I have failed is a lie. I am a failure is an even greater lie. You have not failed.

You can simply reinterpret it. I've learned something here. This is not for me, for example.

So, but why believe the lies that your mind produces? So, as you know, people, many people live with a very hostile mind. But those people, the motivation, their motivation would probably be very great.

I would hope to get out of their minds. But first, they need to realize that their problems are self-generated, mind-generated, not world-generated. Thank you.

[Speaker 14] (2:40:04 - 2:40:50)
Hi. Well, I wanted to ask you, I guess it's kind of a simple question in a way, but it's like, I feel like this whole present moment thing really works. And it's like, and so I feel like I'm so happy when I'm in the moment.

But then, you know, how do I balance that with actually being able to, you know, plan for the future? I mean, that, it's like, I don't know how, I mean, I can just be in the moment. And sometimes I feel like I can just be like this battery pack for the universe and just be so happy.

But I feel like I, then I'll wake up in the middle of the night and I'll have this anxiety about not taking care of the future or not doing the things that I need to do to take care of the future. So it's about balancing that. How do you do that?

Or do you have to balance it? Okay.

[Speaker 1] (2:40:50 - 2:45:43)
Okay. Well, the anxiety about not taking care of the future is of course losing the present moment. That's the real loss of the present moment.

But taking care of the future by doing some planning, constructive planning, even constructive thinking, not useless thinking and worrying and toxic thinking in the middle of the night, things what I should be doing or haven't done, or if I do it, it might go wrong. Not that kind of totally useless thinking, which is losing the present moment. Then there is the applied thinking, which is, oh, I need to work out what I'm going to do, whatever, schedule for the next thing I'm going to do, a plan for next year when I will have to do this or that, whatever.

And you may find that if you do focused thinking and apply it to whatever it is that you need to work out, is not losing the present moment. It's only useless thinking about the present moment that mentally projects you away from the now and doesn't get you anywhere. It detracts from the quality of life and detracts from your sense of aliveness.

So planning you can do in the present moment. Let's say I plan, where am I going to go? I'm going on a tour somewhere.

I was on a Europe tour late last year, and that had to be planned almost a year in advance. So already at the beginning of last year and before then, we were already talking about the Europe tour. And so what then, you look at the calendar, cities, geography of places where they connect, all the other factors that you need to look at.

You're not really losing the present moment because you're not projecting yourself mentally over there and imagining how it's going to go or imagining that when you finally give that talk in London, then you're really going to feel really fulfilled or projecting yourself to that talk in London when no one is going to like what you're going to say. And half the audience are going to leave. Am I going to be inspired when I reach London to give a talk?

You're just losing the present. This kind of thinking happens. It pretends to be useful and constructive, but it's not at all.

And it's not taking responsibility for anything. But applied thinking, and for applied thinking, it's good to give yourself a time limit, a space. You sit down for an hour or you talk to people and say, what do we need to do here in order to do this, that, that, that you're not losing the present moment.

Some people often, it's just not uncommon for people to have this question, thinking that I must never think about the future. But when you apply that, you're not really thinking about the future. The planning is now.

There's just, you're not projecting yourself away from the present moment. So it's applied and constructive thinking. The same with the past.

Sometimes you need to think about something that happened in the past. You need your memory for certain things. And then you need to kind of Google back there in your mind.

And then you talk about, well, but there's a reason why you bring it into the present, because you need that kind of memory or the knowledge. Perhaps you learned something there at the past Europe tour. Those things went very wrong.

The people had to line up for an hour and I was an hour late starting. It was disorganized. What did we do wrong?

That's fine. You have to go there. But if you, in the middle of the day, you think how dreadful that was, or you're blaming yourself or others about what went wrong, then you lose yourself in the past.

So you can use past and future without losing yourself in them. And then really you remain present even while you refer back to the past or while you make plans for the future. So that's really how it works.

[Speaker 14] (2:45:44 - 2:45:51)
Is there a way that you can, if you're happy, you can trust the universe that you're on the right path? Oh, yes.

[Speaker 1] (2:45:51 - 2:51:59)
That is an underlying thing, is of course the sense of connectedness with the deeper level, the deeper levels of your being, the awareness, the presence, the stillness, whatever you want to call it. And that gives you a certain rootedness. You're rooted in being.

And then what happens on the outcome of things that you do is no longer the factor that determines your state of consciousness. So when things go wrong, sometimes they do, you're not devastated. You don't, oh, you don't feel you're going to die because it went wrong and you didn't get there.

You tried so hard in the end, it didn't work out. And it's so awful. You beat yourself up mentally.

No, that's very dysfunctional and creates a lot of suffering. So you are less dependent on the, you welcome a good outcome, of course, but you're not dependent on a good outcome for feeling peaceful. And really complete in yourself.

And that sense of completeness in yourself, because there are two levels, as you know, that one could say the two dimensions. You are the person, but you are also the vast consciousness. So there's the ripple, there's the ocean.

The person lives in time and there's a development. The person learns things, gets better at certain things. And so on.

At the deepest level, there is already that sense of completion. You don't need to become anything. When you are connected with the depths of who you are, in that depth, you don't need to become, you are already complete.

On the level of the person, you're never really complete. And there are always things that could be called imperfections. Not, when you're connected, not huge things that create a lot of dysfunction in your life and make your life and other people's lives unhappy.

Not that kind of thing. But there are things that are certain personal things that are limitations on, you can't be, I have, my place at the moment is untidy. I'm not perfect there.

So there was a time when my place was tidy. So I'm not an untidy person continuously. But it started when I was writing the New Earth.

And then I couldn't focus on anything else while I was writing. And then things started to accumulate. And now I still get all these manuscripts and books sent.

And some of them are taking up more and more space at my place. So let's not go there. But that's an imperfection on my part.

If somebody had an idea of somebody who's fully awake, he must live in certain way. And then he comes and says, how can you, this is not tidy. How do you live?

Occasionally I have a cup of coffee, one a day. And occasionally people see me having a cup of coffee somewhere and say, why do you need coffee? You've written all these spiritual books and now you still need coffee?

I don't know if I need it. I just enjoy a cup of coffee. And I drink a glass of wine or two occasionally with dinner.

You drink alcohol? Well, if my state of conscience is so fragile that a glass of wine would upset it, then it can't be worth very much. So the addictiveness does not come in because the addictiveness would be something else.

If I were addicted to coffee and couldn't live without six cups of coffee a day, or if I were addicted to alcohol and wouldn't know when to stop drinking, that would be something else. But you can enjoy things, but people might interpret it as an imperfection and perhaps it is, but allow yourself to have your imperfections as long as they don't create suffering for others or yourself, become comfortable with things where you are not perfect. Some people are habitually, it's not a nice thing, it's not my problem, but they are habitually late.

Some people just have that. It's almost in their genes. I had a Filipino friend that I recently met her again after many years in London at university in Cambridge.

And it must be in the Filipino genes to be late all the time. And apparently when I talked to her, she said, yes, everybody's late. Nobody expects people to be on time.

And so, and that may be, she may not be able to get rid of that because it's in her genes. It says be late or you don't need to be on time or that. And that's fine.

That's how they live. It's not a problem in the Philippines. It might become a problem in the West, but not to them, to other people who might say there's something wrong with you.

If some things can change and that's good. And as consciousness awakens in you more, the awareness arises. It does tend to dissolve those patterns, as I said, that really F up your life.

[Speaker 16] (2:52:02 - 2:52:03)
Okay, thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:52:59 - 3:06:57)
But when I get really afraid of losing all my money in the stock market, of getting sick or losing a loved one, how do I handle that? Fear again, the question is about fear. How do I handle the fear of catching a disease, of losing everything?

Many things, many people are experiencing not only the fear now of the virus, they're also experiencing the fear of the repercussions of what's happening. Businesses are closing down or everything is closing down. It's a very strange thing that this is happening.

It's like an enforced closing down of the busyness, not just the business, but the busyness of the world, an enforced sudden ending of all that. Many planes are not flying anymore. There's some cities are empty of people or suddenly as if because until this happened, the world was absurdly busy, noisy, busy, everything was in movement.

Everything was lost in the world, lost in their minds. And suddenly, as if somebody said, okay, let's turn it off for a while. Oh, enforced stillness almost.

Exactly what millions of humans actually need to experience. It doesn't mean that they will automatically also experience the inner stillness, but there is a possibility of an awakening for many if they can go beyond the fear, the fearful thoughts. But how do you go beyond the fearful thoughts?

Well, it requires a little bit of awareness. But if you are here with us, you probably have that awareness. What I mean by that is the awareness of what's going on in your mind.

To recognize rather than total identification with what's going on in your mind, you have in the background an awareness of what's going on in your mind. Very different. Because it's a different dimension of consciousness, the awareness.

It's not the same as a thought. The awareness can recognize what thoughts are going on in your mind and you realize, I'm thinking all these useless thoughts, but that realization, I'm verbalizing it now, but because we are communicating through language, but that realization that all these useless and destructive thoughts are going through my head, that is a realization that is not verbal. It's pre- or post-verbal because it comes through the awareness.

And there's a simple recognition that what's going on in your mind is not helpful. It's making you fearful and unhappy. So it is to be tackled there.

All these, the problem that he mentions, he mentions, or he or she mentions three, fear of losing all my money or my savings, my investments, what I've been saving, of getting sick or something bad could happen to a loved one. So you have fear for yourself. You have fear for others.

And of course, all these things are not happening now, the things that you fear, but they could happen, says the mind. So I better think about it now because in case it does, of course, if they did happen, you would face the situation. You have, with the power of your conscious awareness, you would face the sickness, you would face the loss of money, and you would even face the loss of a loved one or the suffering of a loved one with the power of your presence, you can face that.

But what you cannot do, you cannot overcome these problems or face them because they only exist in your imagination. They haven't even happened yet. There's therefore, there's absolutely nothing you can do about them.

In fact, they will simply be amplified. The more you think about them, the more they become amplified. It's a totally illusory realm that is making you suffer.

And so if there's a minimum of awareness, you can suddenly become aware of what it is that you are doing to yourself. Well, it's not that you're voluntarily doing it to yourself, but one could say it is happening to you. So you become aware of what is happening to you because the thoughts in your mind, virtually all the thoughts in the absence of awareness happen to you.

They are not voluntary. So people say, I think this, I think, you don't think, the thinking happens to you when you're not aware. You're at the mercy of thought.

You are at the mercy of the energy field that is what we call thought. It lives in you. You are possessed.

You don't know it. The moment you realize it, that this is not the fearful thinking, isn't something that you do, because if it's something that you do, you say, yeah, I'm doing it, but I can't stop it. No, you are not doing it.

It happens to you. So some people say, well, perceive it as, well, why am I doing this to myself? Well, that's already, it's a good first step.

Why am I making myself suffer by thinking all that? And then the next step is you realize, well, it's not really me doing it. It's the self-serving thought forms that are swirling around in my mind continuously that are making me unhappy, that have no useful purpose.

I'm not helping myself or anybody by thinking these things, by projecting bad things that could or will, that could happen. And so with the awareness of what's going on in your mind comes the first time a moment of freedom, because before you had no free will. Without awareness, you have no free will.

You're at the mercy of a conditioned mind. So what do you do? So you have recognized that what's been happening to you fulfills no useful purpose.

That's an important realization because before there is an assumption in the unconscious mind that unless you worry a lot, then you're not controlling your life. There is the delusion that the more you think about the useless, but when you don't know it's useless, the more you think about the problems of your life, then you need to continue thinking in order to hold it all together. You need to really worry all the problems of the world.

If you don't worry, then your life will fall to pieces. It's the underlying assumption. Of course, it's a delusion.

So the worrying, the fearful thinking does not want to end. You need to know that, that it has a momentum and you cannot fight it. If you fight it, you make it stronger.

You give it added energy. So it's not by willpower that you can stop it. Or as I just said, you can stop it briefly, but not for long through exercising willpower.

So you stop it simply by first recognizing the not only the futility, but also the destructive nature of that type of thinking. And then you begin to see that a lot of the unhappiness is produced by the narratives in your mind. And at that moment, you have a choice.

You can continue being dragged along in the stream of fearful thinking, or you can say, my choice is now to take my attention away from fearful thinking. I'm verbalizing it. But where does it go?

If the fearful thinking wants all your attention, it wants all your consciousness continuously. It says, no, I'm letting go. I want it.

And then you say, no, I don't want to go that way anymore. It's very simple. You bring your attention somewhere else.

You need something at first. My recommendation is, feel your inner body. Direct your attention.

Let's say you wake up in the night or in the morning. Direct your attention. Instead of thinking, direct your attention into the inner energy field of your hands.

And then you hold it there. It doesn't require willpower. It's just a simple decision.

And you hold it. You feel the inner aliveness in your hands. It becomes an anchor for stepping out of mind, being present.

Can you feel the energy in your hands? I can. And it's always wonderful.

I've been feeling the energy in my hands for many years. It's always fresh and new. And I don't tire speaking of it because it's always fresh and new.

And of course, it's not just the hands. If you can't feel the energy in your hands, close your eyes and ask yourself if you're, let's say your right hand, or if you're left-handed, your left hand. Ask yourself if your left or right hand is still there or not.

Is it still there? How do I know it's there? How can I know it's there right now?

Now, you can't know it because you remember it was there when you saw it a few seconds ago. That's not knowing that it's there because it might have disappeared. You close your eyes, you're not moving your hand.

How can you know it's there? You can know it's there, but how does it happen? What is it?

How do you know it? You can feel it, but what is it that you feel? You feel the energy within the hand.

It's very subtle at first, so you need to be alert to feel it. But that alertness that then goes in the body is taken away from thinking. And it's, and you suddenly, your hand feels more alive than it was before.

But that's only the beginning. You can feel both hands simultaneously. And then you realize you can also feel other parts of the body, your feet at the same time.

And legs. And then you become aware of an all-pervasive sense of aliveness in the entire body, energy field. And the amazing thing is, oh, by the way, you may also become aware that you are breathing because that's connected with the body.

You're breathing into the body. And the breath flows in and it flows out. And the more you become aware of your body, the more you become aware of your breathing.

The more you become aware of your breathing, the more you become aware of the body. There's a wonderful aliveness there. And what happened to your mind activity?

It subsided almost completely or completely because you cannot be aware of inner body and at the same time think. A few fragments may be there of thoughts, but not a sustained stream of thinking. It's not possible because all your attention, your consciousness has gone away from the conceptualizing mind into the inner body.

[Speaker 10] (3:07:07 - 3:07:59)
My question is about children. And it's a growing concern of mine that we have an increase of anxiety with children. And as an educator, what can we do to help them with this?

The anxiety in you or the anxiety in the children? In the children, they're labeling it. And at five and six years old, they know that there's a label for it and it's called, they're anxious.

And I've been teaching for a long time and it just seems to be getting to be greater and greater, young children and older children. How old are the children that you teach? The ones I have are primary, so they're grade one and two.

Grade one and two, nice.

Yeah, it's unfortunate, isn't it? You're experiencing that so early. A lot of fear, yeah.

Yeah, yeah. Are you free to do meditation in your school? That's a good question.

[Speaker 10] (3:08:19 - 3:09:06)
It is something that we're starting to do in the Canadian schools. And it's growing in popularity. And certainly, yes, we are allowed to do it, certainly in the public schools.

Okay, so they wouldn't be against you doing that? No. Okay, do you do it with them?

I do my best to do it. It's something that I'm learning and evolving with, so they do like it. The ones that are anxious actually like it probably the most.

But I'm not sure I'm doing it the right way and I was wondering if there are any strategies to use with children to help them maintain a sense of calmness.

[Speaker 2] (3:09:09 - 3:09:49)
So it's important that you center yourself first and you remain calm and be calm. And that's sometimes hard to do in your job, I could imagine. Right.

So it's going to be your practice first and foremost. As well, you can bring that in with the children, start the day, your day each. You get them all day, don't you?

When they're grade one and two? Most of the day. Most of the day.

So you can start the day with the meditation, just being quiet, just being still.

[Speaker 10] (3:09:51 - 3:09:57)
And do you have any understanding of why this is getting worse?

[Speaker 2] (3:09:58 - 3:13:41)
Oh my goodness, wow. You know, we've lost that connection to being. We make things, the world, more important than our own state of consciousness.

So it's, and we teach that to our children right away. You know, we're happy when they say their first words, we reward them, we're like, ah, yay, you know? So they'll, and it's not a bad thing, don't get me wrong, I'm not saying words are bad.

But from the moment that they come into this world and they begin to, then their brains start to form and they start to grow. They are constantly looking outside of ourselves. And that's a natural thing to do.

As Eckhart mentioned, it's natural. You can't stop a child going through the stage of age two. Mine, mine, this is mine.

Where did they learn that? Suddenly they know that it's mine and they don't want to share it. So they'll go through that process of developing an ego until it gets them in trouble and they realize that, you know, they now have to now unlearn all that.

So we can't stop that natural stages that human beings have to go through. However, we can be the light in which we can hold and help the child go through it. So with this anxiety that's starting in very young children, I mean, there is more entertainment in the world.

There are more devices in the world. I mean, now when we are out to dinner or lunch or something like that, and we see a family sitting at a table, they're not even connecting with each other. They each have their own devices.

I kid you not, they are really on their devices. As well, parents now, because they're so stressed out, it's easier to put your kid in front of a device than to have to really be with your child. So it's important that, and this is the part that you won't be able to control, just as the parents cannot control what's happening at school.

They can do either best and do their best. So they're getting little aspects here and a little aspect there. So whatever their home life is, okay?

And whatever their school life is, and here you are, awakened consciousness. Now you have an opportunity to have them for that whatever, four, six hours a day, and you are creating this field of consciousness. And they get to experience that.

And this, it's vital, it's important. You can't control what's happening at home, but you can give them the gift of love and acceptance, and hey, this is a place where you can actually relax. You don't have to be stressed out.

You don't have to be anxious. And then they get to experience that. Now, when I had, my childhood was, you know, very dysfunctional, a lot of pain, body, in everybody, in my parents.

[Speaker 1] (3:14:17 - 3:30:18)
My ego is really aggressive. It comes up without me knowing. Only after the ego is gone do I find out how can I manage my ego sooner.

That is not uncommon. It's probably more than you, the questioner, who has that, who experiences that. As more presence arises, so first of all, it's important to invite presence into your life in ordinary situations, when you're not being challenged by another person.

The anger mostly is probably with people or situations, but most situations involve people. So be present when you're out in nature, by not labeling things, by being, by observing in that state of alert attention. And presence then emanates more and more through you.

This doesn't mean that necessarily you will, next time the ego comes up, being aggressive, it comes up so quickly that you can't catch it in the moment. But as more, as the presence in you grows, manifests more strongly, usually what happens is the time period that elapses after you've been taken over by anger, gets shorter until you reach a point where a few seconds after it's happened, you suddenly realize it's happened again. Whereas before you might have read it several minutes or even an hour, in some cases to the next day, you realize, what was that?

When you had a huge drama with somebody, probably involving the pain body, your pain body is probably predominantly has the anger vibration predominantly. And pain body that is not recognized as pain body becomes part of the ego. In the same way that any thought that you completely identify with becomes part of the ego.

In the same way, an emotion that you completely identify with becomes part of the ego. Once you recognize the pain body as the pain body, then it is an energy field in you that still operates. But strictly speaking, it's no longer your ego.

Ego can only operate as long as you're unconscious. So although sometimes people say to me, I'm able to observe my ego now, in the way I use the term ego, that's no longer true. The moment you become aware of your ego, it's not really ego anymore.

It is still a behavioral or mental, emotional pattern that operates in you. But you are present when you know that there is this pattern operating in you, then you are not it. It operates in you and you are the space around it, which is the consciousness.

You know it's there. Then before it was ego, yes. But when you recognize it for what it is, it's no longer ego.

Ego means unconsciousness. Ego means complete identification. So whatever you recognize in yourself isn't really ego anymore.

And so then as presence grows in you, you reach a point when immediately after this episode, pain body episode, anger episode has just happened, you suddenly realize, oh, it happened again. And then I predict if it hasn't happened to you yet, it will, a time comes, perhaps very soon, when in the middle of it, it already has taken you over and you're shouting at someone. And in the middle of it, you realize what's going on, that you've been taken over by that.

You still may not be able to stop it, don't have to, but the awareness is there in the middle of it. And that may happen many times. And then you may find the awareness is there just the moment it begins to arise.

The moment the anger pattern wants to come in, the awareness is also already there. Now, whether or not at this moment you can stop it, we don't know, and never stop it by suppressing it. You stop it simply by shining the light of awareness on it.

That eventually stops it. So you can, and then at that, when the presence is strong enough for that, then you actually begin to have a choice. Do I choose to engage in the same way through my pain body in this situation?

Is this the best way of dealing with the situation? You may not literally ask yourself that question, but it is implied in that state of awareness. You have a choice.

You can no longer at the mercy of the old condition pattern. And then it begins to dissipate. So I predict that this will happen, that presence more and more will come in at earlier stages, and then in the middle of it, and then at the beginning of it.

But you need to cultivate or invite presence into your life in ordinary situations, in helpful situations, so that it can be there in challenging situations. Don't rely on challenging situations alone. That's not going to work.

Invite it into your life in situations where it's easy, but situations that lend themselves to presence. Nature, walking in nature, looking at the sky, or if you can't get out into nature, look at a flower, just for half a minute, a minute, and not just look. While you look at a flower, and this is just one example, it could be anything natural.

While you look at a flower, not only are you not only aware of what it is, you're looking at the sense perception. You don't need label. The name of the flower is irrelevant, all that you don't need for this.

You look at a flower, you can not only see whatever it is that you see with your visual sense, your sight, but there's more to the flower than what you see with your visual sense, and that is an alive presence. Very hard to talk about it. You remember the, I believe I quoted it the other day, from the saying from Saint-Exupéry, all that is essential is invisible to the eye.

What is all that is essential is invisible to the eye. So all of the flower is beautiful. Within the flower, there's hiding a presence that is invisible to the eye.

The flower has a presence there. It is not by accident that in many spiritual traditions, flowers are sacred symbols. In Buddhism, for example, and other traditions, certain flowers are sacred symbols.

The mandala itself, the sacred mandala paintings, basically many of them are based on flower designs, flowers are naturally occurring mandalas. And so there is, what is essential about the flower, yes, there is the external beauty, but the real meaning of beauty is there is an inner essence there. But you cannot sense that when you are looking at the flower through the screen of conceptualization.

So you have to drop the screen of conceptualization, which is thought, and look at the flower and give it a little bit of time, and then you begin to sense something. But where do you sense that? You sense it in yourself.

What is it that you sense in yourself when you look at the flower? It's both in the flower and in you. It is the essence, the animating consciousness behind this manifestation of, this beautiful manifestation of form.

There is, beyond the form, there is, we could call it the animating spirit. And that is the same animating spirit, which is consciousness, that is in you. When you have access to it in yourself, you can sense it there, but giving complete attention, for example, to a flower can be very helpful in deepening the access you have to it in yourself.

So the flower can teach you stillness, because the flower is very still, and teach you other things, because stillness is only one particular signpost that we use to speak of it. So you sense the basic, the essence of the flower, which is sacred, and you can sense the essence of yourself, which is sacred, and you can somehow sense that the essence of the flower and the essence of yourself are one and the same. And that is the recognition of oneness, which is all, all the ancient mystics and so on have spoken about this.

And that is just, you love it. Basically, that means, that is what love is. You recognize yourself in the other.

It doesn't have to be another human being, or it's beautiful when you recognize yourself in another human being, but you also recognize yourself in nature. So this is important because that brings, so allow nature to teach you stillness. Now, nature, of course, embodies a completely different degree of consciousness from yours.

I will now make a mystical statement. You don't have to believe it. The flower loves it when you give it attention, because you add something enormous to the flower by giving it attention.

The flower is not aware of its own beauty, it just is. And when you unite your consciousness with the flower, through you, because ultimately you're not, the separateness that we see in the physical is not really there. Through you, the flower gets a glimpse of self-recognition.

The flower recognizes itself. So when nature is waiting for you to recognize it, and what nature alone is also involved in, it is part of the evolving universe that is becoming more conscious. And humans are an essential part of that on this planet.

So when a human becomes conscious of nature, the nature through the human becomes conscious of itself. And it's an amazing process. Whether or not this is true, you have to kind of find out for yourself by being more attentive in nature and giving, honoring what's there.

And as much as possible, relate to nature without the screen of knowledge. When you need it, it's fine. If a child asks you, what's the name of this flower?

You tell the child what the name is, but hopefully you don't say, this is a rose. Hopefully you say to the child, it's called a rose. There's a very big difference between saying, this is a rose, because that would be saying to the child that this concept is what it is, that the sound rose is that.

No, it's only a name. The name of it is rose. And so to prevent the child from getting lost in concepts at an early age, always, once you have taught a word, always bring the child back to the actual experience of it so that the child does not come to the misperception that the name of the flower is a flower.

There's a depth to the flower that gets totally covered up when you mistake the name for the flower. So that's why when you truly want to see it, you have to remove the mental label and you can only do that by being present. The alertness rises and then you communicate, you relate to the flower without the screen of concepts.

So this was something to do with presence, this part of the answer, although I went some distance away from this, the answer of anger arising and catching it. So it's vital to generate presence in normal life, in nature, and so on, so that it's there when the pain body arises.

[Speaker 15] (3:30:47 - 3:31:01)
I want to speak about loneliness, pain body, because since two years I'm traveling alone, trying to do like you, like doing nothing.

[Speaker 16] (3:31:07 - 3:31:08)
I'm trying.

[Speaker 1] (3:31:09 - 3:31:10)
That's a good try, yeah.

[Speaker 15] (3:31:14 - 3:31:42)
And then I have difficulty to accept this nothingness, and so then I spend time on devices, on Facebook, and then the pain body arrives, and then sometimes I see the world like it doesn't exist, and that other people are like robots. So it's a lot of suffering. I don't know how to overcome this kind of feeling.

[Speaker 1] (3:31:43 - 3:31:47)
So you've been traveling for a couple of years?

[Speaker 15] (3:31:47 - 3:31:55)
Yeah, like one year and a half. I started with India, and then now I'm following you because I went to Norway, New York, Costa Rica.

[Speaker 1] (3:31:55 - 3:32:00)
Okay. And you're not running out of money yet? No.

[Speaker 15] (3:32:02 - 3:32:03)
The universe gives me what I need.

[Speaker 1] (3:32:03 - 3:32:06)
Okay, that's good. That's a good sign.

[Speaker 15] (3:32:07 - 3:32:15)
But it's about like this connection with the world when I am alone and with devices.

Yes, you're not in a relationship at present, and you haven't been for the past two years, and the relationship has not arisen, or do you on purpose avoid entering relationship? Okay. Well, whatever it is, learning to be with yourself, at ease with yourself, loneliness can be a great thing when it comes transformed through acceptance into solitude.

Solitude only arises when you accept your aloneness, become completely present, and suddenly you sense your own presence. Which does not need anything, is already complete. Which is not to say that on the level of your form, there may not be a need for some company, whether it's physical or emotional or mental or altogether.

On the level of form, you will continue to experience certain pulls and certain needs. On the level of form, if you have no relationship, you may feel that sense of needing something to complete you on the level of form to some extent. That's not a problem if you are rooted in your essence.

You can be aware that on the level of form, there are certain needs, and these needs may be met at some point, or right now they may not be met. And that no longer matters that much. It is only of relative importance whether you have a relationship or you don't have a relationship.

On the deepest level, you don't need it. On a slightly up, on a form level, you're not complete. There's masculine, there's the polarities of yin and yang, not necessarily always related to the biological masculine feminine, but you are either, if you are yin, you need some yang.

If you are more yang, you need some yin. And that operates on the level of opposites and of form. It may be advisable for you to engage in some kind of activity so that you can not only practice presence by doing nothing, because it was never my decision when it happened to me.

It was not my decision to do nothing for a couple of years or so. By the way, I'm still good at doing nothing, but. But it wasn't my decision to do nothing in order to achieve some state.

The doing nothing arose because already I was so deeply immersed in presence that I had lost the balance as a human being. I had lost the balance between human and being. Because that, I love that word human being, the English language doesn't have a word for man and woman, like German has Mensch, which is the word for human being.

But in English, you have to use two words. But there's the human part of you, that's the form. There's the being of you, that's the essence.

Ultimately, everybody needs to be in some kind of balance between those two. I was immersed in being so deeply that I lost the balance. I wasn't unhappy about that at all, but I lost the balance between the human.

The human became so unimportant to me that I didn't do anything to even, I knew what am I supposed to do with my life? Even that didn't arise, that thought. It was so delicious, delightful to be immersed in being.

And that's how this period of complete, not complete, there was some activity because I had to occasionally get little jobs to survive. And occasionally people gave me money. But I did have temporary jobs to survive so that I was forced occasionally to come out a little bit out of the being.

But I didn't last in any job for very long. The moment I had enough money, I would stop again. So I got temporary jobs at various places.

For two weeks, I worked at the Kennel Club in London, filling out forms of puppies that had just been born of different dogs. The, fortunately they had no computers at that time yet because that would have been beyond me. So there was just that the bliss of being was so all-consuming that the balance between the human and the being was lost.

And then it only began to reestablish itself when people started coming to me and asking me questions. And the question pulled me out of the being because an answer was required, but the answer came from the being. So when I started answering questions, suddenly there was a flow and the answering of questions became my doing.

So that's how the balance got reestablished slowly. I would not necessarily seek inactivity as a way of achieving some kind of purpose presence, it is sometimes easier to engage in some activity and even engage in relationships and see if you can stay present there. But it all comes back to really the present moment, whatever it is, wherever you are, wherever you are.

Is there enough intensity in you not to be drawn into mind for long periods of time? Is there enough intensity in you to stay present in that state of aloneness so that you can be the consciousness rather than the person, you are the consciousness. And it could be a great opportunity that you're able to do that, to just travel and explore, but you already went to India.

And so you did not seek, you did not find what you were seeking perhaps. And then you came to Eckhart and there you did not find what you were seeking perhaps. And the only place where you can find what you're seeking is within you in the present moment, doesn't matter where you are.

So intensity of presence is important to cut through mind. Are you motivated enough to have that intensity of presence? And it could well be that there's not enough suffering in your life to provide the motivation.

So that is a possibility, but that's not a problem because it'll come. If... My sense is that right now it's just too easy for you.

It's too easy. So the suffering is, I mentioned before, the best motivation for liberation is the desire to escape from suffering or realizing the possibility that is possible to be free of suffering. And that's why the Buddha chose that term to describe his teaching, which is very wise.

What's my teaching about? The Buddha said, I'll tell you what it is about. It's not about enlightenment.

It's not about achieving God realization. It's not about that. He's the end of suffering.

So it seems that he attracted mostly people who were at that stage where that meant something to them. I don't know if you are at that stage where the end of suffering means enough to you to provide the intensity for awakening. I was suffering.

That was the motivation. I didn't even have a name for awakening. The wonderful news though is, life always gives you what you need.

And it could well be that if you continue your life in this way, the way in which you live will create more and more suffering. Perhaps the loneliness will become unbearable. And so, and then the suffering of the loneliness might drive you into relationship.

And then something may go wrong in the relationship. And then the relationship will become unbearable. And then you will seek out another situation and something will go wrong there.

And then that will become unbearable. And then suddenly you will want to be free of suffering. And there you have the motivation.

So whether you carry on the way you are now, fine. Life will give you what you need. Or if you think, okay, I'll try a relationship.

Great too. You will find the necessary suffering to get you there. Here a related question.

As I'm awakening, I'm becoming more aware of how often I'm angry and it is getting tiresome. How do I manage the expectations of myself? Well, let's see.

So you need to manage the expectations and then you need to manage the anger. Anger management and expectation management. Expectation means you beat yourself up for being unconscious, which is more unconsciousness.

Because the mental image of who you are says, I'm not good enough. I can't do it. You see, been at it for 25 years and I still can't do it.

You can't possibly be any good if you still can't do it after 25 years. Those are thoughts that float around in your mind. And how do you feel?

As I suppose that's Byron Katie would ask that. How do you feel when you believe in those thoughts? Not good.

You're beating yourself up and you feel an emotion. Feel bad about myself. More ego, more conceptualized identity.

In your mind, concepts in your mind about you, you derive your sense of self from that. More of the same. So the, let's say it's anger, and then you wake up after the anger reaction, say, I did it again.

I'm no good. So you have the second egoic reaction to the first one. Ha, ha, ha.

Good. Anger is something that is, comes in in many people very fast. So there may not be, unless there's already considerable presence power in you, there may not be enough presence to catch it.

It takes you over before you know it, especially old reaction. And before you know it, you're talking and shouting and you are not doing it at all. It's the pattern.

It's the mind pattern, mental, emotional pattern in you, which often related to what I call the pain body, which is old, accumulated, painful emotion, which could be anger, which could be a deep, depressed sadness. Anger is a very frequent one. The pain body energy is just waiting in people who have accumulated old anger, going back to childhood, feeling powerless.

And what does a child do when the child feels powerless? Start screaming, that's all it can do. And sometimes it works.

Sometimes the parents come and say, okay, you can have the sweet if you scream loud enough. So it's powerlessness is always behind anger. And the ego pretends that there's your power there in anger.

But anger arises out of a sense of powerlessness. And there's often fear hiding underneath it. And when you are there looking at it, then you realize that at firsthand within yourself, there is a sense of powerlessness behind it.

And the ego is pretending to be powerful when really it's in a state of fear. You can see it even with little dogs. The smallest dogs are the most, bark the most.

And whenever they're little, I've seen little dogs, whenever a big one goes past, they get angry. Arf, arf, arf. Arf.

Arf. Arf. Because, I mean, if I were that size, I would do that too, probably.

Arf. Arf. Arf.

Arf. Chihuahua, or your little sweet little Bichon Frise. And a mastiff walks past, or a Rottweiler, who looks very quiet because the Rottweiler knows its own power.

It doesn't need to, it goes. Arf. Arf.

Arf. And the little one goes, arf, arf. Arf.

Arf. Arf. Arf.

Arf.

[Speaker 16] (3:49:26 - 3:49:27)
Arf. Arf.

[Speaker 1] (3:49:32 - 4:07:32)
Arf. But with dogs, we smile when we see that because we somehow recognize that pattern. And we smile, and probably the Rottweiler has an inner smile, too, when he walks past.

But with humans, it's more difficult to smile when they go, arf. And words come streaming out of their mouth. It's more difficult to smile, and what it's possible, not necessarily, you say, don't necessarily smile, but recognize it for what it is when you see it in another.

Don't equate that with who that person is. Recognize it, that the person has been taken over by that energy field. And that already is a wonderful thing.

That already, we could call, is forgiveness in a wider sense. We don't equate unconscious behavior with who that person is. If we equate it with who that person is, that is, that's the real meaning of judgment.

Judgment is not to say to somebody, I realize that you get angry a lot, and that person then might tell you, are you judging me? No, it's a fact. If I see that you get angry a lot, that was just a fact, there's no judgment in it.

But if I equate that with your essential identity of who you are, you are an angry person, and then I always expect more anger from you, that's a judgment. Not recognizing a pattern that operates unconsciously through humans and taking that for their identity is judgment. And you can do it to yourself.

So you can judge yourself for those things. And that is just as much ego as judging somebody else. You can beat yourself up and call yourself no good.

And whatever else the self talk tells you in your head, it calls you you. In many people's minds, when they talk, when the mind talks to you, it says you. See, you are such and such.

You see, you can't do it. Sometimes it says I, it might say I in some people, but in many it says you. Isn't that strange?

You talk to yourself in your head. One part of your mind condemns the other part.

When you see it, you can rise above it, and there's a suddenly an awareness that comes with it.

You're no longer trapped in those patterns. I would recommend particularly to become particularly alert when you know you're getting stressed. Something, a situation is building up in some kind of, for example, if you get, anger takes over when you get stressed, could happen.

When you feel stress building up towards it, you can become very alert so that you can, doesn't take you over. What you know the anger is about to come. Or if it's, if you know certain areas of your life are more likely to wake you unconscious, sometimes you know just beforehand that those are going to arise in the next minute or so.

And then you can be alert, feel the entire energy field in your body, be alert with every cell of your body, then pick up the phone and talk about the financial situation with your investment advisor. So that, and so you treat those as spiritual practices and realize nothing is more important than consciousness, not the situation, it's consciousness. Some people's pain bodies are, consist, as I said, predominantly of anger.

And you can, in some people, you can sense their semi-dormant pain body in the background, even when they are not particularly angry right now. But there are people who are waiting for the next opportunity to be angry. That's their pain body.

And sometimes when you are sensitive towards other, you can feel energy fields, you can sometimes sense in other people they are waiting for an excuse to be angry. Somehow, when you look into their eyes, it's already there, but it's not them. It's that which occupies their inner energy field, it's the pain body.

And so they're waiting, and any excuse, and they will get angry at you or whoever it may be. So you become a grievance looking for a cause. Thank you for your teachings.

They have changed my life. I have a fear of aging, getting old, ugly, irrelevant. I'm not an obnoxiously vain person, but I'm critical and judgmental about how I look.

Thank you. Of course, everybody here suffers from a fatal affliction. It's called time.

And eventually, it's going to kill you. But before it kills you, unless it does that very quickly and suddenly, and if it doesn't do it very quickly and suddenly, before it kills you, it does things to you. Do you notice those things that it does to you when you look in the mirror in the morning?

And especially if you compare it to a photo taken 20, 30, 40 years ago, you notice the effect of time on you. And then it does something to the body too. But it does that to all forms, to all life forms.

It does that to an apple, just goes more quickly. If you put an apple on a windowsill for a few weeks, then you know what's going to happen to you. And I saw another related question about looking after our appearance.

And the questioner, he is afraid of getting old, ugly, and irrelevant. You may not need to get ugly because the less you identified with your external self and as you grow old, the opportunity is there for you to identify more and more with the presence. And the presence shines through the fading form.

And when the presence shines through the fading form, it's actually very, very beautiful. It's different from the kind of beauty that's there when you're 20 years old. And it's like the apple that's just been, just fallen from the tree and it's still not totally fresh.

And you have that biological, might have maybe beauty in this. So that's nice too, but it doesn't last. There's a deeper beauty that can shine through and it happens to those humans who are connected with the presence that they are.

And then you don't turn ugly. In the absence of that, if you're only identified with your physical form, then I must admit it could happen that you turn ugly. Irrelevant is another word the questioner uses.

In our civilization, old age is not valued. So people who grow old have the feeling that they are irrelevant or they are regarded as irrelevant. Old age is not associated with wisdom in our civilization because our civilization doesn't even know what wisdom is.

It's not highly valued. Cleverness, yes. High IQ, yes.

And whatever else, but not wisdom. How do you measure it? What is that?

But that is going to change. We already have in traditional cultures, ancient, older cultures, the elders are the most important people. And in the Western societies, the elders are the, well, to be charitable, they're called the elderly.

And they are somewhere in a home. And you visit them once or twice a month. And then they sit in their chairs watching TV.

Not realizing the opportunity of old age because nobody has told them. So you can appreciate your appearance if it happens to be good and you're still relatively young and your body looks good or your face looks good. You can appreciate that in the same way you appreciate other things, lovely things.

There's nothing wrong with that, but it would be important when you look in the mirror to also feel your presence so that you don't get excessively attached to the external form. You can appreciate it, but there's no need to be attached to it. Look how you can only not be attached to it if you can sense the underlying presence.

So when you look in the mirror, maybe you even apply makeup. They apply makeup to my face before I come on because it looks too oily otherwise, apparently. And I noticed last night it actually does because last night I didn't have makeup.

I saw myself on the little screen. I said, I'm very shiny. And it wasn't the emanation of presence that was coming.

It was a different kind of shininess. So before I go on camera, they apply makeup to the face. Does it mean I'm vain because I don't want to be shiny?

Maybe. So you may apply makeup, especially if you're a woman, men, I don't know, some men might do it too, I don't know. And there's no reason to think, oh, should I really, or shouldn't I, or there's something wrong with me if I do it.

That must be ego if I apply makeup. Don't complicate life too much. If you want to apply makeup, apply makeup, but while you apply makeup, feel the underlying presence.

And while you look in the mirror, sense the presence of yourself, the presence of presence, the stillness. And then it's not a problem when suddenly you look in the mirror again and you realize that 25 years have passed and you see, oh, the apple doesn't look the same anymore. It's wrinkly.

There are bags under my eyes. And then you suddenly feel the presence more strongly. And one day, perhaps you'll be 90 or 100 and you'll just emanate presence while the body is just getting shrinking.

And somebody comes and asks you questions and your answers may be simple, but there's wisdom there because you speak from presence. So you have not become, or you might've become old externally, but you have not become ugly and irrelevant. Time is a strange thing.

I described it just now as almost, it's one way of looking at it, at something that is ultimately going to destroy you. And it does that to everything, but you never catch time. You only catch the evidence it leaves.

It's a criminal. That criminal commits all kinds of terrible crimes, murderous sprees, and you can never find the criminal because all you can ever find is the evidence left behind by the criminal, which is dead bodies, but they all appear in the present moment. There's only ever the present moment.

Nobody can experience time as such. So time exists and doesn't exist. It exists on the surface of things.

But does not exist in the depths of yourself.

[Speaker 13] (4:07:49 - 4:08:15)
My question is, with medications, how do you practice presence when you're forced to take medication, in particular, for very painful ailments?

[Speaker 1] (4:08:16 - 4:08:24)
Yes, so do you take your own regular medication? No, I don't. No, I don't.

But you have been. But I've taken medication for toothaches, in particular, and sad to say, when I was in Africa, I had a toothache, and when I took the medication, because of my addiction conditioning, even when the pain went away, I kept on taking the Chordine. So for a full month and a half, I was in this Chordine haze in Africa.

But then when I came back to the United Kingdom, I did stop, and I have enough presence not to take it if it wasn't for the trigger of the pain of the toothache. So I just want to ask, what do you do when you have a toothache?

I take medication. I'll tell you what I take, and it does not seem to affect my mind at all. What I take, I cannot get in North America, the United States or Canada.

So whenever I come to Europe, England, it's made in England but I can also get it in Ireland and places like that. And in Australia, they sell it too. So I always stock up because I do get toothaches occasionally and sometimes I get headaches, not very often these days, but it can happen.

So the only medication I ever take and it's pretty rare too, is this, it's basically aspirin but it's soluble aspirin because of a throat dysfunction I have, I cannot swallow pills. So I need to dissolve it's soluble aspirin. It's called Disprin, I highly recommend it.

It's called Disprin because it dissolves in water. So in extreme cases of a toothache or that, I take that, two of those in a glass of water. I notice no difference, strangely enough, in my consciousness when I take it but there may be other types of medication which if I took those like codeine, I think is what called, that might affect my consciousness in some way.

I don't know how. Also something that we need to also talk about is not just medication that are pain medications for the physical pain. We also need to mention in this context, medication that is prescribed to millions and millions of people for mental states such as antidepressants and tranquilizers which also of course affect your mind and may diminish your capacity to stay present because it may send you into a haze as you put it.

So now the, it's a terrible thing, for example, how many people, I know that in some extreme cases, I have to be careful with what I say because in the past I've made some doctors in the audience very angry. And I don't mind making a doctor very angry but I just want it to be balanced what I say. I know that in extreme cases, medication for mental conditions can be helpful in extreme cases.

There's no doubt about that. And there may be some people who are surviving due to it but there are millions of people who don't really need it. But the first thing the doctor, for a moment I'll just talk about the mental medication then I'll come to the physical.

But the doctors, even millions of children are being prescribed certain types of medication that affect the mind. And that is a huge mistake, I believe, except in the aforementioned extreme cases. So there's an addiction, a huge, huge, massive, mass addiction to prescribed drugs, prescription drugs.

In addition to the addiction to so-called illegal drugs, well, one of them is now becoming more and more legal. That's okay. So, but a huge amount of dependency on and addiction to mind altering drugs.

And so they are specifically there to alter your mental state. And then you have the physical drugs that are meant to do something else, but have a side effect. They affect your mind also.

So I'm often asked, and I have often been asked, what about antidepressants and tranquilizers? And I could include now in this certain types of pain medication, should we take it or should we not take it? Can one still be present?

And that may vary from, there are many different types of medication. Whether or not you can still be present depends on two factors, mainly. One is how deep or strong your presence is.

When your presence is shaky, when it's just arising in you, even one or two glasses of wine can affect your presence. And that's why I basically, I forgot on this retreat, why I often recommend, if possible, don't drink alcohol while you're on this retreat, because if your presence is not, has not fully emerged yet, it is still just a tender plant. It can be affected by a small dosage of alcohol and you lose presence.

So you order a glass of wine and you say, obviously I'm not going to have more than one glass. And after one glass, your awareness has already gone down. So you don't remember anymore that you said that obviously I'm not going to have more than one glass.

And then because your awareness has gone down, you say, okay, I'll have one more. One more, please. And there you go.

I mean, you know that you've been there. Oh, yes. Now, another interesting thing is when you're, so the extent to which you are affected by certain types of medication partly depends on how powerfully the presence is already active in you and through you.

So if it's just a tender little plant, it gets affected easily and immediately. But if you're already firmly established in presence, you will notice a change in your mind, but strangely, it will not affect your awareness. I'm speaking from personal experience and I'm not telling you how and why.

I frequently, I confess. Almost every evening with dinner, I have a glass of wine and sometimes two, but rarely more than two. After two, that's fine.

After the second glass, I notice a small change in my mind. Hard to describe. It's a small, you describe it as haziness.

I don't know if I would use that word in that particular case. I know that there's a slight difference in my mind, but my awareness is there as before. Presence is there as before.

So there's a presence behind this change in the mind. Another example, a few years ago when we were in Amsterdam, you know what's coming now. No.

No. No. No.

No. No. No.

No. No. No.

No. No. No.

everywhere else too. So I said, well, I tried it 20 years ago. I didn't do anything.

I didn't like it. And they said, well, you must not have inhaled properly. So we got some and in the hotel room, I tried it.

And I could notice that it certainly did affect my mind but the witnessing consciousness was untouched by it. The witnessing consciousness was actually witnessing the haziness in my mind. So, and then I found that I don't need to do this again because my usual state of mind or consciousness is much more pleasant than the one after the smoke, much more pleasant and peaceful without, I don't need the haziness, but I can see that a person who is tortured on a daily basis by his or her mind can find some relief in that haziness that comes with smoking.

And I would not necessarily outright condemn every use of this. After all, it's only a plant. So for some people, it gives them some relief.

It's not the way to go. It's not the way you want to go, but it can have a little opening. I also tried acid once, but don't need to mention that because it's basically the same story.

So it did not affect the awareness in me, but this is my personal experience. Now, I have not experienced mind-altering drugs like prescription drugs, as far as I remember. I think I, the, so the question that is often asked of me when people say, can one still be present when one takes these drugs?

I can't really answer. I would have to actually to give you a truthful answer. First of all, it would be subjective because I can only tell you if I can still be present when I take this drug, I would have to try it.

And I would have to try every drug to give a truthful answer. So only you can know if you cannot stay, if it completely obscures your presence, then of course it's best to refrain from taking this, except in very extreme cases of toothache, in your case. But I used to suffer a lot from toothaches because for many years in my life, I couldn't afford to go to the dentist.

And I had a kind of phobia of dentists because I went to a very bad one once and the memory stayed in my mind. And with regular visits to dentists, the likelihood of having toothache diminishes. So that's a helpful thing.

You have the, in the United Kingdom, hopefully, or you can probably afford it, but it's free, I suppose. So in extreme cases, I would try, let go of codeine and try Dysprine. That's my spiritual advice to you.

Since I've been here, I feel like I'm doing the conscious suffering and I feel like I opened the top of a sewage and it just keeps coming and coming and coming. And I don't have my usual distraction methods like internet or alcohol or anything. So it's really, I'm being really present with it and I'm trying to also stay aware when the stories try to latch on to the pain and then I realize that it's just trying to make sense of it and it feels like an ancient pain.

And I'm surrendering to it, but at the same time, I feel exhausted and my physical body feels weak. And I'm just wondering, is there something I can maybe do for myself to just not so much ease it, but just somehow like go through it a little bit with a bit more strength or comfort or for physically speaking?

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (4:22:50 - 4:32:16)
This is the strength. You are going through it without any of your addictions, whether it's the internet, alcohol, drugs or whatever. You are, this is strength.

The fact that you are going through this without any devices is strength. The only thing is is that the mind is telling you that you may have a picture of what strength is and maybe you have a picture of strength is when you feel really good and when you feel really happy. And that's a different kind of strength.

But this is a strength of emptying our baggage. And there really isn't any easy way, but just to go through it. Now, this is a critical point for you because you're at this where now you feel like as if, oh, I want it just to be a little bit easier.

And that's the point where maybe you might watch yourself and you see where you might pick up your device or have a drink or whatever your normal things that you do to not go through something. And there's hundreds of things out there that we could use as our devices. But this is the critical point.

And you're right, it is exhausting. So why not just be exhausted? There's nothing wrong with being exhausted.

Maybe you have an image of yourself that you should not be exhausted, that you should be this, I don't know, happy bubbly person or somebody who looks really strong and who isn't tired or, I mean, the physical body gets tired. Emotional work to feel it is exhausting, especially when it's been a well of emotion that we have to go through. I'm tempted to say something at the same time I'm not because I don't want you to choose this because you wanna run from this, the emotions.

There was one time where I went through really, really very strong emotions. It was very difficult, very hard. Dark night of the soul, some people would call it.

And then the fellow that I was dating at the time, who was also awakening as well, he said to me, well, you can ask for it to be slowed down if you want. I went, really? I mean, that was a thought?

Okay. So I said, yeah, okay, I want it to be slower. And I got it.

But when I look back, it's something that I regret because now over time I have these little inklings of having to go through the dark night of the soul instead of going through it, just going through it. Now, we're gonna choose what we're gonna choose and whatever, however reason that happened, it happened like that. And it's an acceptance that it happens like that.

It's just a longer process. So if you can, I invite you to just really go into it. Allow your body just to be tired, rest more.

Go into, do an inner body meditation. There was a time during some deep meditation that I would go through, like a lot of meditation. And it was in the evening, it was bedtime.

And my body slept, but I was fully awake. And just watching my body sleep, feeling my body sleep. And yet my eyes were open the whole time.

Like I couldn't move, my body couldn't move. Our body is not our consciousness. So we can be conscious and have the body do its thing because it's an impermanent device and it gets tired.

And we can allow it to sleep, rest, yet be fully aware and conscious. So this is what I'm inviting you to do when you say you're tired. Go and lay down and rest your body and be fully aware, awake.

I mean, you may fall asleep and that's okay, it's not a problem. But it's an important time to now just nurture yourself in the, probably would feel like an enveloping emotions that just are there. So do some things for yourself that will nurture instead of going to your devices, whether that means taking a hot bath, although I don't know if there's bathtubs here, whatever makes you feel more grounded and not so lost in the emotion.

So the fact that there is an awareness and you are the witnessing presence to this and you feel it, those two together are the vehicles for transformation and for letting this go. It's just, unfortunately, because whatever is down there, we don't know. We don't even know how long it's been there for and how much we've held down there.

So we don't know when it's going to end. So don't even go into your mind and say, I just want this over with. Of course, the mind wants this over with, but it's just having to go through it one by one or 10 by 10, it doesn't really matter.

It's just your experience in this moment. And if I had to guess, your mind is telling you almost like, I shouldn't be unhappy, but you're unhappy. And it's the happiness and unhappiness that we so desperately want on the conditioned level, on the level of form, which is not going to be the true happiness.

As we go through this, we have to go through, go to what is deeper, that is the uncaused happiness. So happiness that is not caused by any particular event or unhappiness that is caused by any particular event, not caused by any particular event. And this is the play and the balance that we must bring and that our consciousness, being aware of it, brings that.

So the full acceptance of that pain that is arising and allowing it to arise and feeling it while at the same time connecting to that awareness, that consciousness, who or what is aware of that pain? That awareness is who you really are, not the pain. The pain is something old that's there, something very old that needs to be let out.

[Speaker 12] (4:32:20 - 4:32:29)
I feel like a lot of it is not even mine. Yeah, probably, maybe it isn't. Some of it, some of it is.

[Speaker 2] (4:32:31 - 4:41:16)
But yes, we are, as we are the awakening consciousness through us, our individual forms, we are also awakening that which is, you can say past, present, and future, but there's no past, present, and future. You've heard of the 100th monkey syndrome where if there's enough people, a transformation happens, like everybody sort of goes into it, you know? Like for example, you get enough people talking about, I don't know, a particular thing.

Let's do the Coke, because we did the Coke commercial, okay? Enough people see that, and there's something happens, and enough people drink it, and suddenly it's like just spirals. It just like, everybody now changes.

And it could be on the other level, unconscious level, where there's enough people that are unconscious. It could take one person, say like, example like Hitler, who has somehow enough, in a way, charisma that he had, because his speeches were actually incredible, but it was that unconscious aspect of him that he was able to gather enough people around him where it almost turned that whole, the whole country into that. So the awakening consciousness that happening through each and every one of us, at some point, if there is enough of that, enough people that are awakened, something will shift.

So when you say you feel like it's just not yours, it is true. We are, past, present, and future, you can say, on a spiritual level, exist in the timeless realm, manifests in the body still, still here, still with us. It's like bringing something with you here to the present moment.

And when we awaken, we actually then, because we're so tied to each other, there's one connection, as we awaken, and something happens also on that level out there, whether it's past or whether it's future, because it really doesn't exist. I had this experience one time in a church in Switzerland. Some of it was old, some of it was new, and I was in the old part, and I had this experience where I just couldn't move my body because I saw past, present, and future happening all in this moment.

And when I saw that and had that experience, I realized that, wow, there is no time. On the spiritual level, there is no time that all dimensions are happening, but we only see a portion of that dimension. So we are more than just our body and our minds.

We are more than just our emotions or the events that happen to us and now that we have to work through because we just didn't have that ability to work through it then. But we can become lost when we lose that dimension of space in us, of stillness, and think that we're only this. And when we think we're only this, that's when it becomes difficult.

So let your light shine even more on this, not by wishing it to go away, because when you have even the slightest desire for it to be gone, you haven't fully accepted. Full acceptance means that you are willing to feel this forever. Yeah, I know.

But you know what? You know it'll change. Everything changes.

So this moment is not gonna be the same the next moment or a week or a year from now, but full acceptance actually means you're willing to accept this forever. And forever, on the form level, it just doesn't exist because all forms are impermanent. When you know that on the spiritual level, then you can really say, yeah, I'm willing to accept this, fully, completely, because we know that it will change.

But if you're not on this, the consciousness, the higher consciousness, then you think, oh my God, are you kidding me? I don't wanna feel this forever. Because remember, full acceptance has no time.

There's only this moment. And this moment and the experience of this moment is what's happening inside you now. So this is where the mind and the body are fighting each other, the mind and consciousness, the consciousness that you are.

The mind is still saying, oh yeah, but I really don't want this. I'm willing to feel it, but there's something in me that doesn't quite really want this. And then be honest with yourself and choose.

When something arises in you of an emotion, you can ask yourself, am I willing to let this go? Not with the mind, but feel your body, and your body will answer you. If it's yes, your body will open.

There's an openness and a relaxedness that'll happen, that you're able then to let it go. Maybe you're not willing to let it go, and that's okay. So then you can ask yourself, okay, am I willing to accept this?

Because the acceptance could be also the integration. Am I willing to integrate it then as part of my experience of the totality of who I am, of body, mind, and spirit? Because maybe that integration, that acceptance on that level is kind of stirring the pot in you.

There's a movement that begins to happen when we accept it as an integration into our beingness, body, mind, and spirit, that it becomes and transmutes, transform into the one consciousness, so we can then use that experience as a teaching tool for somebody else, perhaps. So this experience, which is aki, we can say, let's call it aki, if we fully accept it, and we are the awareness, and we witness it, we accept it, allow it to be there, it goes through a process, a transformational process in its own time, and all we have to do is just be awake to it, aware to it, and it just transforms, like water, boiling water turning into steam, and transforms and connects with this life that we are, and then soon enough, it's just this life.

We have the memory of that experience, and now we're able to perhaps use that as a gift for somebody else who is going through the same thing. Just got to do the work, sweetheart.

[Speaker 9] (4:41:48 - 4:42:09)
For someone who's a little bit hyperactive, what's the best way to get a balance between removing content, which is really good, but then not getting annoyed when content comes in, and you think, oh, it's spoiling my peace. Is there some way to get a balance?

[Speaker 1] (4:42:09 - 4:42:12)
I assume the question applies to yourself.

[Speaker 9] (4:42:12 - 4:42:13)
Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (4:42:13 - 4:42:42)
So that someone is you. Yeah, yeah. Okay.

Just wanted to make sure. So you are hyperactive. Yeah, yeah.

Now, rather than explaining it to us in an abstract way, can you give an example, or one example of where this is problematic and how it manifests in your life?

So for example, here after the talks, I can go out to the nature, and I get a glimpse now of some kind of presence. Yes. And I also want to engage with other people, but I know once I get on a roll, for example, speaking how good the talk was, I'm into just a torrent.

So it's almost, should I just go and sit in the park for hours and hours, but that's too extreme probably. I'm creating probably more content, trying to analyze whether to stay out of the way or...

[Speaker 1] (4:43:21 - 4:43:27)
So when you engage in conversation, then do you tend to speak fast or...

[Speaker 9] (4:43:27 - 4:43:29)
Yes, yeah, yeah. I just totally lose...

[Speaker 1] (4:43:29 - 4:43:32)
The mind takes over and you're dragged along.

[Speaker 9] (4:43:32 - 4:43:32)
Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (4:43:32 - 4:44:34)
Yes. Now this being dragged along by the mind happens to many, many people, but perhaps you slightly more extreme form, your mind is even more powerful than the normal mind. And so you're dragged along before you know it.

Yeah. And so do you tend to sometimes avoid interaction in order not to be dragged along? Yes.

Yeah. So it's either you get dragged along or you sit there and can't interact. Yeah, it's like two settings, full blast or off.

Yeah. When somebody talks to you, of course, what is, how do you experience yourself when you listen to somebody? What is your...

How do you listen to another person? Is your mind already preparing what we're going to say or...

[Speaker 9] (4:44:34 - 4:44:43)
Yeah, definitely. Whenever anybody tells me the name, never ever remember it because I'm probably somewhere else when that's coming in. Yeah.

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (4:44:45 - 4:44:52)
Have you done any practice, meditation, any kind of meditation practice, formal meditation?

[Speaker 9] (4:44:53 - 4:45:01)
Yeah, I try. And I'm guessing if I do reasonably well for that first five minutes, when I get up and go outside, it's lovely.

[Speaker 1] (4:45:03 - 4:45:18)
Now, when you're out in nature by yourself, are you able to be present to some extent or is your mind still active while you're looking at the trees or at the sky?

[Speaker 9] (4:45:18 - 4:45:25)
To some extent now, I can. So that's progress definitely because I couldn't do that before.

[Speaker 1] (4:45:25 - 4:45:33)
So... So you find little spaces when you're of presence when you're not interacting with people.

[Speaker 9] (4:45:33 - 4:45:39)
Yeah, like wet tarmac for some reason, just, yeah, that works. I don't know why.

[Speaker 1] (4:45:40 - 4:46:02)
It's just a reflection of the... Oh, well, the most unlikely things can help you. That's fine.

It doesn't really matter what it is. So... Do you, are you in a relationship, married or...

No, no, no. Do you, have you had relationships?

[Speaker 9] (4:46:03 - 4:46:04)
Yeah, but yeah, yeah.

[Speaker 1] (4:46:05 - 4:48:14)
Not enough. Okay, the but is enough, but... I don't want to go too deeply into it because I'm not a psychotherapist and don't need to be.

Well, I would recommend that you practice here. There's still some time left. Everybody knows now who you are.

And the people here are much more conscious than people you would normally meet in everyday life. And everybody will be very happy to help you and to help you. And you can also help, for example, by just refraining from giving too much input when you're interacting, engaging in conversation.

Be more a listener than a speaker. Make that your practice for the time being. I'm not saying don't say a word, but be more like 80% a listener than a speaker.

And that, for example, you can do by asking questions when you're, rather than stating your view or whatever it is, ask questions that encourages the other person to speak more. If the other person speaks more, it forces you to listen and then make the listening into a practice while the other person is speaking. Are you able to, let's say, at any time, to feel your inner body?

Can you feel that?

[Speaker 9] (4:48:14 - 4:48:18)
The hands, but then I seem to lose them quite quickly.

[Speaker 1] (4:48:18 - 4:49:12)
Okay, but hands, you can feel the energy in your hands. The rest of the body is more difficult? Yeah, yeah.

Okay, well, it's a good start. It's a start. So I suggest that once you've asked a question, while you listen, you direct your awareness into the inner feeling of your hands.

And that keeps it there so that it doesn't, your mind doesn't take off. So you ask a question, where are you from? How long have you been with Eckhart?

How did you first discover the books? Have you been to other, many questions you can ask and people will be happy to help you by answering your questions. And they will be happy to help you by not asking you too many questions.

[Speaker 9] (4:49:13 - 4:49:15)
Yeah, no, thank you, that's good, yeah, that'll help.

[Speaker 1] (4:49:17 - 4:50:48)
So, and so while you listen, have your attention in the inner energy field of your hands. If you can amplify that and have your attention also in other parts of your body, for example, your feet and hand at the same time, that's even better. But hands is fine too.

So you feel your inner, the aliveness in your hands and from there you listen. And you know, just give it, this will help you prevent the stream of mind from taking you over. So that's the beginning of a little practice.

Another practice you can do is while you listen, you're aware of your breathing. And so you can even bring the two together. You can be aware of your breathing and your hands, but it's probably better for you to just choose one, one or the other.

So please help this gentleman and allow him to ask you some questions and give exhaustive answers. And don't ask him any questions, except, well, I'll ask you a couple of questions so you don't need to ask him. Where are you from?

[Speaker 9] (4:50:48 - 4:50:49)
Yorkshire in England.

[Speaker 1] (4:50:49 - 4:50:54)
Okay, Yorkshire, England. And so you don't need to ask him that.

[Speaker 9] (4:50:54 - 4:50:55)
So that's good.

[Speaker 1] (4:50:59 - 5:07:02)
And have you been to retreats? Before here with us here? No, it's the first one.

First one, okay. Well, that's another question you don't need to ask. Okay, I believe you can get there.

So, and of course, in addition to this practice with people, go out into nature and be engaged if necessary, even involve other senses, not just the visual sense or for most people, the visual is the predominant sense, but also perhaps touch something, see what it, a leaf or plant, pick up a stone or on the beach, the sand or whatever it is, water, give it, be aware of the tactile sense perceptions.

All these things help you get out of your mind. And so, well, I wish you well in your practice and thank you. I am late a lot.

How do you be fully present, but also keep track of what time it is? Now, you may be surprised to hear that as some people are, that I wear a watch and I actually look at it quite often and I'm rarely late. Now, this is nothing really to do with presence because many people are not present at all, are late all the time.

And some people who are present may be late because they're not used to looking at a watch or they don't wear a watch. And there's absolutely no incompatibility between being present and being aware of what time it is or how much time you have left to go to a particular place because presence is the timeless dimension of consciousness. And it just means that what falls away is psychological time from your mind.

Now, what I call clock time or watch time, practical time, of course still operates in your life and in our civilization. So it's, you don't lose presence if you wear a watch. You can lose presence with or without a watch.

So it's just really changing an old habit of yours. So you can try wearing a watch and then you occasionally you look at it and say, oh, I have 10 minutes left, 20 minutes left. Are you leaving the present moment when you look at your watch?

No, because you're looking at your watch in the present moment. And an interesting thing about watch, unless you can have a watch with a dial or of course you can have a digital watch, digital watches. Some people wear a digital watch with just the numbers.

I would prefer, and if you are in doubt which one to buy, I would suggest that you get one with a dial because there the time is also represented spatially and you can actually look at a watch and know how much time you have left to get to your appointment if it's a dial because you have a spatial representation of time in your watch. If you look at the minute hand, maybe there, and let's say the minute hand is on the nine and you need to be somewhere on the hour, then even without a single thought in your head, you can know how much time you have left because you look at the space on your dial between the minute hand on the nine and the full hour 12. So you see a spatial representation of time on your dial which means it requires no thinking whatsoever.

So that's quite good. So looking at your watch does not need to stimulate thought. With digital, digital is more likely to stimulate thought and when you look at the digital, immediately you read out the number in your mind and then you have to figure out how much time you have actually got left.

You have to figure out the minutes and you have to start thinking. So a watch with a dial is to be preferred and then perfectly fine, no loss of presence whatsoever knowing that you have this space of time left to get ready, then you just get going. So it's tried out.

If you're not used to wearing a watch, maybe it's a little strange at first. Many people these days, I understand, especially younger people don't wear watches anymore but they're constantly looking at their cell phones so that's okay. It tells them what time it is and on your cell phone, you can have a dial, I suppose, you can change or you can have the digital.

Always prefer the dial. You can actually, another little practice you can do is look at your watch and know what time it is without any mental activity. Then you can, there's a knowing there which has nothing to do, you're not telling yourself what time it is.

You just know it by looking. It's a little practice. An additional reason why I wear a watch is that I, and this is simply a personal taste of mine, I like the ticking of mechanical watches and I like mechanical watches, the old-fashioned ones that you wind up because a lot of attention has gone into the making of a mechanical watch and somehow when a lot of attention, focused attention has gone into the making of something, somehow the end product is imbued with the sense of quality.

You have to pay a little bit more, of course, for a mechanical watch these days although they are not quite as accurate as the cheaper quartz watches. So practice, experiment a little bit with that. I'm not saying it doesn't matter whether it's mechanical or not, but the main thing is practical time does not need to interfere at all with presence.

A question here about what to do. Remaining silent in order to refrain from responding to a person's pain body. How do I respond without responding to the ego, the pain body of the other person?

Staying silent seems to only fuel their fire. When somebody has been taken over by the pain body, almost anything, well, probably anything you do will fuel the fire. Staying silent, not saying anything may fuel the fire and whatever you say will fuel the fire even more.

Staying silent is probably preferable to interacting with the pain body because if you interact with the pain body, and I'm talking about a situation when the other person has been taken over completely by the pain body. If the pain body is actually, there's a remnant of awareness in the other person, then one can still communicate, but you would still be communicating to the other, to the person if there's a remnant of awareness. And to know that if you said, let's say it's your partner, and I always recommend that when you're both conscious to have an agreement with your partner that to point out to the other that the pain body is arising when you notice it and you both agree that you will help each other be conscious of it.

And if that's the case and you've done that, then as the pain body begins to take over your partner and of course the partner is about to lose consciousness completely, you can say, I think that's your pain body coming up right now. And if there's a remnant of awareness in him or her, the person will say, it is? And would kind of put attention within it.

Yeah, I actually do feel very angry right now because of what you said or whatever it is. It's okay, there's a remnant of awareness. They're saying it's the pain, but there's a moment of, okay, let me see if that's true.

If the person has been taken over completely, you will no longer be able to communicate with that person. And if any communication will be received by the pain body, so you're not, and any answer that you get will not be your partner's. I'm differentiate now between your partner and that which takes him or her over.

When he or she is totally taken over, communication becomes virtually impossible because whatever you say, the pain body will answer back. And it will never, the pain body cannot admit that it is the pain body. The pain body always pretends to be the person.

So when you say, oh, you've become your pain body, can't you see? Of course they can't see, they're totally asleep. And you're talking to the pain body and the pain body will not say, yes, I am the pain body.

The pain body will say, don't give me that nonsense. Look at your own stuff. Why do you put it onto me always?

And you go on and on and on. My pain, you look at yourself, why do you always be yourself? You remember what you did last week?

That was the pain body. So whatever you say to the pain body will be wrong and will fuel the fire of the pain body. If there's a remnant of awareness, that's a different matter.

Then something is still possible. So if there's no remnant of awareness, then say as little as possible, be as present as possible, or compassionate if that's possible. Pain bodies are very challenging.

So high degree of presence is necessary. And sometimes the best solution is to remove yourself for a while so that the pain body can naturally come to, that particular episode can subside. So if you do remove yourself and go for a walk, then the pain body and the other person for a while will continue to renew itself through their thinking.

Or they might even make phone calls to somebody else to renew. But then after a while, it'll come to an end. And then hopefully a few hours later, or the next day, awareness comes back in.

And then there's the person that you know has come suddenly come back. I haven't seen you in a while. So it needs to be particularly strong when you're in the presence of a number of people who are mind dominated, as most humans still are.

It needs to be particularly strong when you're with somebody who is mentally disturbed.

[Speaker 6] (5:07:07 - 5:07:30)
How do I stay present with my family members when we're all together? And this comes up at dinner time. I can be present with myself and present with one family member.

But when there's three of them together or two of them together, my presence goes out the window and I get caught up in the drama of what's going on.

[Speaker 1] (5:07:30 - 5:07:37)
So how do you lose presence? You get drawn into- I get drawn into it.

[Speaker 6] (5:07:37 - 5:08:07)
I also have a special needs daughter, the younger one, and she wants my attention. My husband wants my attention. And I have a teenage daughter.

He usually doesn't want my attention at all. Yeah, but it's a dynamic there. And then my husband and my teenage daughter going at it and me wanting to protect her and then take care of the younger one's needs.

I basically just want to run away, not come back home. Yeah.

Yeah, well, that's also very good practice. You have to just be aware of what's going on and how, if you are able to not lose yourself. When you give attention, as you must give attention, of course, it's wonderful to give attention to your child or to another human being, but not to lose yourself in the giving of attention so that you are connected with the source of attention, which is within you, without losing this connectedness with a source, then your attention can flow and you can say something to your child, say something to the other, without losing yourself in that movement. And again, inner body awareness can be the anchor for staying present. So as you sit at the table, you have to feel yourself, feel your inner being.

And then you're rooted in being, and then you can give attention and you can feel the connectedness with being. You're not lost then in the mental realm. They may be, but something, if there's only one person who stays connected, it usually affects the entire energy field in the room, in the same way that a deeply unconscious person also affects the entire energy field in the room.

And if there is a deeply unconscious person there, for example, a deeply negative person that may not be the case in your family, then there would have to be, your presence would have to be quite intense to counteract that. It doesn't fight it. You don't fight the darkness.

Just the light needs to be stronger. You turn up the dimmer switch, but you have to turn it up anyway to some extent as you sit with people at home. There's also the additional factor that people with whom you share a lot of past, it's sometimes more difficult to stay present with them than people with whom you don't share so much past, people, acquaintances, friends, but family members that goes back often a very long time.

And, but it's a lovely challenge too. So practice when you're always just with one or two people there, and then there's enough presence power in you so that you can sustain presence even when there are more. And now you're, it's required, what is required here is vigilance of your own energy, your own consciousness.

Now, without the vigilance, we could call it attention too. As one Zen master explains that the essence of Zen is just this, the raised finger, which means that was his explanation for Zen. That's all that's needed, is attention.

That means alert presence, vigilance. So it needs to be particularly strong when you're in the presence of a number of people who are mind dominated, as most humans still are. It needs to be particularly strong when you're with somebody who is mentally disturbed, intense vigilance, intense presence required.

It needs to be particularly strong when you have a physical condition and a serious so-called illness, then that can be the motivating force for intense presence or vigilance. So this is, you can see how much more helpful the raised finger is than conceptual explanations. You cannot conceptually explain what presence is or what vigilance is to the mind because it immediately takes you beyond the mind.

And sometimes people ask, I had somebody after a week-long retreat some years ago who asked, can you just give us, just explain again the concept of presence? I just want to hear again what it really actually is. I didn't quite get it.

The entire week was a practice of presence. But his mind said, I didn't quite get it. Of course it didn't get it because he was expecting to understand conceptually.

And he thought, if I just explain a little bit more, then he'll really become present. No, I've already said too much. This presence is just attention.

Attention is non-conceptual intelligence. It's the spacious awareness, this. Attention basically means there's little or no thought.

There's just consciousness, just the light. So you shine the light on people and then you can speak and the light is still there. And you speak, the presence is there.

In other words, as I'm speaking to you now, the presence is there, but the words are also there. They come out of the presence. And if there's a child here that says, daddy, daddy, he just took away my toy.

Tell him not to do that or whatever they say. You can look at him in that lovely presence in which there's also, there's compassion and benevolence. It's all part of that.

And you look at the child and say, okay, well, just don't talk now. You say whatever comes to you without losing yourself in the drama, the daily drama, the drama of daily existence, the nervousness of that. So that's your job.

[Speaker 6] (5:14:45 - 5:14:46)
Thank you. Thank you very much.

[Speaker 1] (5:15:05 - 5:38:52)
You feel something huge is missing in your life because your mother doesn't understand you. But that's because you believed in the thought that says that this should be when it isn't. And so you feel this enormous burden, which is not really created by your mother.

It's created by your own mind. For 46 years, I've been constantly criticized, capital letters, by my mother for everything. I always felt fear in her presence trying to fulfill her expectations.

I couldn't handle her criticism anymore. And three years ago, I decided to stop any contact, but I suffer painful fear, guilt, and hatred. I'm exhausted.

Please help. Yes, so you've gone from one unpleasantness into another kind of unpleasantness. If you see that your mother, whatever your mother says is totally conditioned by her mind, she's playing the same old record, CD, it's not records anymore, but nowadays, what do you play?

The old download or whatever. What? Yeah.

So to realize whatever comes out of her mouth is her mind regurgitating the conditioning throughout her lifetime, and perhaps being conditioned by her mother and so on in that way. So perhaps you've been thinking all those 46 years or whatever it was that there was some meaning or significance to what your mother said, but basically, it was just the noise of her mind, and she believed in it. She believed that whatever her mind repeated and repeated was the truth, there were certain patterns.

She could never get beyond being the mother. She knew better, of course, when you were four or five, but she couldn't let go of the belief that she knew better when you grew up. She couldn't let go of the role of mother.

It continues to play in her. And so can you see that what she is doing is simply a replay of her mind without believing that it has any significance and so approach her in a state of compassion because she's completely at the mercy of her conditioned mind. And you don't have to buy into what she says because, of course, many people think, I really, I need my parents to understand me.

I want my mother to understand me. And they feel very unhappy if they're not being understood. And it may be beyond the capability of your mother to understand you.

And it certainly is beyond the present capability of your mother to understand you. So she is limited. You have to recognize her limitations in this lifetime.

Maybe before she dies, she will go beyond. Before death, it's possible. But for the time being, she's very limited in her state of consciousness.

And that is not to look down upon her, but to see it with compassion that what she does is extremely repetitive. And not to believe your own mind when it tells you that she needs to understand you. I need my mother to understand me.

Do you? Yes. Okay.

What happens if your mother's understood you? The mother says, now I really understand you, how you live. Oh, thank you.

And now what? It's just another same present moment. Or before the mother says, what you do is all wrong.

You shouldn't have done this. Why didn't you do that? Okay.

Same thing. It really makes no difference whether she understands you or doesn't understand you, except that your mind is telling you that it does make a difference. You visit your mother.

You have a cup of tea with her. She understands you. You go off and you look at the sky and you take a breath and it's the present moment.

And then you remember, oh, my mother understands me. Or you go and have a cup of tea with her and she continues with her old patterns and say goodbye and go off and you look at the sky and take a breath and you say, oh, she's still in her old patterns. Well, that's how it is.

It makes no difference unless you believe your mind when it tells you that it's dreadfully important that your mother should understand you. And that happens when you believe every thought that comes into your head and then the thought can make you unhappy. My mother doesn't understand me and you feel something huge is missing in your life because your mother doesn't understand you.

But that's because you believed in the thought that says that this should be when it isn't. And so you feel this enormous burden which is not really created by your mother. It's created by your own mind.

So your mother is not to blame. You have to see that your own mind is creating this enormous burden. And when you see that, you can actually, you can let go and allow your mother to be who she is in that particular conditioned form right now and allow her her limitations.

I had a similar experience with my mother, although not as extreme as your experience probably. My mother did not continuously criticize me, but she made it very clear that she was unhappy with the choices I made in life. And sometimes she implied it.

She said, oh, well, you could have done so much, couldn't you? You had so many chances, didn't you? And with your intelligence, you could have done so much.

And I was already 45. And she said, but you threw it away. Oh, well, let's not talk about it.

And so allowing her, her limitations, with not, as I said, not looking down on her and say, you are so limited, but compassionately allowing her, that's how she, that's her mind, mental conditioning. She thinks in terms of a man needs a career. He needs to make money.

He needs to get married and have children. And he needs to show that he's successful and all those things. And that didn't happen with her son.

And she wasn't happy about that. So she couldn't go beyond the conditioning of her mind because that was conditioned by the particular culture she grew up in. And I could see that and it was fine.

Now, a little earlier, we talked about likes and dislikes. I had love for my mother because I could occasionally, one could actually glimpse beyond her conditioned mind. And occasionally you could see her being shining through her eyes when she stopped talking.

And that was just wonderful to see that, that aliveness in her eyes and the beingness in her. And even when she was talking, I could still sense it in the background. So I didn't have to react to her words.

I can allow the words to pass through me like some sound of leaves in the wind without any particular meaning or significance. And that was fine. And yet talking about likes and dislikes, I didn't like staying with her for more than a few days because it got too much.

Although I loved her, my preference was, after five or six days, to say, okay, I have to go now. And she got used to that and it was fine. I would come once a year, sometimes twice a year, and visit for a few days.

And that was surrender to that. My choice was not to say, okay, I'm going to now spend three months at my mom's place. But if that had been inevitable, if I had been forced for some external reasons to do that, it would have been fine, too.

I would have surrendered to it. But a few days was usually fine, was enough. As you know, Ram Dass tells you that as the great test, whether you're enlightened, if you think you're enlightened, spend two weeks with your parents.

And that's the great, that's the test. So my father was much more accepting. He accepted whatever I did.

Usually he said, okay. He was very unusual and eccentric. That's why they didn't get on, my mom and my dad, like total opposites.

How they ever got married, I don't understand. But he was eccentric. And even when I was still in school age, he said, do you want to carry on going to school?

I was 14. I said, no way, don't want to go to school. He said, okay, then don't.

So in some ways, he was quite enlightened. In other ways, still burdened with a huge ego, depending which segment of his life he looked at. So that's parents.

Now let's see if we have any of this is helpful to the questioner, because the questioner is now in a dilemma. Going back to the mother is suffering. Staying away from the mother is suffering for other reasons, guilt, and so on.

So I hope this question has some, provides a little bit of help, that see that what she says is all part of her conditioning. It may be possible for you to go back to your mother one of these days or next year, or the year after, and be in a state of allowing her her limitations without feeling the need to respond to her criticism, because she does it, because otherwise you buy into the old record and you just play the duo. Her old record is combined with your old record of defending yourself or justifying yourself and then getting angry, and you play out the same scenario every time you go there.

But you're there as a conscious presence. Allow her to be. Listen to her.

You can either say nothing, or you can say, yes, I know that's how you think, but that's not how I feel. I feel differently. That's how it is.

And then at first, perhaps go spend not too long with her. Visit her for half an hour, just to see what happens. And then the next visit can be a little bit longer.

And then you may be able to meet her with compassion and awareness and allow her to be who she is temporarily in her conditioned form. And sometimes if you allow, then people change and sometimes they don't, but they're more likely to change if you bring an acceptance. If you no longer oppose a person who always putting out their old stuff towards you, if you don't, which is her egoic identity, is continuously reasserted by her criticism of you, her criticism of you, she doesn't know that, but her criticism of you asserts her sense of self, her false sense of self, because every time she criticizes you, she is right.

She is so right. And the ego loves nothing better than to be right, because the more often you are right and the more right you are, the bigger the ego is. You feel more acknowledged in your sense of who you are.

That's why she loves criticizing, but of course she doesn't know what she's doing. It's all unconscious. But if you recognize that this is what she's doing, then you realize that's not your mother at all.

The true being of your mother is somewhere hiding underneath all that stuff. It's obscured by all the egoic conditioning. It's hiding somewhere there.

But you strengthen the egoic patterns by opposing them. And every time you defend yourself against her criticism, or you start getting angry and you shout back at her, whatever you do, you strengthen her patterns and you yourself fall into egoic patterns yourself. So you both become more unconscious, because even your defense mechanisms, the way in which you defend yourself is part of your egoic identity.

The victim, you're the victim of your mother. There's the victim identity. There's, yeah, I'm not right.

Why don't you leave me alone? Can't you leave me alone? Okay, you're...

So don't feed her patterns, which means don't oppose them. It makes no difference what she says to who you are and what you do. You just, you listen.

That's okay. That's what you think. That's fine.

Or you can use the famous expression that originated in therapy sessions. I hear what you're saying. Or you can say, I hear you, I hear you.

It's a nice saying. It's overdone a bit these days, perhaps. And people say, I hear you, even when I'm not really hearing you.

But if it's done rightly, if it comes from the right place, it's a wonderful thing to say, yeah, I hear what you're saying. As long as it's not followed by, but you are wrong and I'm right. So I expect a progress report about your mother sometime next year, perhaps.

Oh, please, could you say more about the surface of the present moment and going more deeply into the present moment? Thank you. The surface of the present moment, as I call it, is whatever you perceive with your senses, seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, whatever.

So that's the surface of the present moment is sensory perception, external. And that's already beginning, if to become more acutely aware of sensory perception, it's a way of entering the present moment. The expression you can use for that is come to your senses, come to your senses.

Because when you come to your senses, you step out of the stream of thinking. So to really give attention to something, you withdraw by giving attention to sensory perception, what's around you, you withdraw attention from thought. So there's not enough consciousness available now to make thoughts because the consciousness is not directed towards sense perception.

And that's the surface of the present moment. And that's already a wonderful thing to wake up into your surroundings where you are. And you realize you might have been for hours trapped in your thought, only peripherally aware of your surroundings.

And then you, oh, and you listen and you look and you feel perhaps a breeze touching your skin. There might be certain sense in the air. And that's the, I call that the present moment, but it's the surface of the present moment.

And then you become aware of yourself not as a person, but as a consciousness that is perceiving because without consciousness, there would be no perception. And so you become aware of that still alert background to your sense perceptions. And that is the depth dimension of the present moment.

That's the one thing that never changes. You're always that conscious. You are always that conscious space.

Now what the surface of the present moment undergoes continuous change, of course, there's the continuous flux of phenomena. And what does not change is the depths of the present moment because the depths of the present moment is the space of consciousness. So at the deepest level, the present moment is the unconditioned consciousness, the space for everything.

And that's, you can be rooted in that. And then you relate to the world, the surface world, which really includes your thoughts too. All your thoughts are invisible relative to the depths of the essence of who you are as consciousness.

Even your thoughts are a surface phenomenon in the same way that the ripples on the surface of the ocean are a surface phenomenon. But of course the ripples are one with the ocean. I often use that ripple analogy, waves or ripples.

The only tragic thing is if the ripple doesn't realize that it is essentially the ocean, and then the ripple thinks it's no more than a ripple. Oh dear, that's scary. Because there are other ripples that are bigger and there are even some waves.

But of course they're all very impermanent. But if the ripple realizes the attention of the ripple is no longer just on the surface of the ocean, oh, what's the next thing I need? Oh, that ripple looks scary.

I need a different ripple. I'll run away from this one. Oh, this one is nice.

I love you. Come, come with me. I need you.

I need you. Please come. Now, if we get together, we can almost become a bigger ripple.

Okay, let's get married.

[Speaker 16] (5:38:54 - 5:38:54)
Okay.

[Speaker 1] (5:38:57 - 5:39:17)
But they still haven't realized the essence of who they are. So it's whatever happens on the surface only is frustrating if you don't realize the depths and the vastness out of which you have come, the vastness to which you're always connected and you don't know it.

Okay. I've read all your books and I listen to your recordings on a pretty much on a daily basis. And I don't say that to build up an ego that doesn't exist.

It leads into my question. What I find in trying to practice the power of now, trying to be conscious without thought is a very heavy inner dialogue of all the principles and things that I've read. Like, how should I do this?

What would Eckhart say? And actually my thought process starts getting more active. And I think I'm losing the presence by that thought process.

And then I think your latest book with the cartoons, which I love, which I think there's one with a little bird in the tree. He's talking to the dog and he's very upset. And the dog says, what's wrong?

And the bird says, well, you know, I'm thinking about yesterday and this and that, and I'm worried about what's gonna happen in a week, two weeks, it's about the future. What do I do? What do I do?

And a dog just looks at him and says, stop thinking. So how do I, you know, it seems you try to stop thinking, but and you read all this and you try to practice it. But yet in any given situation, I find that in order to get closer to practicing it or even practice it, it's causing a lot of thoughts to happen.

So it's a different kind of thoughts or those thoughts that I should break that kind of habit. And if so, how?

Okay, thank you. Thank you. Now, there's a lot of talk these days about not just talk, actually it's happening, addictions.

Many people are addicted to all kinds of things, substances, but one of the greatest addictions or one of the greatest addiction never actually, you never read about it in the papers because the people who are addicted to it don't know it. It's the addiction to thinking. It's actually addictive.

Can't stop thinking. It's like, can't stop drinking, can't stop smoking, can't stop eating, can't stop thinking. Thinking is the greater addiction than any of these.

And it's an addiction because it's, first, it's been a drug or it's just been around for so long and it's a pseudo sense of self. So it's a great reluctance on the part of most people to let go of thinking, which is equated with the state of sleep, to let go of thinking. There isn't that much to understand in this teaching.

There's a little bit to understand about how the ego works, but even that is just mainly a self-observation. The main thing about it is presence, presence. And presence is a space of no thought but presence can also be there in the background even when thinking is happening.

You can still be not completely involved in the thinking. Thinking loses the ability to create havoc in your life and confuse you. So your choice then is not to understand more or to bring some intellectual analysis to the practice, but to practice the state of not thinking, which can be arrived at by various ways, as you probably know.

If you don't think about it, just do it. Becoming more aware of the present moment and accept it as it is, slows down the overactive mind is one thing because a lot of the overactivity of the mind is an attempt to get away from the is-ness, the simplicity of the present moment. So to become more aware of the present moment as a practice, have perhaps little pointers in your office, at home, in your car.

Let's say present moment or whatever, or a symbol for it. And there are different entry points into the present moment. Present moment awareness means thinking subsides, may not disappear completely, but something else arises that is primary.

We call it presence or awareness. Buddhists call it mindfulness, which I don't use because it implies your mind is full of things, but it isn't, of course. It's just a mistranslation.

So to be present, first of all, use the present moment to become, but how do you become conscious of the present moment? Now, when you get it, after a while you can actually sense the presence of the present, so to speak, directly. And there it is.

It's just. But helpful things are sense perceptions take you out of thinking. If you're not judging the sense perceptions, labeling, naming, looking around.

Anywhere, wherever you are, look around. Practice sense perceptions without this compulsive interference of naming what you're perceiving, or that's a beautiful flow. I wonder what it's called.

I don't know what it's called. Oh, that helps. I can be free of thinking.

If I know what it's called, I can say, oh, that's such and such, and then drop that. And see what it means to perceive without the interference of concepts, words. At this moment, for example, you're looking at me.

Okay, now, let's say between now and now, were you thinking? No. Okay, and again, between now and now, were you thinking or present?

No thought. And while I speak, do you need to think to understand what I'm saying, or can you just listen and understand it? And this is what you're doing.

And so that's part of the teaching and the function of the spiritual teacher. Imparting information is secondary. What I'm telling you now is secondary.

What is primary is the underlying state of consciousness, which is presence, that's the teaching. But you can't talk about that, it's underlying. But a sign that it's working is that while you listen, there's no thought, it's just an alert presence.

And when the so-called teacher stops speaking for a moment, the alert presence remains, it does not need to be filled with anything. Shh, shh, like now. What is there to think about?

Nothing. Now, if we do this for longer, at some point, your mind will probably start up and think, how much longer is he going to sit there? And when that happens, you can allow your mind to say, how much longer is he going to sit there and say nothing, and then come back to presence?

And then some other thought will come, what's this all about? And then you can allow that thought to arise and then be present again, which means you're not really, your priority is no longer to follow the thought where it wants to take you, because the thought has a magnetic pull, it wants more of your consciousness, but it wants to grow because it's a little entity. It wants to grow, so it wants your attention.

And in subtle ways, it tries to get your attention, says, it might even use a bodily feeling, says, gosh, I'm hungry suddenly, why didn't I need to eat something? And then you think of a red, what restaurant am I going to afterwards? And so the presence is gone, you are gone, you are looking for a restaurant in your mind.

Which means the thought used as some bodily thing to make thoughts out of it completely pointless because you can't find a restaurant because you're standing here. But it can use all kinds of things to manufacture more, to get your attention. And if you're not careful, if you don't know the mechanism, it's not so much an intellectual understanding, but a simple realization that this is what the mind does.

It tries to pull you in. It's fine, that's what it does. Once you know that, you can allow a thought to arise without following it where it wants you to go, which is into another bigger thought, into a bigger one.

So then you become like my dog when it finds a scent. And then suddenly, even when the dog is off leash, usually she's fine, she just runs around you, but suddenly she picks up a scent and then she goes off completely unaware of surroundings or anything. She just follows it.

And she could get lost. She goes off to the horizon sometimes, just disappears. And that's, when you follow a thought, it goes like that, you can wake up 20 minutes later.

And it started with her sleeping a little bit hungry and thinking of a restaurant, and it ends up with thinking about how unthreatful your life is. And. How is it possible to remain present if you are fighting a serious illness where the outcome is not sure?

Greetings from the UK. So somebody in England, perhaps it is, I assume it is the person who is asking the question. How is it possible to remain present if you're fighting a serious illness where the outcome is not sure?

Well, not only is it possible to be present in such a situation, it really is the only answer you have to that situation is to allow it to force you into presence, where there's no past, no future, don't go there. You just stay with this moment and you can become acutely present. You may not have much future anymore, so you can't go there.

Most humans still have the illusion that there's a lot of future. It's not really much anyway, but they still have the illusion and that there's some kind of fulfillment still coming in the next moment. It's not going to come if it's not here now.

Presence, especially a life-threatening illness, I have seen quite a few cases of people who awakened through contracting a life-threatening illness. In some cases, they died soon after. In some cases, healing happened.

It's no longer matters really that much because the purpose of human life has already been fulfilled when the flowering of consciousness happens in you. And so those people who became fatally ill in the last weeks or months of their lives, they flowered, light was shining through them. They became like that.

Thought subsided, presence arose, the personality got burned out of them and was replaced by just conscious presence. The personality in such a dreadful situation either has to suffer tremendously. It can't survive in that situation.

Oh, what's going to happen to me? But if you surrender, it gets burned up in presence and all that remains of you, you die already in other words. You die, before you die, the personality dies and all that remains is this absolute field of presence.

And you might not be able to explain very much, but you just, there. It would never have happened without the illness. This can also happen as people get very old and approach death through old age.

I have also seen that happen. You reach the age of 95, whatever, death comes and the personality subsides and all that remains is the flowering of consciousness. You die before you die.

That's an expression sometimes used, I don't remember where it comes from, maybe Sufism. You dying before you die is, so it can happen through serious illness. It can happen through the approaching death through old age.

It can dying before you die can also happen when you lose everything through some disaster. Family members are lost, people around you, where you lose all possessions and all status, everything. And again, the personality that lived through identification with all these external things that have been taken away is in such dreadful agony that the only way out is surrender.

And then the entire structure of the mind made self collapses. Those are extreme cases. So when such disaster happens, there's always that possibility there of grace suddenly appearing.

So as I often say, grace is hiding behind every disaster. But for it to show its face fully, surrender is necessary. Surrender eliminates the ego.

And when the ego is gone, grace appears. To bring in little moments of presence into a busy day, nobody's so busy that they cannot have little moments of presence. And if you, I don't know if you have meetings frequently or not, it's always good to start a meeting with a moment of presence.

You can introduce that, you can explain to the people who work with you that it's important. Don't need more than half a minute to start with. Later on, you can build it up to one minute.

At first, people are not used to it, may feel a little bit uncomfortable. That's presence. And whenever you have these happening discussions, because probably part of your work is to discuss things, how things, what do we do now?

You can bring in presence by becoming aware of the background of alertness. When you listen to others, because then you're accessing also a more creative part of your mind. Well, it's not your mind, it's deeper than your mind.

You're accessing the deeper intelligence and you'll come up with probably better answers and solutions. So you bring stillness into a discussion, not by saying to anybody, telling anybody that you're doing it. You don't need that.

You just become aware of, let's put it like this. You become aware of your own alertness as you listen. There's an alert presence through which you're listening.

And that is very intelligent. You're not preparing mentally anything and not immediately judging what a person is saying. You give yourself a space and there's a space of alertness.

Sometimes people are too quick to react to what somebody else is saying. And they immediately say, I don't think that's going to work. Or, oh yeah, that's a great idea, but they haven't really given it any space.

So to become spacious in some areas of your work, you may not be able to sustain it all the time. But one area is when you are communicating with people, normally that would draw you completely into the mind and into thought. So you're accessing the higher intelligence that is within you, the deeper intelligence.

And then there are other things that you do. As you know, I often recommend when you get into your car, maybe you do that already. You just mentioned something about the car.

When you close the door of your car, give yourself 30 seconds to just be present. Unless it's an emergency, then you should go to the hospital or wherever you're going. So give yourself 30 seconds, but it has to be done in the right way.

You're not saying, okay, I got this, 30 seconds. And then you say, okay, here we go. You're just straining to get out of the 30 seconds.

So it has to be focused on your breath, for example, that helps, or the inner body, the awareness of the inner body. And practice the being. So you bring a little bit of being into the doing.

At some point later, the two will merge completely. And then there are other moments when you can probably, things that you do frequently every day, there you can bring in awareness so that it's not a means to an end, and perhaps create a little gap. So have a number of gaps during the day, during a busy day.

You could say, for example, whenever you wash your hands in the bathroom, that can be an absolute presence. Well, and be, come to your senses, feel the water, smell the soap. And that can be a present moment, whatever.

You can probably make a list of things that you do every day. If there's a staircase somewhere in your building, then walking up and down the stairs can be a wonderful opportunity for being present at every step. So it's not a means to an end anymore.

So I would suggest make a list of things that you do every day or very often, and use these as to bring in spaces. So you have this very brief practices of bringing in spaces. And then even while you're engaged in the doing, there too, you can see if you can, as we mentioned, the discussions that you have, sense the presence that you are while you're listening.

Be alert, that you're actually then much more alert than you were in a normal state. It increases your intelligence, and it's an intelligence that's deeper than the IQ intelligence. That's something that I find in my life that arises because I also practice that, although I don't have discussions that often, but sometimes we meet.

And this alert listening, out of that, what I find often comes is questions. You ask questions. One of the most creative ways of participating in a discussion group is to ask questions.

Other people, when they say something, the light of your awareness shines on it. Then a question arises, another question. This is in the creative process of finding solutions and answers.

This is often overlooked, especially when you're very much identified with your mind, then the mind has certain preconceived notions and opinions and positions, and it'll just repeat those. So when somebody comes forward with an idea, it's totally new. If you're very much identified with your mind, it could happen that you say, oh, no, no, that's not going to work.

But with this, you develop the ability to listen, and true listening means you're alert and still. That's true listening. The auditory aspect is this very small one.

You're alert and still. And you may find that you may not have the answers, but you begin to ask questions. And then the other person who perhaps brought forward an idea is then forced to reply, and it may drive him or her deeper to see where can we go with this.

So one of the most creative things, and the very creative people in that kind of environment, they are the ones who ask the most questions. This is how the entire philosophy of Socrates developed, because it's called the Socratic method, which is somebody comes and asks Socrates a question, but he has questions to him. And so he goes from one question to another and another.

When you read Plato's account of Socrates, I don't think Plato completely understood what Socrates was doing. Plato thought that he already knew the answer, but I don't think that's the case, because Socrates said, I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing, which means he was comfortable with the state of not knowing that I mentioned earlier. And out of that state of not knowing, often questions arise.

And in this question, then the answers suddenly come. It's a joint endeavor. The answer may not even necessarily come through you, but you ask the right questions, and then the group suddenly comes up with an answer.

And that is also spiritual practice, and it can be totally incorporated into what you're doing. So both setting aside little spaces when you become present during the day, and also then in many areas. So maybe the hardest is being on the computer screen to be present there, but there you could practice as much as possible, have a little reminder next to the laptop, whatever it is, and have a little reminder to, for example, to be in your body, to have inner body awareness, because computer draws your attention out.

You go, it's actually depletes you. If you, after a few hours, it depletes you of energy. It flows out, it absorbs, because all your focus is on there.

And so it's doubly important to, you may not sustain it continuously, but have a little reminder. So even while you are writing something or reading something, and this is something that may not, you may not succeed immediately in this practice, but it is possible to be aware of your body, have some background awareness in the energy field of the inner body. And then you sit and you can still deal with whatever it is you're dealing with.

Or because that is really, to be totally present affects the whole body. When you're present, you're present with your whole body. So that's something to do.

Another thing where you lose energy, I notice it when you go into a place where there's continuous stimulus for an exhibition hall or a big department store, and then you kind of, you look, and then after half an hour, you're already depleted. So, and then when you come home, then there's nothing wrong with a glass of wine and Netflix, but at least you will find you have not completely spent the whole day in complete unawareness.

[Speaker 6] (6:09:21 - 6:09:46)
A question for you regarding dealing with unconscious people and whether you yourself, maybe more so earlier in your life, whether you have felt lonely or isolated or frustrated in dealing with unconscious people and what your approach was to that at different stages of your life.

[Speaker 1] (6:09:47 - 6:18:42)
Right, yes. Thank you. Well, that perhaps is the main challenge for everybody because it is people mostly, to who we get challenged by.

Other sources of challenge are, of course, your physical body could present a challenge. There can be financial challenges, but most large part of challenges come through humans because humans are difficult. Many humans are still very much trapped in ego.

First part of your question, there was, I was relatively isolated for many years of my life when after the shift in consciousness, I carried on with my normal life. It had a certain momentum. I was still in the academic world and then three, four years later, I had to go out of that, leave it behind completely.

And then many years happened when I was not related to the world through any of the usual channels. I had no particular job, no relationships, no close relationships. And I spent many, many days, weeks, months not seeing that many people.

And gradually people would come to me for advice that happened gradually, it slowly grew through word of mouth. And then I had that kind of relationship with humans. But throughout, there's always challenges.

Even if you live in relative isolation, you will come into contact with humans that are unconscious. So I think the, you need to welcome that, because it's that, it's all these, those challenges force you to become more present. You remember I talked about the other day, if you want to make the body stronger, you do exercise, you do physical exercise.

And what is physical exercise? It's making life difficult for the body. That's a new way of looking at it.

But if you look at it close, you'll see it is true because the body suddenly has to make an enormous effort. You're forcing the body, you're giving the body challenges that were not there before. Lift a heavy weight, run a mile, or whatever it is you're doing.

And so then through being challenged beyond its comfort zone, the body gets stronger. And in the case of spiritual growth, we need all those unconscious humans to challenge us. Otherwise, the presence would not intensify and arise.

So the first thing we need to do, and I learned that also, to regard these unconscious humans as blessings. So rather than believing you shouldn't be here making my life difficult, regard the unconscious human as a necessary part of being here on this planet at this time. And so you can welcome them when they make life difficult for you.

The important thing is, though, that the unconscious humans do not pull you into unconsciousness yourself. That is the challenge, the biggest challenge. And what I mentioned in the previous session also applies here.

When you are being challenged by situations or people up to a certain point of human development, the moment a situation gets challenging or you meet a challenging person, you become reactive and become more unconscious than before you were challenged. So you meet an angry person, you get angry yourself. You meet a confrontational person and you become even more confrontational.

You're fighting. Then a certain thing happens, you reach that level where, beyond which the challenges make you more conscious. I think most of the people here will have reached a level where, you may occasionally be pulled back, yes, but may have reached a level where from now on, when challenges come into your life through situations or people, you become more present rather than be pulled into unconscious reaction.

And that's your spiritual practice. That can be your main spiritual practice. So if you realize relationships are your spiritual practice, whether they are short relationships or at work or family relationships, if you can shift the way you look at relationships and then regard relationships as spiritual practice, it's much easier to deal with unconscious humans.

And then the challenge is to stay present while they are being unconscious with you. I learned that early on when, after my shift in consciousness, my father's second wife was quite unconscious and then not only unconscious, she developed a mental illness, but the unconsciousness was already, the mental illness was already hidden in the unconsciousness. The mental illness she developed was acute paranoia and she was in a mental home for a while then came back home.

Whenever I visited them once or twice, as I mentioned before, I stayed in hotels, but many times I went there, visit, stayed with them. And I realized the moment I saw her, I would become intensely present. I would just go.

And then she would start talking to me. Usually the stories would start with talking about her enemies, the people who were waiting down in the street and would follow her, people she would see in shops. And according to those stories, there must be at least one or 200 people whose main occupation is to follow her and make her life difficult.

But that was the story. So I had to listen. The moment I arrived, she would tell me the latest events of what happened to all these people who were following her and doing things to sabotage her life, all fictitious.

And immediately I went into a very intense presence. And by the second day, the stories would subside a little bit. And by the third day, she wouldn't talk that much.

And once or twice it happened that I was not acutely present when she was talking and immediately the old stories would come back up. She would even look at me suspiciously and say, what do you, why are you really here? What do you want from me?

So I noticed there was a, my consciousness had an effect on her state of consciousness. So that was particularly noticeable in that case. And she became more sane while I was there.

And the moment I left, she went back into a complete unconsciousness.

[Speaker 3] (6:19:50 - 6:40:27)
So, welcome. Here we are again, in the present moment, on the surface of life. Time has passed since last time, but at a deeper level, it's still the one moment, the present.

So usually, our live meditation lasts around 40 minutes or so, that's the average. Time passes, so I can say we're going to be here for 40 minutes, and yet you don't really experience the 40 minutes, you only ever experience this moment. So time is memory and anticipation, and of course, it's necessary for this world to arise.

To even understand what I'm saying, you need the memory of what I've just said. To complete a sentence or even a word, even to utter a word, takes time. I say time takes about two seconds or one second, time to say the word.

So you need to remember the beginning of the word, to understand it, you need to remember the beginning of the sentence, that's already memory. For music, you need to remember the preceding sounds, and then it forms a whole. And yet the actual experience is this moment.

The secondary experience is your memory. So you bring together the immediate experience of this moment, there's only this, with the secondary dimension of memory, and then the world arises, things make sense. Now there's a tendency about the secondary dimension of reality, which is memory, to obscure, distort the experience, the immediate experience, the aliveness of the present moment.

You can no longer perceive the present moment clearly. You see nothing as it is, you perceive nothing as it is, because you are overwhelmed by the memory dimension. So in actual, in your daily life, in a person's daily life, it manifests as a narrative in their mind, through which they interpret everything, all sense perceptions, reality.

The narrative in their mind, which is memory, which is the conditioned mind, colors, distorts everything they perceive in the present, and that manifests in countless ways. So it's the essence, for example, of what we call prejudice, you have a narrative in your mind about a certain group of people, a certain race, a certain political belief system, a certain religion, a certain social class, a certain gender, a certain culture. You have a narrative in your mind, and then whenever you meet a human being who belongs to that on the level of form, belongs to that race, or that culture, or gender, or subscribe to that certain belief system, you cannot actually experience this human being as a human being.

You see that passing through a narrative, and then you do it to yourself, you have a certain set of opinions, thoughts, of who you are, and that becomes a foundation for your sense of identity, and perhaps you subscribe to a particular belief system, political, religious, whatever it may be, it's a collective identity, and then it gets combined with a personal sense of self, certain things that happened in your past, or you interpret things in a certain way that happened in the past, or maybe it never happened, or it's a distorted version of what happened, and all that becomes a narrative. Me as the victim, for example, is a very favorite one for ego, collective ego, or personal ego, you can be a collective victim, you can be a personal victim, so an enormously satisfied sense of identity. It's dangerous, because there's this movement in the collective at the moment of emphasizing the victimhood of groups of people, and then so satisfied to the ego, you can make others wrong, you don't ever see who they are, you see them through the narrative.

Of course, groups of people have been victimized in the past, perhaps you as a personal entity has experienced victimization on a personal level, through other unconscious humans, whether it's your parents, or at school, or discriminated against for personal reasons, or whatever, of course all this happens, there's a big difference between seeing that this is what happened in the past, and deriving a sense of self from that. It's a huge trap, because then, the memory continuously obscures the present, or the potential, the conditioned mind, your far identity, is then what gives you your sense of self, and there's always a sense of superiority in that, concealed, sometimes obvious, sometimes concealed, you can have a far identity that you are better than most people, in whatever way, better looking, have more money, better social class, more intelligent, more knowledgeable, more physically stronger, there are many, many ways in which you can derive your identity from a sense of superiority, and even if it's a victim identity, which seems to be the opposite of believing that you are better than most, it's still a sense of superiority towards others, you're superior in your victimhood, morally superior, a dangerous trap, so you get, people get trapped in their conditioned mind, and that becomes their personality, and then the most essential thing is missing from their lives, and that is the dimension of depths, sometimes called the transcendent dimension, where the personality, the conditioned mind that makes up the personality, is transcended, which means, you become aware of something that is more essential, more real, than the personality, the conditioned mind, our meditation here, the purpose of it, is to make you aware of that dimension, or to deepen it, you're aware of it right now, in the conceptual mind, we don't even understand what I'm saying, all that happens is the arising of a sense of depth in you, and a space in the stream of thinking, that otherwise is continuous, space arises in the stream of thinking, and you're conscious, but not thinking, and you know that you're conscious, and yet there's no sense of self, no concept, you just know, it is possible that the mind may come in and say, oh, I'm not thinking, oh, yes, that can happen, and then you acknowledge that, and then that thought goes, and again, it's just a presence, doesn't matter for how long, it's just something arises that is inner spaciousness, but there's an alertness that goes with it, and that's also very peaceful, it's an alive sense of peace in you, that has nothing to do with what's going on in your life, you could realize that dimension whether you're in a prison cell, or in a mansion, or whether you're sitting on a bus, or you're sitting in your Rolls Royce, doesn't matter, it's the same thing, and then that is so liberating, because then many things that before were so terribly important to have, to achieve, yes, they may still have some importance, but not absolute importance. Now the self, the form identity, of course, is still there, you still have a physical body with certain characteristics, and you have a psychological self, there's still you as a psychological entity, based on the past, of course, still there, and you acknowledge that it's there, and you even become comfortable with it, honoring it, but at the same time, knowing directly experientially that that is not who you essentially are, and one way of putting it is that that means you are rooted in being, and yet you acknowledge and honor the human part of you, the human dimension, because you are a human being, most people only know themselves as human, they don't know themselves as the being, without which there could be no human, human is form, being is essence, human is the regular wave on the surface of the ocean, being is the ocean.

[Speaker 1] (6:40:55 - 6:53:12)
Could you describe what it feels like to play the role of Eckhart with awareness of presence continually there? What does the sense of self feel like then with you, oh there must be an error here, what does the sense of self feel like then with you, with who you are, or something like that, so I understand the essence of the question, what does it feel like to play the role of Eckhart with awareness of presence continually there, so the question asks how do you experience yourself, it's very hard to answer because there isn't much there, there is a form identity there, but it's on the periphery, and there's simply a spacious presence there, there's a consciousness there, a space of consciousness, but there are no opinions about myself.

How do you know when the mind versus superior intelligence, which is awakened consciousness, is guiding you in a life situation? Again, we can make reference to the previous answer, there's some link here as an example, I distrust this person, what's guiding you, the mind or superior intelligence? The mind, with distrust often come certain emotions like fear, when the awakened intelligence guides you, there's no anxiety associated with it, there are no negative feelings associated with it, there's just a powerful sense of right or not right, a powerful sense of peace comes with it, love almost, well in business you set certain goals that you want to achieve, and then you take action towards achieving those goals, and in the meantime there's a lot of interaction with other people who are also working as a team with you, and there's probably also perhaps interaction with other business organizations, so first of all the goal setting and the journey towards achieving particular goals that the organization has set itself, once you have a goal, you will find as you pursue your goal as a team together, continuously obstacles arise as you go towards it, whenever you create something new, you will find it's not, it is rarely a very smooth progression, you have to overcome obstacles on the way in the form of people or situations that go wrong, this doesn't work, try something else, the important thing is not to place an excessive emphasis on the achievement which is the desired outcome, but to be as present in the doing as you can so that the doing does not become stressful, almost every business is, people who are working in it are under stress, I believe, there may be some that are not, but the stress is not the way in which you want to conduct your business because the environment is toxic, a stressful environment is toxic, so you can always tell, is the goal something that is for the greater good or is it an ego-inspired goal, are you looking, this applies both in a business environment and it applies equally when you have personal goals, the same process is involved, when an obstacle arises, to immediately face the obstacle which comes in the form of a situation, something not working, something going wrong, somebody trying to sabotage you, perhaps from some other organization who knows what happens, to never react against the obstacle as if this should not be happening, to immediately to face it and see what is the way beyond it, how can I either dissolve it, bypass it or use it, what is, so that you don't enter a state of reactivity when obstacles appear on your path, that's important for anybody who pursues a goal, how, what is your relationship to difficulties and obstacles that arise as you travel towards your goal and the only conscious way of dealing with obstacles is not to react as if these obstacles should not be happening, so you have to look into what your relationship is with arising obstacles on your path, and this is not just in business but anywhere, the unconscious person in business or elsewhere gets upset, angry, aggressive, despondent, very stressed, every time something isn't going the way they want it to go, and immediately dysfunctional inner states arise and therefore they experience their accompanies where the entire environment is toxic, because everybody lives in that way and ego is also a thing that arises as much as possible, be aware so that you don't seek ego satisfaction in the doing, there's a personal ego, then one person can sabotage another person in the same company because you are not free of ego identification, so it's very important to be aware so that you do not seek ego satisfaction through what you are doing, be present in what you do so that the doing becomes joyful rather than placing so much focus on what you want to achieve that the journey becomes very stressful, then nothing is worth achieving if the journey is stressful, you might, let's say you spent a year or two years with some scheme that you want, a new business model or whatever it is, what is the state of consciousness, the collective state of consciousness while you are traveling towards your goal, is it stressed, is it stressful, is there a lot of conflict, or is it a common enterprise and is the doing joyful, and it can only be joyful if you place more importance in what you are doing in this present moment than attempting to arrive at some future point, you know where you want to go to but as the Bhagavad Gita says, do not be too attached to the outcome, then it's much more likely that the outcome will be good, but if you have an excessive attachment, you need to achieve that, you have an excessive attachment to outcome, then the journey becomes very stressful, that's something that is important and I'm talking not from personal experience because I'm not in business, but I have spoken to people, quite a few who are in the business environment, and so I've met, I've met, been to some relatively conscious companies, they invited me, of course unconscious companies wouldn't invite me, and I have spoken to them and I'm surprised that these conscious companies actually, it's a joy to be there for all the, do the employees, whoever they are, are they your partners, do they enjoy being there, that is vital sounds very simple, or are they so focused on some kind of achievement that the doing is not enjoyable at all do they love being there, what is the relationship between, with you and your colleagues, partners and those things are vitally important and what, I don't know how many employees you have, again, it's important to make the environment as pleasant for them as possible, so your life is not determined by what happens to you

[Speaker 4] (6:53:13 - 6:53:32)
but by how you respond to what happens, and if you are unconscious, an ego, then every response or other reaction

[Speaker 1] (6:53:32 - 6:56:02)
to what happens to you makes things worse, or perpetuates the same problem, but in many cases makes it worse it's a reaction of the ego, and that's what's called, this is the wheel of samsara, of karmic action and reaction, action and reaction so really, karma is really to do with your, the unconscious conditioning of your mind, so it's not what happens to you it's always secondary, how do you respond to it, now we have react or respond, usually the way we use these terms is you react out of the conditioning of your mind, and usually it creates, it doesn't resolve anything, it creates additional or further problems reaction, reactivity, then there's response, so we use the term reaction, referring to the unconscious conditioning of your mind forcing you to act, and response, refer to the conscious responding to a situation or a problem through conscious presence, and that's where wisdom arises there, when you are, intelligence is not enough, what we conventionally call intelligence refers to the conceptual mind, the ability of the conceptual mind to categorise, memorise, analyse, logical thinking, all that has its place, it's fine this is what is valued in educational system, conceptual mind, accumulate knowledge, classify, break it up into further fragments, examine the fragments

that's intelligence, the ability to do that, wisdom is something deeper, wisdom is the ability to see the totality of a situation, rather than one particular thing wisdom doesn't fight anything out there, wisdom starts always with acceptance of the present moment, acceptance of what is, then if action is called for, acceptance doesn't mean that you necessarily don't want any change

[Speaker 1] (6:56:56 - 6:58:04)
you can be in difficult surroundings, let's say you're homeless, and you can accept that at this moment, this is what is, but you don't live through a conceptual image of yourself as I'm a homeless person now that's a very painful mental conceptual identity, any conceptual identity, whatever it is, will make you unhappy, some make you immediately unhappy, some it takes a little longer, if you have a conceptual identity of you as the greatest this or that, it will take a little longer, eventually it will make you unhappy your conceptual identity of yourself as I'm a homeless person now, this is what I've come to, that's very unhappy, but if you're a homeless person but you don't live through a conceptual identity of yourself as a homeless person because you're no longer trapped in a conceptual sense of self, but you are an alert presence

[Speaker 4] (6:58:05 - 6:59:02)
then what's left is you're sitting on a bench in the park, sitting on a bench in the park, and there's the sky, and the trees, and you're breathing, and people are walking past, and it's no longer, your identity is no longer derived from any concept become a presence, but you also know that perhaps some action is necessary, perhaps you need to get up and look for somewhere to spend the night, and then you get up and find yourself walking there or there, and when you're in strangely, the more present you are, which is aligned with the now, the more likely it is that circumstances will be helpful rather than antagonistic, that just the right thing, you find just the right thing as the right person or the right thing, you stumble upon suddenly a helpful thing that is, that is, the more you're aligned with the present moment, the more you experience, of course, yes, life will not be free of challenges, but there's a tendency for you to experience more helpful circumstances, because you're friendly with life, with the present moment, then it reflects back to you, your inner state, if the present moment is your enemy, that means, if that is your deeply unconscious state, then life is your enemy, it reflects back to you, your inner state.

[Speaker 1] (6:59:02 - 7:30:58)

If a form gives you joy, it's not really the deepest, the true joy that is an intrinsic part of your self nature, it gives you pleasure, but pleasure exists in the realm of opposites, and what gives you pleasure will also give you pain, either because it leaves you or because it turns into its opposite. Every time you identify with a thought stream totally, you have reincarnated into that thought stream, your sense of self is completely in it, so you continuously reincarnate into arising phenomena, it could be external things, experiences, and you're totally, it matters absolutely. And so, one could say, the deeper sense of coming to the end of reincarnation is to no longer reincarnate into identification with form, into seeking yourself, or believing that yourself is in a form, and here we are speaking at the moment primarily of thought forms, so to this compulsion to reincarnate always into the next thought stream, to be totally fascinated by it, and always needing the more to make your reincarnation complete, and never getting there, that's, we are moving, that is being trapped in that normal state of consciousness, and that is still the majority on the planet is still trapped in that, but very powerfully, something else is arising now, and it's arising here. So the words, you give them attention, but they no longer have your, they no longer have your total attention, there's some attention that you give to the words, but you also give attention to the underlying stillness, even as you listen.

And of course, the moment you do that, the unconditioned consciousness is there in you, and your mind becomes still, without losing consciousness, you're fully aware, you're aware of the silence, but what really is that silence, or rather that stillness, the stillness is the unconditioned consciousness, awareness itself, and you're aware of that, now that sounds as if it were dualistic, but it's only because I'm using language, you're aware of awareness, when you are aware of stillness, and the moment you pay attention to stillness, you've become still, and that might at first be like a phenomenon outside of you, that you are attentive to, oh, and you may notice there is a certain alertness that comes with that awareness of stillness, and you cannot be aware of stillness through thinking, thought, stillness does not exist for thought, thought can come in subsequently, and say, oh, that stillness, how nice, or it can say, oh, you see, you've lost it already, I had it, I had it, only a moment ago, how can I get back to it? That was such a wonderful experience, and it's not really an experience, because it is, the stillness is always there, so during these days here, learning what that means, to be aware of that underlying dimension, not only in these sessions, and then when you leave here, become totally absorbed again, or reincarnate again totally, into arising thought streams and sense perceptions, but carry that awareness, awareness of underlying awareness, I'm speaking of things that you can't speak of, that's why it's sometimes a little funny, you carry that with you, not only here, although you can perhaps sense it more powerfully in these sessions, but then you walk out into, out there, into the gardens, and the river, and there, certain perceptions arise, and you're aware of those perceptions, and some of them will be very beautiful, and occasionally, some may be ugly, this is the world, and you watch, and you, underlying the sense perception, is a field of alert, still presence, in which the sense perception happens, and that means, the compulsion, to reincarnate, into another thought stream, is suddenly not there, you're happy, not to reincarnate, for a while, into another thought stream, the true joy arises out of that state of presence, there is a very subtle joy in that, which in some teachings, been called happiness, but I wouldn't use that word, it might even be a wrong translation, that joy, is in essence, an intrinsic aspect of yourself, I sometimes call it the joy of being, and so it does not depend on what forms are arising at this moment, so there is, you enjoy the play of forms, but the joy does not come from the forms, if the joy comes from the forms, it's not joy, it's pleasure, pleasure is something you derive, because a new form has come in, and makes you feel good, for a while, and then it leaves you, and makes you feel bad, or the good turns into bad, so if a form gives you joy, it's not really the deepest, the true joy that is an intrinsic part of your self nature, it gives you pleasure, but pleasure exists in the realm of opposites, and what gives you pleasure will also give you pain, either because it leaves you, or because it turns into its opposite, such as in a relationship, marriage, divorce, pleasure, pain, or in business, gain, loss, and so Ramana Maharshi said, and of course that is a translation, and it may not be absolutely correct translation, happiness is your true nature, I would re-translate it, and perhaps in the original what he said is closer to that, joy is your true nature, but don't look for joy, you would create some new object, mind object, you don't need to look for it, no, simply do not reincarnate continuously, and it's so simple, these sessions are helpful, and they are helpful beyond words, the words are helpful pointers, but there is much more to these sessions than the words, and so be alert here to that dimension that is beyond the words, because that dimension is also beyond thought, and that is where we are going, to know what that is, which one could describe as consciousness free of thought, and this is the next step, one could say, in the evolution of human consciousness, which until now, we have just come to the end of thought, which means humanity, human consciousness being totally dominated, run by, identified with thought, it started, as the myth tells us, in the garden of Eden, which one could say, is a symbolic representation of the arising of thought, they ate of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, evaluate, judge, the arising of thought, loss of Eden, and I'm told, the translation of that word, Eden, is place of joy, thought arose, and it was a great thing, and gradually, over many, many thousands of years, identification with thought came in, self and thought became one, mankind had to move through that, now, that state of consciousness has become more and more dysfunctional, look at the history of the 20th century, dreadful, madness, so the dysfunction becomes apparent now, because we are arriving at the end time, you may have seen people walking around, I don't know, it may not happen in India, but in the West, with placards, the end is near, the end is nigh, we have arrived at the end, and perhaps they don't realize how right they are, when they say, we have arrived at the, well, perhaps they should put a little another word in, we have arrived at the end of time, because to be identified with thought, totally, is also to be governed by time, past and future, to live exclusively through memory and anticipation, and all that that implies, and a completely limited and false sense of identity, we are moving out of that, a new state of consciousness is emerging, this teaching would be pointless, nobody would even hear it, if it were not emerging already, so this form is no more than a midwife, a mid husband, mid wife, I don't know, simply to help along the birth process, and I'm not here to make it happen, that would be frustrating, why aren't, and you are not here to make it happen in yourself, that would be equally frustrating, and you would come to the end of the six days or seven days here, and say, I was looking for this great spiritual experience, and somehow it didn't happen, I was looking and looking and looking, and because you were looking for something and you missed nothing, so you were looking to reincarnate into some experience and didn't get it, or if you got it, maybe you got it, or had such a great experience there, and then you're back wherever you live, and then a few weeks later it's wearing off, oh, I wish I could get that back, where is it now?

That was so great, and then you think, maybe I need to go back to India, back to India, that's where it is, so the essence of this gathering is very simple, but also very subtle, and it easily eludes you if you are too much in your mind, so not only here, but also out there, be there as a field of alert presence, that which you sense here, the underlying field, and know what it means, the beauty of this, to be free of thought, but don't look for that state, it comes by itself, and in one moment you are free of a million years of conditioning, as the unconditioned arises, because if you had to undo the conditioned bit by bit, you would never see the end of it, there's so much, so the unconditioned arises as the state of consciousness that is free of thought, that all the great teachings, not so directly, point to, some directly, some indirectly, when Ramana Maharshi was asked, how do we measure our progress on the spiritual path, how do we know if we are making progress, they asked him, and he said, and some people don't like this, they say, no, no, he didn't really say that, but it's there, the degree of absence of thoughts is your measure of progress on the spiritual path, it's as simple as that, and then some people say, no, what he really meant was, who is talking, thought, trying to convince everybody else that that's not what he said, but be careful here, not to make the state that is free of thinking into another future state to be achieved, because you can't achieve it in that way in the future, not as something to be added to you, it is an enormous, the greatest renunciation, and the only ultimately true renunciation is not so much the renunciation of worldly things, the renunciation of sexuality, the renunciation of possessions, the renunciation of certain kinds of food, whatever it may be, the ultimate renunciation is, and I'll say it, to renounce thought, and thought, it says, tries to convince you that in that renunciation you would become, you would revert to the state of the cabbage, the vegetable, and it says this is not a desirable state, and that is true, you don't want being a cabbage, it's beautiful for the cabbage, but the cabbage lives at one with the totality, all vegetative life, all nature lives totally in the state of oneness still, so it's totally right for the cabbage to be the cabbage, but it is not the destiny of humans to revert to the vegetative or animal stage, although compared to humans, nature and animals are very, very sane, compared to most of human life, there's enormous sanity there, but because they have not left, they haven't gone out into more and more highly differentiated form and form identification, they haven't left the source, they haven't gone that far from the source as humans have, and so, yes, there's great, every animal is so rooted in being still compared to neurotic humans, wow, just look how an animal moves, it is itself, completely itself, not trying to be something, it is, but no, we are not going back there, the animal also is free of thought, although occasionally the beginnings of thought movements can be observed in certain animals, we go beyond thought, one could say we are rising above thought, where we do not lose the ability to think, simply means we are no longer reduced by thinking, we are no longer trapped in thought, we can now use thought, thought will operate when it's needed, it will be applied to a particular situation, but whenever even a situation that needs to be resolved, a challenge that arises, and it can only arise in the now, before thought arises, attention is given to it, and that attention is the state of thoughtless awareness, you're looking at the totality of the situation in stillness, alert, alive stillness, there's a looking, in that looking, enormous intelligence operates, and I'm looking in a wider sense, it may not necessarily be through the eyes, attention is giving to the situation, complete attention, in stillness. Ah, one more at least, if an enlightened person can find peace at any given life situation, how could he have the motivation to change anything, why would he improve his life situation, so if you can find peace in any life situation through surrendering, as we saw in the story of St. Francis, even out in the cold outside the monastery, how would you want to change any life situation, well, let's say, just a most simple example will show you the answer, rather than talking in abstract terms, the enlightened person is traveling on a bus, and I used to travel a lot on Greyhound buses in the past, in the States, and often you wonder, at the next stop, who is going to be the next person going to sit next to you, it could be somebody pleasant, or it could be somebody drunk, or it could be somebody who talks continuously, so the enlightened person is sitting there, and somebody comes in at the next stop, and he's talking and talking and getting out his beer and drinking and getting more and more drunk, and then starts bothering you, but there's a seat over there that's free, does the enlightened person say, I'm enlightened, therefore I'm not going to change seats, because what is the need to change my life situation, I'm at peace already, it is true that deep down there is the peace, but on the outer levels, certain situations are preferable to other situations, and one seat may be preferable to another seat, and so it happened once or twice that I did that, I changed seats on the Greyhound bus, so to get away from somebody next to me, but if the bus is full, then what do you do, you can't change seats, then you stay and be at peace, with where you are, which is perfectly possible, so the changes can take place on the surface of your life, there may be one place where you would rather live than the other place, or you would rather travel to this location than to that one, that's all on the outer, on the surface of your life, there are certain choices, and you make certain choices, if there is no choice, you're perfectly fine with there being no choice, the peace is there anyway, and on the outer levels, some things are more pleasant than others, and then I would choose the more pleasant one, but perhaps St. Francis would have chosen the unpleasant one, maybe that's our difference, and maybe that's the difference between medieval spirituality and this, not one is better than the other, it's just different, but what matters is that at the core, the peace is there, so I believe everybody, even the Buddha must have made certain choices, he chose to go to that particular garden, somebody had given him a pleasure garden, so he moved himself from the forest into the pleasure garden, so why did he go from the forest to the pleasure garden, wasn't the forest good enough for you? No, it's just on the surface, that seemed to make more sense, and was more suitable, and he moved himself there, he would have been equally happy for the rest of his life in the forest, so that's quite simply how it is, so you're perfectly capable still of changing your life situation, if change is called for, why not?

[Speaker 8] (7:32:04 - 7:33:43)
My question is on karma, I grew up in a Hindu family, and often karma is talked about as something that provides a balance in the world, but it can sometimes seem rigid, and it's a powerful influence over someone's life, and when I listen to you speak, I feel so much peace, and so much hope, and you talk about presence and being as the keys to enjoying form, and creating positive circumstances in your life, or softening circumstances, and I wanted to know how karma fits into all of that, because there seems to be places in the world where there's not a lot of resources, where there's a lot of brutality, for example, I met somebody at work, and she was a refugee from Afghanistan, and she was a young girl, and the interpreter had told me that her brother and her father were killed in front of her, and she had another brother taken, and then I later learned that a lot of times the Taliban doesn't take the young boys to fight, they take them and they use them as sex slaves, and when I hear about stories like this, I just wonder how I can stay aligned with love, or trusting the universe, when I'm not able to see through your eyes yet, how do you hold both?

[Speaker 1] (7:33:44 - 8:17:05)
Thank you, thank you. Now, of course, everybody is born into a certain external environment, and also is born with certain predispositions, they may be partly genetic, they may be other things, that a person is born with certain patterns, in other words, we don't need to examine where they come from, but to see the fact that the human being is first of all born into a certain environment, which may be violent, or it may be relatively peaceful, and the person is born with inner patterns, you inherit certain, even pain bodies, partly inherited, some babies cry a lot, they have a relatively heavy pain body already, it doesn't mean they're spiritually less advanced, the opposite may be the case, there's no knowing, other babies are relatively peaceful, and so there's a whole set of conditioning that happens, you come into the environment with certain predispositions, then the environment conditions you further, and in all that, there's no choice involved, there's just influences, and so you find yourself in this world with certain unconscious patterns that have become the conditioning of who the person is, the unconscious conditioning, so karma, as I see it, is the unconscious conditioning that runs your life, and that still applies to many humans, and karma is partly collective, you've been born into it, and partly personal, they come together, so really you can only understand karma not as an abstract subject, external to yourself, because then you get into belief systems and philosophy, we're not going that way, you can only understand karma by observing yourself, and by observing, and then you'll know many other things, but you need to, really if you want to understand karma, you need to look at yourself, and so I began to understand what karma is when there was something arose that was not part of karma at all, and really here we come to the key, the arising of consciousness or presence or spiritual awakening is not part of karma, it is another dimension that breaks into the karmic realm, so you do not become awakened by accumulating, as they sometimes say in the East, good karma, that's fine on this level, you can make the walls or the furniture in your prison a little bit more comfortable, but there is something totally from beyond karma that can come into your life at any point within the wheel of karma and rebirth, rebirth is of course part of karma, the deeper meaning of rebirth is identification with form, we don't need to even believe in transmigration or whatever, you can look at rebirth in your own life, every time you identify with a thought that arises which is form, you are born into that thought, because identify, your sense of self is in it, that's karma, you are reborn, karma then is unconscious identification with these patterns that you have inherited, the conditioned, complete identification of consciousness with the conditioned patterns, so consciousness is dreaming, one could say, this is why we use the word awakening in many spiritual traditions, consciousness is awakening, consciousness is in a dreamlike state when you are identified with the unconscious patterns, and then you are condemned to rebirth, in fact many times every day, you are reborn into a reaction, an emotional mental reaction, no presence at all, just rebirth into some form, or you're reborn into thoughts that arise and you completely believe in every thought, and then you act from those thoughts and emotions and the action creates further reactions and the actions confirm to you that you were right, if you have certain mind patterns about, for example, that other people are basically dishonest, just one example, people are so dishonest, they're all trying to get something from me, that tends to confirm itself in your life experience, you can try it out, or you may have experienced it before you became more conscious, that habitual thought patterns that you are identified with, and that is karma, creates in the external confirmation that it is correct, so if you think the world is full of evil people, you will meet many evil people, and in other words, unconscious people, and even people who are halfway between conscious and unconscious, when you come together with them, your belief will pull them into unconsciousness, and that's karma, so karma is the complete absence of conscious presence, and so it's automatic, it plays itself out, and time does not free you of karma, that is a misperception, that if you only spend enough time, eventually you can become free of karma, karma reduces itself and repeats itself, it's a wheel, and so the only thing that can free you of karma is the arising of presence, and how is it that some person's presence arises, I cannot tell you why, I only know that at any point in the wheel of karma, presence can come in, and it can happen to a criminal in prison, condemned to death, it can happen to somebody who has never heard of anything spiritual, it can happen to somebody who has been meditating for 30 years, or not happen to the same person who has been meditating for 30 years, so in your own life, I can see from what you're saying that presence has already, I can sense that, presence has already come into your life, and presence frees you from karma, not all at once, karma has an enormous momentum, meaning the patterns in yourself, the thought patterns, the emotional patterns, the reactive patterns, there's enormous momentum behind that, but as presence arises, gradually, karma diminishes, the energy behind it diminishes, and gradually you experience a fading out of those patterns, they become weaker, you're no longer completely in the grip of those patterns, so as presence arises, there's a gradual fading out of karma, not that it matters that much anymore, because once you are present, you can, as the previous questioner said, when we were talking about certain thoughts still arising, certain negative thoughts, that's still part of the karma, the old patterns, the unconscious habit patterns inherited, they still arise, but it's no longer problematic, and they no longer cause the suffering that they would have caused before, because they are seen in the light of awareness, so the light of awareness arises, and in the light of awareness, the patterns no longer dominate your life, they no longer run your life, and if occasionally it happens that the patterns do take over, then after a little while, your presence returns and you say, ah, well, there it was again, pain body is part of karma, which may be strong in some people, not so strong in others, and so as presence arises, you are freed from karma, and then you have another completely different factor coming into your life, and so, for example, for a person to become free of collective karma, you need a considerable amount of presence for that to come in, and it then will remove you in one way or another, either internally, you find yourself completely free, you might still live in a violent society, but internally, you would be free, there is a possibility you can have a holy man or woman living surrounded by violence, it's possible, it's rare, but possible, or very often it happens that life removes you out of there and you find yourself somewhere else. So, let's say vast collective karma, for example, in the case of, let's say, you have the Taliban there, you have all kinds of unconscious movements, you had Soviet Communism, you had National Socialism in Germany, and for a person being born into that and not being drawn into that unconsciousness requires considerable presence, so not that many people, for example, in Germany, when Hitler came to power, not many people were able to remove themselves somewhere, some artists, some writers, they left, they could see what was happening, and they were strong enough not to be identified with the collective, when there had been a tradition of obedience to authority for hundreds of years, a tradition of following your leader, and so on, to take yourself out of that collective karma requires considerable presence, but some people had it. So, it is our destiny then to go beyond karma by being the receptacles for presence.

All you can do to be helpful in this world and help others is those people that you come into contact with, you may, everybody in this, who is awakening will find that sooner or later they become a kind of teacher to others. And what a spiritual teacher does, the teacher points out the possibility of awakening out of identification with unconscious patterns, which means the spiritual teacher teaches you to go beyond karma. So, I was a frequency holder for a large part of my life, never very interested in going out into the world and achieving the great things, I was kind of happy being withdrawn, and until something came into my life and I felt there's more that I can do, that was a thought that came.

I was doing little workshops with people, 10 people at a time, 15 people for a number of years, giving talks in people's living rooms, and then it was fine, in many ways I felt happy being a semi-hermit, and occasionally going out and doing little things, happy not being famous, I never thought I would want to be famous, but then the thought came, I could do so much more in this world, but it doesn't seem to be happening. And one day I sat under an oak tree, you could call this, there's a question, later on we'll have some questions, somebody's asking a question about divine discontent, the question is, do you ever experience what might be called divine discontent, that is a discontent that leads to something very positive.

And you could say that there was a moment that came at that time when I experienced a mild form of divine discontent, which simply is a sense of, there's more that I can do, that I could do, but it's not happening. That's a mild form of divine discontent, it's not some unhappiness that says, oh, I have failed, I'm in my 40s, and what have I achieved, that's not divine discontent, that's just a form of normal unhappiness. With divine discontent, there is not a lot of mind activity around me and my life, there's just a sense of, my present life situation has these limitations around me, but I could go beyond that, I could be much vaster, the world needs what I know comes through me, I know that the world needs that.

So why isn't the world, I'm speaking for some of you too, why isn't the world opening up these channels for me? So that was the divine discontent, so I sat under an oak tree in Somerset, where I would sometimes go, magnificent oak tree, and I said to the universe, which ultimately to myself, please use me. I was talking to myself ultimately, so, because I am that, please use me, I'm here, so I was a frequency holder, and yet after many years of a frequency holder, I had this sense of, okay, now expansion is what is called for in this world, a moment of divine discontent, please use me.

I didn't hear any answer, and then I said something that, some years later I almost said, maybe I said too much. I said, I want acceleration, okay, and then I went home, and nothing happened for a few months, I didn't know that while nothing was happening for a few months, in my little cottage in Somerset, somebody there, I don't take it literally, the countdown has already started, like the rocket ship, which goes 10, 9, 8, 7, 6, and then one day I woke up and said, I have to move, I have to move to the west coast of North America, and that was the beginning.

And so the rocket ship had taken off, suddenly, and finally I landed at the desk of Oprah, a few years later, I never wanted that much, it's too much. And then, the lesson was to surrender to that, it wasn't too much, it was what was needed, if I had been stuck to some previous idea that I had about how my life should unfold, I would be saying, oh, I'm overwhelmed, it's too much. Well, this is surrender now to what is now, surrender to this enormous energy stream that's coming through, you asked for it, you said acceleration.

That is the greatest, the most amazing mystery, that the universe is not only conscious, but becoming more conscious, the universe is awakening, where it all goes, we couldn't possibly understand. It goes to something vast, it's like as if the grain of sand wanting to understand the earth or the universe, you can't understand, you can get glimpses of it when you step out of thinking, you can get glimpses of the vastness of it all that's unfolding, that we are part of that vastness, we are like a spark in the awakening. Consciousness that appears briefly, every human, you could look at every human as a spark of consciousness that briefly manifests out of that one consciousness, it comes out and then it brings back what it has learned, not the details, but the essence of what it has learned in this incarnation.

So the universe, every human life on this planet is that spark coming in, the consciousness coming, so it comes in and goes, that was your life. From a more universal perspective, human life is very short, and if you could look at it from a higher perspective, a more universal perspective, you would see this planet, and you would see continuously these sparks, billions of sparks, lighting up and disappearing all over the planet. Every lighting up and disappearing is one life, there's a one underneath it all, there's a one, coming again, and again, and again, and then it takes, it learns, it comes out, one amazing process, and you are part of that.

So it is liberating to know that, because it frees you from the delusion that all that matters is your little personal life. And all the problems that fill up your personal life, a few years from now, nobody will remember, just a few years. And I always, I like to look at old movie scenes from cities, where all these people are running around the city in 1903 or 1910, and they're all gone now, and I look at this, I showed, we had a retreat last week, and I showed one of those clips, people running around the city in 1900, hundreds of people, and now, where are they?

Nobody remembers their names even. And every life on the personal level was so important. So if you get to the transcendent dimension, it gives you a true perspective of how important the personal dimension is.

Yes, you look after it, yes, you honor it, you clean it, you make it better, but it's relatively tenuous and very fleeting. And so, a more important question than whether you have achieved so-called success on the level of form, if you have, fine, be happy. But is it going to last?

Probably not, but that's okay, either the $50 million are going to leave you, or you're going to leave them. But so a more important question is, are you awakening? Are you aware?

Are you awake now? So the greatest achievement, my greatest achievement in life, a wonderful achievement, is, not that these books have come through me, but I'm not burdened by thinking anymore. And in fact, I don't have to think if I don't want to.

I just go. And it's so liberating because you're free of the person. I can take everything in, whether it's a city or nature, and it's beautiful, and you don't have to comment on it.

I could comment, but I don't have to. You're there as the awareness, and there's a sense perception, and there's a depth to everything. And here we come back to being with another human being.

When you're only meeting another human being on the conceptual level, you're not really meeting them at all. You're only ever seeing the conditioning of your mind reflected in the other. So there's no true meeting.

There's no true empathy. You cannot have this outflow of benevolence or goodwill, loving kindness, feeling a connectedness, because you cannot sense who you are beyond the person. Therefore, you can only react to the other person on the level of the person.

But if you are connected, then you can look at another human being and have in the background of your perception that spaciousness. And then you look at another, and you can sense beyond their personality, there is a conscious being. And that consciousness is one with your consciousness.

And when you realize that that consciousness that you can sense in the other, beyond their personality, which may or may not be pleasant, you can sense the deeper dimension of their being, and that changes the way in which you interact with other human beings. That brings only that state of consciousness of spaciousness can bring in love. That is where love arises.

Not the love that says, come to me. Don't you ever leave me. I love you.

I love you so much. You better remember that. No, the true, the loving kindness, I think that's a good expression.

The Dalai Lama said, my religion is, he didn't say my religion is Buddhism, he said my religion is kindness. So what he's talking about is ultimately a state of consciousness. Because it's only kindness, this true loving kindness towards another human can only arise out of that transcendent state of consciousness.

Where you're able to be conscious, but you're no longer controlled, burdened by, I can almost say possessed by the thinking mind. You can then, then the wonderful thing that happens then is the consciousness that comes through you can actually throw into your thinking mind and use it for deeper purposes. To bring more consciousness to this planet in whatever way.

It can use your form, your form identity and use it to bring more consciousness through an activity, through making something, through a human relationship. Many ways in which consciousness can come into this world through you. And that's the beauty and that now becomes the purpose of your life is to express consciousness in this world.

And so there may be one or two of you who look back on your life, you say, I've achieved so much. Maybe you, I don't know if you would even be here. If you were totally identified with your achievements, you might be somewhere else up in the penthouse of your tower.

But let's say everything you ever did failed. Or it might be, as somebody told me, he said in a kind of half proud and half sad, he said, I've never failed at anything because I've never tried anything. Okay, so let's say you failed at everything you tried.

You had your business ideas and the business failed. And then you had your first marriage and the first marriage failed. And you had your second marriage and the second marriage failed.

And then you finally made some money and then you lost it all. And then you had to experience bankruptcy and then they put you in prison. And then they let you out and now you're here.

And then you sit here and you can go, this total failure of my life. So look at all these people, they're all successes, great successes. They're all comfortable, they're doing well, they're spiritual.

And here I am. And you can go that way or you can go and you can sense an alertness in the background and a spaciousness and a presence that transcends the unhappy person. And so all your failures have taken you to this moment of awakening.

And you realize that in essence, you are consciousness. Does this person who did bad things to you still live in you? They might even have passed away already as a mental emotional entity that you carry.

It's actually like a little gremlin. There's also the doorway into presence, of course, of totally accepting your experience of this moment. So if you can talk to whoever it is you're talking to and just totally accept whatever he or she says in this moment, that's fine too.

There are various doorways into presence, but it's presence. Or you meet your ex, as they call them. I'm meeting my ex about something.

So all the stuff that happened, that accumulated before the divorce happened, all those years, it's back in your mind. And there's your ex and you have a very clear image of who he or she is and it's not pleasant. Your very unconscious ex.

And then you have to be really, really present so that you don't go into the old reactive mode. And then you're meeting this person. It's almost without the past.

That's an amazing thing. Yes, you know the past, but in the moment of meeting that person, there's not you as personality. When you become really present, what emerges is the other half of you emerges more.

The personality becomes relatively unimportant. The other half, the unconditioned presence, shines through. Then you're able to meet another human being.

You might share a lot of unpleasant pasts with him or her, but you can meet this person when the other, the deep eye, shines through you. You meet the person through the deep eye, which means you meet this person without reference to the past. You have that ability, well not you as a person, but that ability is in you of meeting a human being, even a human being with whom you share a lot of unpleasant pasts, without reference to the past.

So you're meeting that person in the present, fully in the present. That's an enormous thing and I know people who have practiced it. And many of them have reported back and said that sometimes, not always, and you're not doing it in order to achieve something else through it.

It is sufficient unto itself, however, almost miraculous transformations have happened in the other person, when you met the other person without reference to the past. So it's not that you want the other person to change, all that falls away. You're just not bringing the past into this encounter.

And then it is not uncommon for the other person also, without them realizing what's happening, becoming freed, at this moment at least, from their heavy personality, and something beyond the personality in them also shines through. And that's a miracle of transformation. That's why sometimes people, when one of the two who share a lot of unpleasant pasts, one of them becomes conscious, it can lead also to the transformation of the other.

Not necessarily. If it doesn't, it's fine too. At least you are free.

And you don't need the other to be free too, to be feeling that you are free. And so it can also happen with your parents, that suddenly the way in which your parents relate to you changes when you meet your parents without reference to the past, and in absolute presence. That's an amazing, amazing experience.

So I suggest you try it out. You have quite a bit of time to practice, and then Thanksgiving is still a long way in the future. And that's where to try it out, when you sit around the big table.

Well, that's for North Americans who celebrate Thanksgiving. You sit around the table, and basically this is the past. The past sitting around the table.

Some people are dreading it. Christmas too. Oh no.

Because you are facing the living past. So it's a miraculous thing. And again, one could say that is the real meaning of forgiveness.

It's not so much a mental act, mental acrobatics that say, okay, you've done dreadful things, but I'm so spiritual that I forgive you. I forgive you. At least I'm trying to.

At least I'm trying. You're not even trying. Why do I always have to be the first?

It's always the same. You're lost again. So forgive you is not so much a mental, to formulate certain things in your mind, and then trying to live up to a certain thought in your mind, which is very difficult, if not impossible.

But the real forgiveness is to enter that state of presence, so that you're not the personality that's conditioned by the past. And then you can meet the person, even the person who did something to you, if you choose to meet them. You don't have to meet a person who did bad things to you.

But the question is, does that person still exist in you as a mind form, as a thought form, as a mental, emotional entity? Does this person who did bad things to you still live in you? They might even have passed away already.

But they live in you as a mental, emotional entity that you carry. It's actually like a little gremlin that lives in you, and it's not pleasant. And so forgiveness means to recognize that for what it is.

It's not really the other person anymore. The person maybe passed away ten years ago. It's not the other person anymore.

It's something you carry still in your mental, emotional field that lives there. And so that is, again, something to recognize. And if you recognize it as something that lives in your mental, emotional field, then it's much easier to step back from it, and by no longer getting drawn into it.

So that's something to do with something that lives in you, and you recognize it as something that you no longer want or need, and then it gradually dissolves as you're no longer reacting against it. So you have one, you have a split in you as long as it's there. There's that mental, emotional entity, and then there's you.

There's another pattern in their mind that reacts against it. It's a bit crazy. But forgiveness then is really coming, meeting the other, if the other is still there, and you're actually now meeting them in person without reference to the past.

People with whom you have a grievance, people carry grievances, and they actually like their grievance. The ego loves grievances. Peter Church, 20 years ago, he did that to me.

30 years ago. Churchill, Churchill, he did to me. The ego loves grievances, but as long as you carry even one grievance towards, and grievance is a long-standing resentment.

Resentment could be short-lived, but grievance tends to be a very long thing. It goes on and on. At least that's how I define it.

The grievance goes on and on, and you carry it in your mind. And even just one surviving grievance in you can often prevent you from fully accessing presence, from actually fully awakening. It's like a dark spot in you that prevents consciousness from arising fully.

So you have to be really very careful to see what they do to you, and see that the addiction to a grievance is only, what is addicted is your fault. The personality derives, the egoic personality, the ego derives sustenance from the grievance and strength from the grievance. So if you harbor a grievance, that means that the ego itself is still operating.

It is not you who is harboring the grievance. It's the ego in you that is harboring the grievance. So if you have a surviving grievance in you towards another person, you need to know that ultimately it's not you, it's the ego, it's still operating.

So you can develop in other areas of your life, and the ego remains, can remain in you, even can attach itself, let's say you're awakening beautifully, but there's one corner in your mind where the ego survives because it has attached itself to a grievance. And there can be other corners too where the ego can attach itself to particular, anything to do with the past. It attaches itself to a particular thing in your mind and there it's waiting.

And occasionally it can, then even in other situations, the ego can still come back more easily because it's there, it's still feeding on the grievance. So it's not starving, it's still feeding on this grievance that you harbor.

[Speaker 4] (8:17:29 - 8:17:34)
I'm talking about obsessive thoughts that are probably not correct.

[Speaker 1] (8:17:36 - 8:55:22)
And then it covers your subsequent perception of reality gets totally colored by the obsessive thoughts and it can explain everything in those terms or the evils of the world have suddenly one explanation another one that's also in the collective. You can have a thought that the entire world is divided into oppressor and oppressed. Any human being either belongs to the oppressors or to the oppressed.

That was an idea in communism in economic terms in terms of social power. They divided humanity into oppressors and oppressed. And then they look at, you can look at any human being and to me, he's oppressed.

He's an oppressor. Now thing is, of course, oppressors and oppressed have existed and to some extent and some areas still exist. But to take one fragment of truth because the totality of human life is much faster than that.

This is one aspect. But if you take one aspect that then occupies your mind because of lack of awareness, you are possessed by a thought. And this thought is the entire world.

This is just one example. Could give many examples. The entire world is either the essential identity of any human being is either they are oppressed or they are the oppressor.

Now, of course, if that is the thoughts that dominate your mind, then obviously you would probably regard the oppressed as the good ones and the oppressors as the bad ones. So that simplifies life enormously. You immediately can decide who is good and who is bad.

And you are probably good, presumably. Even if you are an oppressor, traditionally, you now recognize your sins and you will atone for your sins of being an oppressor and you side with the oppressed and therefore you become one of the good people. It's like the civilization has made a great effort to come up with as many things as possible to prevent people from becoming still and spacious and taking a moment of, ah.

The normal thing to happen is that the connectedness with your essence identity is lost very easily in human relationships because the mind is so active and we live in a civilization that provides continuously, continuous and incessant stimulus, stimuli is the plural, continuous incessant stimuli for the mind, even more than even 30 years ago. 30 years ago, it was just radio and television and people would sit there for hours. But nowadays you have countless sources of stimulus for the mind that draws you into continuously thinking about what's your next Facebook post, what's it going to be and you look at the ones that are coming in, all these people are doing these fantastic things and me, I'm just sitting here and then you have to pretend that you're also doing taking a nice selfie and then you project your self image which has existed for a long, long time before in humans, they have this part of ego to have this image of who I am but in this Facebook, now we have the opportunity to project that image into the world and it'll reach hundreds of people all at once and then you construct your life.

There are many people alive these days who without knowing it, they partly live for their Facebook image and they're just looking for the next thing that they can project out into the world. It's Narcissus. You might remember Narcissus looking at himself because they didn't have mirrors at the time but one day, he happened to look into a little pool of water and he saw himself and he realized that he was extremely beautiful.

He said, oh, that's me and the story goes he fell in love with himself, not in a good way, not by becoming one with who he is but the separation happened. This myth shows the beginning stage of the egoic sense of self expressed as a story. The image that he saw of himself in the pool is the mental image of the ego and stories are part of that image.

That's me. I'm me and my story so you have the image of me and then, oh, so this guy, Narcissus, he experienced that separation and then I think something bad happened to him but I don't remember what. And then you have other divine things that continuously stimulate the mind that almost designed for you not to become still.

It's like the civilization has made a great effort to come up with as many things as possible to prevent people from becoming still and spacious and taking a moment of looking at the sky and feeling the inner spaciousness arise and becoming aware of the leaves and the wind blowing and the noise of water, the simple thing, becoming still, alert, sensing that stillness within and, of course, a minute later, another text message is coming in. Of course, you have to look at it immediately and then I'm told, I didn't know that when I first started using text, Erin told me that the etiquette is that you have to reply immediately.

And emails are coming in, too. Oh, dear. I must be very important.

I'm getting all these messages. And people, I gave a talk with a big conference with people, business people and so on. They talked about how there's been articles in the paper, too, how people's lives get taken over by their devices.

When they leave work, they go home and the emails are still coming in, even in the evening. And they're still answering emails when they're in bed at night. And this is, some people are beginning to realize how dreadful that kind of life is.

And some more enlightened companies, they may not be totally enlightened, but they're beginning signs of enlightenment. They even forbid you to answer emails after a certain time in the evening. They might even, some have even disabled your phones.

I think VW, Volkswagen did that. The employees, they cannot use emails anymore after six or seven in the evening. And this is very wise because otherwise people will go insane eventually.

So there are great opportunities in this new technology also, but it's also very dangerous. There are both. You can spread messages of awareness.

You can spread enlightenment through that also. It can travel and incredible madness too. So the essence then is the two dimensions.

Let's just put it like that of who you are. Balance them in your life and at work. And you will find inevitably in certain situations, one will become stronger than the other.

And then the situation changes and the other will become stronger. For example, when you have to deal with detailed information, conveying detailed information to somebody else, the mind has to be very active. You have to remember this, this, and that.

Then the being dimension will recede and perhaps you will be 80% in the mind. But then it's still possible to, even while that happens, to have that being dimension there. And other times when the mind is not required very much, the presence will come forth more and there will be very little thinking and just a wonderfully filled with this wonderful sense of beingness or presence.

A huge section of humanity through conceptualization, through conceptualizing that section of humanity say they are no longer human to you. Without the awareness you are at the mercy of whatever goes on in your mind including you have little or no immunity depending on your degree of presence or awareness. If there's little or no awareness, in other words total identification with the stream of thinking, then you are very susceptible to mental illnesses and dysfunctions and mental even mental pandemics that affect large numbers of people.

And this is interesting. You may have noticed on a personal level sometimes it happens that certain thoughts usually there's a stream of useless thinking and for many people it goes on and on. There's certain recurring patterns in it.

Yes, according to the particular conditioning of this person's mind. And occasionally it happens that one thought or a couple of a bundle of related thoughts get stuck in your mind and they refuse to go away. They begin to influence and affect other thoughts and they spread in your mind.

In some cases reaching every thought that arises in your mind is in some way contaminated by one original faulty thought that may be totally irrational but it has taken it has taken possession of your mind in a very minor and held relatively harmless way. It happens that you say I just can't get I can't stop thinking about this it just goes I can't get rid of it. And then you have certain ideas in your mind that are a over a distortion a complete distortion of reality and then you look at reality through the lens of that distorted lens of your thoughts.

Any kind of prejudice for example is of that kind let's say you have a racial prejudice prejudice means prejudice pre-judgment so before you know the reality the judgment has already occurred. For example in the case of racism you have a judgment that a certain race has particular qualities that are regarded as negative in some way and then that becomes a lens through which you can no longer meet any human being belonging to that race because the conceptualization in your mind has already told you that this is has already deadened your perception to the aliveness of that human being you cannot you are totally blinded by the concepts in your mind through which you look at reality. It could also be political you can have a certain view certain political views of certain groups of people as happened for example in communism where suddenly the belief arose and millions of people got infected by it that reality or humanity can be divided into two groups the oppressor and the oppressed.

Now oppression of course existed in humanity and exists to some extent in some places more than others to some extent exists but is only one of many factors that determine societies and how they function together but so if you take one and say this is the only one the only valid one that means a huge section of humanity through conceptualization through conceptualizing that section of humanity you say they are no longer human to you at the moment you do that you conceptualize other humans you are completely desensitized to their inherent aliveness let alone the ability to relate to them and to relate to them and recognize the essence of who they are that is the same as as your essence so the moment you have then this belief takes a hold of your mind and you look you classify immediately every human being that you come into contact with is he or she oppressor or oppressed once you have deadened yourself to the aliveness of other humans the next step is very easy and often happens and that is violence and even killing them because to you they are no longer human and the there is a dysfunction inherent in the human mind which can manifest itself collectively and then it gets it's really bad and it manifests itself of course on a personal level and there are times in human history when this dysfunction becomes magnified so there are times of collective mental illness they usually they can last a few decades they can last a few years and then finally just like a physical illness finally it exhausts itself and comes to an end so this the basic dysfunction that's already built into the egoic consciousness then in a collective group setting which is could be a country or tribe or religion or a sect it suddenly becomes amplified and it in a country for example it can it get millions of people can suddenly be trapped in exactly the same dysfunctional mindset and usually violence happens then as it happened for example under Soviet communism in Russia national socialism in Germany Mao's cultural revolution in China millions upon millions killed if you if you want to learn about human dysfunction I recommend reading history books about that millions upon millions killed because they were regarded as not human anymore they had been conceptualized as the enemy in a small country like Cambodia it happened in the I believe it was the 70s or 80s under the dictator Pol Pot and the army was called the Khmer Rouge army they killed one third of the population exterminated totally in the tortured put in prison camps everybody who lived in cities had to leave the city out in the countryside if you had the slightest education you were part of the oppressors if you wore glasses because it means you could read you were part of the oppressors if your hand did not show sign of manual labor you were part of the oppressors immediately sent to labor camps or out to the countryside to work in the fields and starve there and they did one third of the population starved to death or was killed and that was regarded as necessary to bring about a more just world all in service of the future so you transform the present into hell in order to create a better future the means justifies the end that's the belief but unfortunately that is not the case the means corrupts the end and the end becomes meaningless if you create hell in order to reach it so it's easily recognized as insane completely insane a very great part of challenges actually come from your own mind and that is I would suggest the greater part of challenges in your life are not through external events although yes they also happen but the greater part of challenges is the unobserved mind what your mind is doing and saying about your life the narrative in your mind and the dysfunction of your mind the misinterpretations of everything in your mind when you as I mentioned earlier when you look at life through the conditioning of your mind the veil of conditioning the narrative and you cannot separate what is from your interpretation of what is and then that is and and suddenly you realize okay this is here this is the challenge and you're not complaining anymore you're just looking at it and facing it and you become more alert through every challenge that arises even the little ones like your flight is cancelled you arrive at the airport it's a little challenge or you you stumble and you fall and you break something it's a little bit bigger challenge but the mechanism behind the reactivity is the same so first you can start with little things little things that go wrong flight is cancelled it's cancelled nobody's telling you what's happening and there are 50 people angry all around you so you're either drawn into that or you just okay because you see it as oh it's a sign for me to be alert it's an opportunity for intensified presence and then you become actually intelligent for the first time you access a one could say higher intelligence and then if right if a certain action is possible in that moment you take action and it'll be right it's not reactive it's action but not reaction and if no action is possible you're simply in a state of complete surrender and you feel great it's just and maybe you sit there for two hours and still nothing has happened and then perhaps you go and go to a hotel or you sleep on this chair and it's not it no longer creates a problem in the conventional sense of the word it's not it no longer creates an unhappy entity that is you it creates more alertness and I have had accounts of people who were given a very serious prognosis when they went to see their doctor and usually the case is that when the doctor tells you something that might imply that there is not much time left for you that's a terrible thing when you believe that your life is not complete yet that there is so much more that you wanted to do that you could do but you may not be able to do it so usually the first reaction would be very great suffering but in some people that also has created I've had quite a few accounts of people who suddenly became intensely alert and present they refused to leave the present moment because they realized either through coming into contact with this or some other similar teaching or intuitively without having any guidance they realized if I leave the present moment I become unhappy if I go just a few months into the future where I may not be here anymore or the body or me or whatever I become unhappy so they got totally present and suddenly feel a sense of not only great alertness but almost elation there was an account a few years ago unfortunately I've forgotten his name a British musician relatively well known but not world famous and he was given he was only I believe in his thirties or early forties he was given this diagnosis that he would only have another year to live but this was an unusual case he reported he told in an interview he walked out of the doctor's office without going through the stage of suffering first he immediately experienced without having read any spiritual book he immediately realized this arising of very intense alive sense of aliveness and he lived completely in the present moment suddenly started living completely in the present moment and then he said in the interview he thought why didn't I do this before why did I wait for this and he felt not you can't call this not happiness what he felt it's not happiness that's a superficial thing something deeper than happiness he felt life itself the joy of life that is deeper than happiness or unhappiness perhaps even to call it joy is not quite right an intensified sense of aliveness and what is that what is that intensified sense of aliveness and what happened why did he or anybody to something like that happens why do they suddenly feel that and they didn't have it before because time was removed from them there was no more time no future and without future the ego cannot survive the sense of self the egoic sense of self needs future and it needs past it's built it's built it's up through the past and it needs future for its fulfillment and of course ultimate destruction but the ego doesn't want to talk about that so the ego got destroyed through that very quickly and so it has happened to people who have lost everything who had were involved in huge natural disasters or man-made disasters it doesn't happen to everybody some people remain stuck in terrible suffering but these it's always an opportunity for true spiritual awakening and so but you have come here now because you no longer need you've done the stage of suffering so suffering plays it may still be very important because it will intensify your presence when it comes but you don't need suffering as such because you are voluntarily inviting the state of presence into your life it begins to manifest through you when your primary objective is to be a conscious human being to manifest consciousness to be aligned with the unconditioned consciousness that you are then no matter what you do you will have a beneficial effect on the world the world will become a better place even through your very presence even if you were just a hermit although this is probably not your calling nor is it mine even if you were just a hermit and you would sustain this consciousness of your essence identity as I call it and you would be aligned with the unconditioned consciousness in your contemplative practice you would make a difference to the totality of human consciousness which is one single thing that there is such a thing as the totality of human collective human consciousness and if you manifest from the aligned internally aligned state of consciousness whatever you manifest will have a beneficial effect on the world even if it's just a thing like let's say you want to become a great musician and at first sight you might say how does that help people but it does create music that touches people in the innermost of their being has an important effect and makes the world a better place if you create a through your conscious manifestation a hairdressing salon because you want people to have a wonderful experience while they visit your hairdressing salon and you give them your utmost attention while they are there you acknowledge them in their being and then they not only get their hair done let's presume that you're a good hairdresser that's a given you have to know your craft so I wouldn't recommend that you practice manifesting a fantastic hairdressing salon without having learned the craft of hairdressing so that's obvious hardly need to mention that but once you know that you are good at what you do then you manifest something that goes there in some way has an effect on the consciousness of every human who comes into in touch with whatever it is that you create so they come to have their hair done but not only that you speak to them you listen to them you embody the presence and when they leave they not only look better they also feel better within themselves without knowing why so you because the consciousness that you embody spreads out to others but all kinds of giving also require wisdom because you again good intention is not enough without wisdom so and wisdom implies that again we come to the same place wisdom implies that you are in connection with the unconditioned consciousness that is the essence of who you are that lies beyond your thought processes that's presence so you need to become present in your if you are not present you have no access to what to wisdom if you don't have access to wisdom in your life and wisdom is not is not IQ is not analytical intelligence nor is is it accumulated knowledge wisdom is something that this world knows very little of our civilization but it's in some ancient civilizations was highly regarded wisdom is an intuitive knowing that is much deeper than the the intellect which moves within the realm of the polarities so you have a good intention a good intention does not guarantee a good outcome a good intention can actually be have have unforeseen consequences that are the opposite of good so yes it's good to have good intentions of course you're familiar with the famous saying the road to hell is paved with good intentions so have good intentions but have have wisdom so that when you so that your intention does not produce ultimately the opposite of what was intended again in any course of action that you undertake it is very important the most perhaps the most important ingredient is to have access to the dimension the dimension within yourself within where wisdom arises and that is an essential part of any successful let's put it like that manifestation practice is that you that you have that wisdom so that you you not inadvertently create bad when you are wanting to create good which is not uncommon so you your consciousness then to be in conscious alignment with the essence of who you are here and now so that you don't operate from ego and are not just operating through the intellect or don't get drawn into one of the polarities of yin or yang that is that requires wisdom and awareness is awareness is inseparable from wisdom they kind of go together they're virtually a single a single thing it's a subtle they're all very subtle and it's not complicated it might sound a little complex when i talk about it it is not it's not ultimately complex you just have to go deep enough within yourself to realize this and to live it

why woman needs a man why does a woman need a man yes at a certain age for example in my case i've been very successful in business been having adult beautiful daughters even two granddaughters having fantastic job which allows me to travel a lot all over the world having great friends very interesting personalities by the way why sometimes coming this desperate feeling of loneliness especially on saturday morning on sunday morning is it a question of being incomplete myself or just desire to share

well it could be both in your case just it could be not just a man but it could be any person that you do desire whether it's a woman or a man wanting a man it's the human aspect of us has this urge and usually it's when you're younger you have an urge you might want children or something like that but if you've already had children sounds like in your case you have children so now it's just a partner to share with and if you're saying that every saturday morning you wake up and you feel this loneliness which is quite interesting because this is the picture that I have and I don't know if this is your case but this is the picture that I have wasn't the worst thing when you were a teenager you didn't have anything to do on a friday night or a saturday night it's like something was wrong with you I felt that something was wrong with me if I didn't have anything to do friday or saturday night so I don't know if this is for your case so maybe you can talk about it a little bit more like what are your feelings

when it comes to and what are your thoughts when it comes to saturday I just think sometimes that it's not normal to be alone oh interesting for a woman yes but it's okay for a man I don't know for man no in my case maybe I was taught and I was brought up in very traditional family and I was taught to be a good wife this was the destination was married 18 years and just children husband very good one but not my person and being it was my wish to be divorced when children were adult send them to study in school and then I wanted this freedom actually very much and I enjoyed very long but now at certain age it comes this feeling of loneliness

yeah okay

[Speaker 2] (8:58:50 - 8:58:52)
so do you still believe

[Speaker 5] (8:58:52 - 8:58:54)
that believe that you

[Speaker 2] (8:58:54 - 8:58:58)
should have somebody in your life like a partner

[Speaker 5] (8:58:58 - 8:59:14)
yes so it's a belief it's a belief yes I feel really it's unnormal especially saturday morning that I don't want a person to prepare breakfast to take care of so it's a belief can you see that this

[Speaker 2] (8:59:15 - 8:59:17)
unhappiness is caused from this belief

[Speaker 5] (8:59:19 - 8:59:21)
I wouldn't say unhappiness

[Speaker 2] (8:59:21 - 8:59:27)
okay well whatever you're experiencing then what is it then give a name to what you experience

[Speaker 5] (8:59:27 - 8:59:28)
loneliness

[Speaker 2] (8:59:28 - 8:59:38)
loneliness but you're judging that loneliness because you think that you should have something so it's a type of unhappiness

[Speaker 5] (8:59:39 - 8:59:48)
would you say maybe yeah maybe all right maybe type of unhappiness no I wouldn't say I cannot call myself unhappy

[Speaker 2] (8:59:49 - 9:00:14)

no no not unhappy but there's some sort of judgment is there a judgment that there's something wrong that you don't have a partner okay so let's we won't call it unhappy for you but there's a judgment and do you see that this judgment stems from a thought the mind because in reality in consciousness there's no problem

[Speaker 5] (9:00:17 - 9:00:27)
um I understand yes but should I resist this feeling or should you what should resist this feeling of loneliness no no no

[Speaker 2] (9:00:27 - 9:00:28)
no no

[Speaker 5] (9:00:28 - 9:00:29)
no first

you need to see that it is a thought and a belief and a belief is not real because beliefs change you can believe one day yeah I need a man and then you can believe the next day which maybe it happened because I'm understanding that you were married at one time so you believed that no I don't need a man otherwise you might have stayed married even though it was maybe an unhappy marriage so there's beliefs change that's what I'm trying to say thoughts change so and I can see you thinking about this really really hard and it's not about thinking about this so you experience a loneliness so go into the loneliness to feel what that loneliness is and when you go into the loneliness maybe some insights may come to you and you see everyone as a human being may experience loneliness but if you have this real like desire and you want to have this partner ask yourself why do I want to have this partner is it so I can feel somehow complete do you somehow think and believe that you will be complete when you have a partner so you're not going deep enough into yourself if you have a belief that something outside of you is going to fulfill you to make you complete you're not deep enough going within to find the presence and the consciousness the stillness within you don't judge yourself for that don't judge because we all do it all of us I've been there I've been there so many times that I end up choosing the wrong guy you know I kept on choosing the same shit but a different pile until one day I said you know what I don't even want a guy anymore I don't want it don't want it and then when I didn't want it anymore it's like Eckhart appeared so look at why you want a man in your life not to say that having a partner is not right or wrong it's just like why do you want this man in your life is it to somehow you will feel good feel complete feel whole because I'm telling you when you first meet you might feel like that but after a while you're going to end up resenting that partner because they're not going to be able to fulfill you they're going to be human they're going to get angry with you or upset you know you may end up fighting with them or you know but maybe you're so be so present you won't fight with them but it's still not perfect

[Speaker 5] (9:03:54 - 9:04:02)
this is the answer yes I was thinking like okay thank you very much anyway this was the question probably from many women

okay if I like to make a suggestion you may not like it but look at why you just ran away you know the heart what we might think is the heart as a human being has so many it's kind of almost a natural thing we go through our life and our society kind of informs us and tells us through the media through television that you know we need to have a partner we need to have a certain partner even but it doesn't fulfill you it doesn't complete you I had to learn that even through Eckhart I thought I found the most wonderful thing in the world you know like why not I mean he is compared to the other piles that I had he is but he's still a human being and I began to see within myself that nobody not even Eckhart can fulfill me can complete me that I have to fill myself and complete myself and look at why am I constantly looking outside of myself to make me feel like as if I'm good enough or that I'm okay because now I have a partner that's it's false thinking that's the true marriage it's not the external form as the true marriage the true marriage is within you this outer form of a marriage is a representation of how we should be inwardly will you love them forever love me forever well it's true right it's loving well I mean will I be faithful to me will I be faithful to the divine self not my ego self the divine self that is within you and then my guess is is when you go deep enough and trust that within yourself and and experience that relationship with your self the true self the divine self have that kind of relationship and this other periphery worldly relationship of having another man become secondary I bet you that man will pop up into your life I've heard many people say that as soon as they drop that desire and wanting almost like that I got to have a man or I got to have a woman is dropped then suddenly they appear and that goes really for all desires when we drop that desire if it's a real true desire and you are meant to have that it will come seek ye first the kingdom of God and then all things shall be added unto you even partners and it will be a partner that is going to be on that same level as you in terms of level I mean consciousness that state of consciousness or doesn't have to be the same consciousness but you will have that consciousness and when the choice comes along of a man that enters they may be on that maybe I don't like to use the words different levels of consciousness but for lack of better maybe on a higher level maybe not it won't matter because you are conscious and you know your true self you know you don't have to depend on somebody else to make you happy or fulfill you so then you come meeting with a partner you then you have your partner and you're both standing like this there may be times that you have to lean upon each other and depend upon each other but when one moves away you don't collapse and say oh my god he's gone you know oh no I've fallen down I'm I don't know worthless without him I need need need but when you come together and sometimes you have to depend on each other it's an interdependence but when the time comes where well no I just want to remain independent so you're leaning a bit and he goes well you know what I'm just going to move away a little bit because it does happen right you can't expect your partner to always be there so you can lean on them that is codependency but when that partner leaves you go oh okay you're gone but I'm okay really and vice versa Michael he might be leaning one day and you're okay supporting it but then our support can only sometimes go so far because we're human beings we get tired and we just go oh hey hun why don't you stand on your own two feet for a little bit here and then you stand and you're both like this again so it's an okayness to depend but mainly it's an okayness to be like this two independent human beings that are sharing life together and sometimes this but then back like this sometimes this then back like this and this is the importance of standing independently and the independence is really our true nature when we're leaning too far and for too long we lose ourselves completely lose ourselves because now we become dependent and codependent at that so this is where we are moving to so it's a wonderful wonderful question and you're right it's probably many many people's question and it's a good question and I'm just pointing to come home to yourself first seek ye first the kingdom of God then all things shall be added unto you and it will and when you seek ye first the kingdom of God you might end up saying wow that was really a conditioning of mine that I really wanted a partner maybe I don't want a partner I don't want anybody I'm actually happy just as I am because I'm single but you won't know that until you come home to yourself and really be in that beingness that you are then we'll be able to see clearly what it is and what comes what goes because things come and go people come and go and it's wonderful it's really like the play of consciousness you know I've had to tell myself even you know even though Eckhart and I are okay and I have no desire or plans to leave the relationship and as far as I know he doesn't either but I have to tell myself I'm married to the consciousness within me so and I don't know the future I really don't know the future but am I okay right now with this yes absolutely and even when we have relationships they become they become tricky because you've got two people and not only two people we've got two people coming in my case from different cultures so you've got that added aspect when you find a relationship and you know that you'd like to be with this person but maybe it's really hard sometimes and as we spiritually awaken I find we need more and more time that we have to spend on our own and it's hard sharing the same space all the time with somebody so often times what will happen is that you know that's where the tension lies there's nowhere to go so for Eckhart and I we found a perfectly creative way to be together and that is that in Vancouver anyways we have another home but in Vancouver we have apartments that are right across from each other oh my god that is so ideal and I'm sure he would say the same thing because it's really hard to be with somebody all the time and it's not like we both leave our places to go off to our separate workspaces we don't we travel together we're together all the time there you know at home we have to find a creative way so we can have our space and we each value our space very much and this is how our relationship works so we have to get out of the conditioning so look at all your conditionings about what you think a relationship should be like what do you think a man should be like what do you think a woman should be like and then drop it all because if you have those expectations you're not having a true relationship with another human being your partner you're having a relationship with an idea in your head so you have to look at all those expectations and see what they are and just let them go and really be in the moment and it's like that respect of seeing okay where is he coming from he has his needs I have my needs how are we going to make this work ah different apartments that's wonderful and it works it works we have also a house that's on an island where we made sure that the house is big enough where we can each have our space our quarter okay it's like I had enough of you not in a bad way it's in a way that I need to be alone now so I go to my studio or he goes downstairs and we have our separate time when we travel man there is no way that we could share a room together and teach this teaching takes a lot of energy we need to recover and if we had to share a small little room together it would be crazy it would make us crazy so in order to make it work okay that's fine we have separate rooms maybe close together if we can possibly but that sentence is fine but if there is any thought or any sort of urge inside of you of oh but I don't think I can live that way I need my partner right here and I need to live with my partner and I need it then that is something else that is the conditioning coming through that is a codependency coming through because you are not coming and being in your true self being in your true self is independent and not identified attached to anything outside of you and that includes your partner I hope that helps you

then there are other things that you do as you know I often recommend when you get into your car maybe you do that already you just mentioned something about the car when you close the door of your car give yourself a little 30 seconds to just be present unless it's an emergency then you should go to the hospital or wherever you are going so give yourself 30 seconds but it has to be done in the right way you are not saying okay Eckhart says 30 seconds and then you say okay here we go you are just straining to get out of the 30 seconds so it has to be focused on your breath for example that helps or the inner body the awareness of the inner body and practice the being so you bring a little little bit of being into the doing at some point later later the two will merge completely but and then there are other moments when you can probably things that you do frequently every day there you can bring in awareness so that it's not a means to an end and perhaps create a little gap so have a number of gaps during the day during a busy day you could say for example whenever you wash your hands in the bathroom that can be an absolute presence one and be come to your senses feel the water smell the soap and that can be a present moment whatever you can probably make a list of things that you do every day if there's a staircase somewhere in your building then walking up and down the stairs can be a wonderful opportunity for being present at every step so it's not a means to an end anymore so I would suggest make a list of things that you do every day or very often and use these as to bring in spaces so you have this very brief practices of bringing in spaces and then even while you're engaged in the doing there too you can see if you can as mentioned the discussions that you have sense the presence that you are while you're listening be alert you're actually then much more alert than you were in a normal state it increases your intelligence and it's an intelligence that's deeper than the IQ intelligence that's something that I find in my life that arises because I also practice that although I don't have discussions that often but sometimes we meet and this alert listening out of that what I find often comes is questions you ask questions one of most creative ways of participating in a discussion group is to ask questions other people when they say something you the light of your awareness shines on it then a question arises another question in the creative process of finding solutions and answers this is often overlooked by especially when you're very much identified with your mind then the mind has certain preconceived notions and opinions and positions and it'll just repeat those so when somebody comes forward with an idea that's totally new if you're very much identified with your mind it could happen that you say oh no no that's not going to work but with this you develop the ability to listen and to the true listening means you're alert and still that's true listening it's not the auditory aspect is a very small one you're alert and still and you may find that you may not have the answers but you begin to ask questions and then the other person perhaps brought forward an idea is then forced to reply and it may drive him or her deeper to see where can we go with this so one of the most creative things and the very creative people in that kind of environment they are the ones who ask the most questions this is how the entire philosophy of Socrates developed because do you know it's called the Socratic method which is somebody comes and asks Socrates a question but he has questions to him and so he goes from one question to another and another when you read Plato's account of Socrates I don't think Plato completely understood what Socrates was doing Plato thought that he already knew the answer but I don't think that's the case because Socrates said I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing which means he was comfortable with the state of not knowing that I mentioned earlier and out of that state of not knowing often questions arise and in this question then the answers suddenly come it's a joint endeavor the answer may not even necessarily come through you but you ask the right questions and then the group suddenly comes up with an answer and that is also spiritual practice and it can be totally incorporated into what you're doing so both setting aside little spaces when you become present during the day and also in many areas maybe the hardest is being on the computer screen to be present there but there you could practice as much as possible have a little reminder next to the laptop whatever it is and have a little reminder to for example to be in your body to have inner body awareness because computer draws your attention out you go it actually depletes you after a few hours it depletes you of energy it flows out it absorbs because all your focus is on there and so it's doubly important to you may not sustain it continuously but have a little reminder so even while you are writing something or reading something and this is something that may not you may not succeed immediately in this practice but it is possible to be aware of your body have some background awareness in the energy field of the inner body and then you sit and you you can still deal with whatever it is you're dealing with you wouldn't say to the wind how dare you unless you're almost mad so the vigilance then as regards your inner state is very important so that you no longer believe the outer is more important than the inner that's a great delusion some outer condition is more important than conscious the state of consciousness so the vigilance needs to be there and i'm saying that to you because there's enough awareness in you for that vigilance to arise without the vigilance you have no idea what's going on inside you and you project it all outside then you don't even know this is the essence of unconsciousness spiritually speaking many really unconscious people they don't even know that they are suffering because everything is projected outward all the bad stuff is out there other people and whoever they they blame it's all out there everything is projected they have complete unawareness of their inner state that's the essence of unconsciousness but even humans who have already began the spiritual path or the awakening process can still be taken over periodically regularly completely by the delusion that something out there is more important than the inner state of consciousness and then you go in that moment you become reactive and in that moment you become identified with the reactions which are mental emotional forms that arise and so you are lost and you think it's it's all out it's out there so the vigilance then can tell you the moment you become upset about something upset is a generic term upset could be about or upset could be anger it could be despondent it could be fearful or upset is anything that's not rooted in in the peaceful depths of being is upset so then you would notice anything that upsets you and you might be surprised that little things perhaps can still upset you just a tiny thing somebody not turning up for an appointment or a handyman not doing a good job all kinds of something taking too long somebody not treating you with respect that you deserve all kinds of little things can make you driving people get upset when they drive it's strange it's I mean none of the other drivers knows you and you don't know them but they are regarded by the unconscious ego as personal personally insulting to you somebody somebody pushes in from the right how dare you if a gust of wind came probably you would not get upset because it's hard to personalize that but if you are very unconscious extremely unconscious you can even get angry with that but it's less likely because it's just a gust of wind pushing you forcing you to go that way you wouldn't say to the wind how dare you unless you're almost mad but an unconscious person is just like a gust of wind it's no more than that it's nothing to do with you whatsoever so and of course you find these unconscious every day in your daily life you'll find people who are just acting out their unconsciousness some are driving around the streets and some you meet in other ways and it's never really personal they are definitely not in the traffic so be vigilant to see do you still get upset by other drivers and then it's not something to beat yourself up about say oh dear you see I'm no good I've been on the spiritual path and I still get upset by other drivers no all you need is to notice it and so whenever you become upset you notice oh what's going on and then always you know I confused there was a confusion in my mind of what really is important I thought that thing out there was important and you forget this is important what is what do I bring to this situation and then you dissolve conflict quite often because often because you're surrounded still by many unconscious humans there are conflict situations that arise wherever you go you will find conflict where humans come together conflict situations arise it's amazing even places that should be quite peaceful church congregations committee meetings at your church or hospitals where things could be healing and peaceful places universities schools there could be over conflict even spiritual organizations because of course the people they may be trying hard but they are not there yet so there's conflict and that's why there's no need to react to that and say look at all these unconscious people or to say I'm done with spirituality look at all those so called spiritual people and look how they behave I'm done with that it's all it's all a farce isn't it all these and so on the mind goes on so again it's all put out there it's it's there's something wrong out there it's not me I'm okay no you become vigilant and whenever you are upset about situations and people oh that's a reminder then that there was a confusion about importance what matters and what is secondary and what is primary secondary is the external situation primary is your state of consciousness that you bring to it so when you are the moment you become upset you've forgotten that well that in itself can be a sign to become present again so if you are vigilant about getting upset about things then you can use it as an alarm clock any kind of upset in any situation that oh I must have confused what primary and secondary and okay and then you can bring your invite the alertness in and this is like sometimes compared to turning up the light with a dimmer switch and which is really what it feels like is from the mind identified reactive state and suddenly there must have been still a remnant of awareness from where you can notice oops I'm upset about this and then you can at that moment there is a choice okay there's a confusion about what is really important here and then you can invite in the presence attention and at that moment there's a shift from the mind identified reactive thinking state you might have just been talking to somebody about how dreadful somebody else is what they just did why can't they ever get it right and suddenly there's still a remnant of awareness in you oh and so you begin to witness that inside you and at that moment you have a choice you can say okay you recognize you got confusion of primary and secondary and then you go okay let's become present a deep breath might help looking around you might help anything that brings you into the present moment the mind brings up

oh you step out of the mind identified state what that means when i say you step out of it means your consciousness removes itself from its from the thinking it where it was your consciousness was in in the thought forms you then reclaim the consciousness the consciousness reclaims itself so to speak you reclaim the consciousness from its incarnated form in the thought or emotional form it had incarnated into this form this is the dream of consciousness you reclaim it or it reclaims itself because you are ultimately it and so consciousness then is withdrawn from the form the thought form the emotional thought what let's say let's say this is consciousness and this is thought then it goes consciousness was trapped in that thought it had become that thought in the same way that water can become ice so this is just so consciousness gets out of it and then the thought collapses because it was only consciousness that had been frozen had become hardened so to speak so consciousness is withdrawn from the thinking and then it is in its pure no form and that is the amazing it's an amazing thing when that consciousness is suddenly there that before was trapped in thinking that and that you experience a heightened sense of aliveness suddenly and that is the entire vibrational frequency shifts to one could say what it feels like a higher frequency so this is why we call it waking up because waking up is awakening spiritual awakening does not mean to suddenly see angels or talk to God what do I do tell me what to do that's not spiritual awakening it's fine if you see angels it's a beautiful thing but it doesn't mean that you're spiritually awakened it just means you're seeing an angel or even if you're channeling a spirit entity it does not mean you're spiritually awakened you're just channeling a spirit entity who may have a big ego who knows and then that ego gets added to your ego there are what is conventionally called love can be many different things and there are many different levels to it some people call it love when they fall into fall in love with someone which is a

a needing that is partly usually physical emotional needing of the other and that's called love but that is a lower manifestation of what is love and can easily turn into its opposite from one moment to the next as many people have experienced how the person that you fall in love with you hate a few days later a few weeks later suddenly love hate are so closely related the opposites in that kind of love but the love for your children is a different matter there is a strong emotional bond with your children and it can probably I haven't experienced a mother's love but probably I can understand that you may get a sense of losing yourself in the other and that's the that is that strong emotional bond and then there's another higher manifestation of love that may already be also part of your emotional bond but probably a mixture of emotion plus something else but that something else is spiritual love and in some languages there's completely different words for different kinds of love for example in Greek there was eros eros is one kind of love agape is another kind of love what I'm talking about here now is agape is the love of the other because it comes from knowing who or what you are and recognizing yourself in the other and that is the spiritual love and that's the direction in which you are moving so the foundation for that is not I would say as it's conventionally called loving yourself that's a strange thing now many people quite a few people hate themselves more than they love themselves now it's better of course to love yourself and to hate yourself it's something that people who practice positive thinking and want to shift negative mind patterns may put notices up throughout their house with little messages to themselves which might say I completely accept and love myself well I'm sure that's better than I completely hate myself much better but there's still a duality there and it's a very strange thing who is loving whom I love myself who are you and who is that self that you love people who say I love myself don't think about it what that really means and there's a little bit of a duality there I love myself so there must be two of me there's the I that does the loving and there's the myself that's being loved strange really weird and then as you begin to awaken spiritually awaken to the presence then what gradually comes to an end is having a relationship with yourself until that happens people have a relationship with themselves which is sometimes even manifests as dialogues they have in their head one part of you talks to another part of you you are talking to yourself you really should make an effort to do better I know you can do better and the other part well I've done my best what else can I do then do my best then no that wasn't your best you should have done the remember the voice of your mother and then you hear the voice of your mother in the background you should really should be doing better why do you mess up your whole life you're just like your dad that was my mom when I gave up my academic career oh that's your dad in there you have a relationship with yourself very strange it's kind of split that happens and that's a part of a normal state of consciousness everybody unless they are awakened or at least awakening in which case that begins to recede but everybody else they have a relationship with themselves which may be sometimes good sometimes bad uneasy they are proud of themselves and then they are shamed and then they call themselves a loser or somebody else calls them a loser and they believe it all kinds of weird things narratives and so on and as you awaken spiritually what gradually comes to an end is having a relationship with yourself so what is that replaced with when you no longer have a relationship with yourself you are yourself I am there's not there's no longer two of you here there's just one and that happens when you no longer live through a narrative in your head that creates two of you sometimes even more than two you have a whole crowd in there sometimes and then you have various sub-personalities that are just lurking in the background waiting to get triggered so when do you no longer have a relationship with yourself that is the beginning of the end of living through a conceptual identity in your head you have a certain set of opinions about who you are which you have adopted from what other people society tells you who you are or you're reacting against what society tells you about yourself and you adopt the completely opposite position for example society might tell you that you haven't achieved anything but but you believe that you haven't done anything because the world is not worthy of you because you could write the greatest book ever written but what's the point?

The world is crazy anyway I can't be bothered if I wrote a book it would be the greatest ever you can have all kinds of ideas about yourself whether you adopt society's view of who you are or you adopt a reactive position against it it doesn't matter when you transcend that you again you just are yourself you don't no longer live through an opinion in your head about who you are because who you are is the presence and that presence that you recognize in yourself as your essence and it's when I talk about it it's always a duality it's not that you recognize the presence it's the presence recognizes itself you are you recognize that's that's what arises and then you look at the other it might be your child and then you have two things happening simultaneously one is the emotional bond that you feel with people close to you such as your children or other people that are very close to you you feel an emotional bond an emotional connection but in addition and more fundamentally there is a recognition in you of the presence or the essence of the other and that's not emotional to recognize the essence of the other but you can only recognize it through your own essence the essence that you are and then you look at the other and you can sense beyond the personality they are consciousness and you can look into their eyes and no matter what behavior they manifest as personalities you kind of sense something that is beyond that and what you recognize then in the other is yourself because it is the consciousness that you both share is the one consciousness and to recognize the consciousness of the other as your consciousness as one with your consciousness that is spiritual love and there you don't lose yourself

you you[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 1:42)
You have found yourself, and so you don't lose yourself in the other anymore. If there's only emotion, then you could lose yourself in the other. But the emotional bond, and then the recognition of the other as yourself happens with anyone.

You have the same love for somebody you meet casually somewhere for a few minutes as to a close family member. But with a close family member, you have the additional emotional bond. But the spiritual love is not, does not single out one or two people as special.

The specialness comes in on the emotional level, and that's fine. So that's gradually you will, there will be a shift. The emotion will still be there, but there's an underlying recognition of the other because you've recognized who or what you are in your essence.

And there's no longer, then emotion is fine. There's no loss of self in it anymore because you know who you are or what you are. So gradually that dimension, because I can predict because you're here, that gradually that dimension will come more and more into, and the relationship with your child, children, son?

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (1:43 - 2:02)
And it doesn't do away with the emotion, but something deeper comes in, and that transcends the emotion. Transcend doesn't mean that it excludes it or it comes to an end. Transcend means it contains it, but it is much vaster.

[Speaker 6] (2:30 - 3:25)
I want to speak about like loneliness and the pain body because since two years, I'm traveling alone, trying to like you, like doing nothing. And then I have difficulty to accept this nothingness, and so then I spend time on devices on Facebook, and then the pain body arrives, and then sometimes I see the world like it doesn't exist, and that other people are like robots. So it's a lot of suffering, and I don't know how to overcome this kind of feeling.

[Speaker 1] (3:26 - 3:30)
So you've been traveling for a couple of years?

[Speaker 6] (3:30 - 3:38)
Yeah, like one year and a half. I start with India, and then now I'm following you because I went to Norway, New York, America.

[Speaker 1] (3:38 - 3:41)
Okay, and you're not running out of money yet?

[Speaker 6] (3:45 - 3:46)
The universe gives me what I need.

[Speaker 1] (3:47 - 3:49)
Okay, that's good. That's a good sign.

[Speaker 6] (3:50 - 3:58)
But it's about like the disconnection with the world when I am alone and with devices.

[Speaker 1] (3:59 - 29:35)
Yes, you're not in a relationship at present, and you haven't been for the past two years, and the relationship has not arisen, or do you on purpose avoid entering relationship? Well, whatever it is, learning to be with yourself, at ease with yourself. Loneliness can be a great thing when it comes transformed through acceptance into solitude.

Solitude only arises when you accept your aloneness, become completely present, and suddenly you sense your own presence, which does not need anything, is already complete, which is not to say that on the level of your form, there may not be a need for some company, whether it's physical or emotional or mental or altogether. On the level of form, you will continue to experience certain pulls and certain needs. On the level of form, if you have no relationship, you may feel that sense of needing something to complete you on the level of form to some extent.

That's not a problem if you are rooted in your essence. You can be aware that on the level of form, there are still, there are certain needs, and these needs may be met at some point, or right now, they may not be met. And that no longer matters that much.

It is only of relative importance whether you have a relationship or you don't have a relationship. On the deepest level, you don't need it. On a slightly up, on a form level, you're not complete.

There's masculine, there's the polarities of yin and yang, not necessarily always related to the biological masculine feminine, but you are either, if you are yin, you need some yang. If you are more yang, you need some yin. And that operates on the level of opposites and of form.

It may be advisable for you to engage in some kind of activity so that you can not only practice presence by doing nothing, because it was never my decision when it happened to me. It was not my decision to do nothing for a couple of years or so. By the way, I'm still good at doing nothing, but it wasn't my decision to do nothing in order to achieve some state.

The doing nothing arose because already, I was so deeply immersed in presence that I had lost the balance as a human being. I had lost the balance between human and being. Because that, I love that word human being.

The English language doesn't have a word for man and woman, like German has mensch, which is the word for human being. But in English, you have to use two words. But there's the human part of you, that's the form.

There's the being of you, that's the essence. Ultimately, everybody needs to be in some kind of balance between those two. I was immersed in being so deeply that I lost the balance.

I wasn't unhappy about that at all, but I lost the balance between the human. The human became so unimportant to me that I didn't do anything to even, what am I supposed to do with my life? Even that didn't arise, that thought.

It was so delicious, delightful to be immersed in being. And that's how this period of complete, not complete, there was some activity because I had to occasionally get little jobs to survive. And occasionally people gave me money, but I did have temporary jobs to survive.

So I was forced occasionally to come out a little bit out of the being, but I didn't last in any job for very long. The moment I had enough money, I would stop again. So I got temporary jobs at various places.

For two weeks, I worked at the Kennel Club in London, filling out forms of puppies that had just been born of different dogs. They, fortunately, they had no computers at that time yet because that would have been beyond me. So there was just that the bliss of being was so all-consuming that the balance between the human and the being was lost.

And then it only began to reestablish itself when people started coming to me and asking me questions. And the question pulled me out of the being because an answer was required, but the answer came from the being. So when I started answering questions, suddenly there was a flow.

And the answering of questions became my doing. So that's how the balance got reestablished slowly. I would not necessarily seek inactivity as a way of achieving some kind of presence.

It is sometimes easier to engage in some activity and even engage in relationships and see if you can stay present there. But it all comes back to really the present moment, whatever it is, wherever you are, wherever you are. Is there enough intensity in you not to be drawn into mind for long periods of time?

Is there enough intensity in you to stay present in that state of aloneness so that you can be the consciousness rather than the person? You are the consciousness. And it could be a great opportunity that you're able to do that, to just travel and explore, but you already went to India, and so you did not seek, you did not find what you were seeking, perhaps.

And then you came to Eckhart, and there you did not find what you were seeking, perhaps. And the only place where you can find what you're seeking is within you in the present moment. It doesn't matter where you are.

So intensity of presence is important to cut through mind. Are you motivated enough to have that intensity of presence? And it could well be that there's not enough suffering in your life to provide the motivation.

So that is a possibility, but that's not a problem, because it'll come. If... My sense is that right now, it's just too easy for you.

It's too easy. So the suffering is, I mentioned before, the best motivation for liberation is the desire to escape from suffering or realizing the possibility that is possible to be free of suffering. And that's why the Buddha chose that term to describe his teaching, which is very, very wise.

It's, what's my teaching about? The Buddha said, I'll tell you what it is about. It's not about enlightenment.

It's not about achieving God realization. It's not about that. He's the end of suffering.

So it seems that he attracted mostly people who were at that stage where that meant something to them. I don't know if you are at that stage where the end of suffering means enough to you to provide the intensity for awakening. I was suffering.

That was the motivation. I didn't even have a name for awakening. The wonderful news though is life always gives you what you need.

And it could well be that if you continue your life in this way, the way in which you live will create more and more suffering. Perhaps the loneliest will become unbearable. And so, and then the suffering of the loneliness might drive you into relationship.

And then something may go wrong in the relationship. And then the relationship will become unbearable. And then you will seek out another situation and something will go wrong there.

And then that will become unbearable. And then suddenly you will want to be free of suffering. And there you have the motivation.

So whether you carry on the way you are now, fine. Life will give you what you need. Or if you think, okay, I'll try a relationship.

Great too. You will find the necessary suffering to get you there. And so this is why we are here.

And this is the meaning of retreat. It's a retreat from yourself in order to find what the Buddhists would call the no self or what other teachings would call the deeper self or the Atman or your Buddha nature or the Christ within, whatever term you want to use to point to it. And that's why we're here.

So all the external things here are helpful. It's easier here to connect with the depths of who you are and realize the depths of who you are. Of course, when you leave here, then you get challenged again.

It's not that you don't get challenged here too. And especially if you are still very much identified with the mind, you find many challenges wherever you go. This isn't right.

Don't like that. He doesn't look very spiritual to me. Or the opposite.

All these people are so much more spiritual than me. Do they know that I'm not spiritual? So the practice is to voluntarily as much as possible relinquish identification with the thinking mind and your usual self.

And what very much helps with that is just bring, just as much as you can, don't walk around as a heavy personality and person. No, walk around as a light, as a field of conscious perception, like a little child. It goes and look at everything.

In other words, presence, presence practice. Here, it's more easier than in your usual surroundings. Presence practice, present moment practice.

There's a lot of nature here. I recommend taking walks in nature, looking at the trees, at the sky. There's a lake, the grass, the flowers, many, many lovely things.

Be as present as you can and alert. And as you walk around from one building to another, from here to there, really perceive. That already is a liberation from the usual self because you're not thinking, you cannot really perceive your surroundings fully when your usual self is talking to you.

And it's probably not talking about this present moment, it's talking about what you're going to encounter when you get back home, or what happened last week, or it's doubting that being here is actually a good thing, or it's criticizing something that shouldn't really be here, but it's here. You don't want to, because that's not a retreat. You haven't really retreated, you've retreated on the external level, but you have not used this opportunity to retreat from your usual self, your usual mind.

So use the opportunity and retreat from the usual self, which is your usual mind. And the quickest way to that is alert presence. And you may notice, let's say just you're walking from point A to point B, somewhere on the campus here.

Let's say you're walking on the way there, it's from your room to the library, and you're walking immersed in your usual self, let's say it's a three minute walk. And then suddenly you wake up in the library, perhaps you open a book that says, be present. And then you walk back from the library and suddenly you go, amazing shift.

If your entire world has been transformed, the way in which you experience the world or your reality has completely shifted into something different. You're suddenly a field of consciousness that is perceiving the multiplicity of life in the universe. In fact, it feels that you are a manifestation of this universe perceiving itself.

And you see so much aliveness and beauty all around you. And other senses are part of that also. There's not just the visual, you listen.

There's a sound, there may be birds, other sounds. You breathe in the air, you feel, you hear the sound of your steps on whatever it is, gravel, if there's a sound, or you've sensed the softness of the grass. And you look at the sky without labeling very much.

You don't need to mentally call it what it is, what for? You know what it is without calling it what it is. You don't need to have a mental comment that says, oh, that's a lovely sky.

I wonder if the weather is going to last. No, you don't need that. And this is the discovery that you don't need that.

When you need it, you have it. But if you want to tell somebody the weather forecast, you have it, but you don't need it. You perceive more deeply by not labeling.

And that is the retreat from the mind. And then it becomes a true retreat. So you walk from point A to point B as in that sense of wonder.

And then you sense there's not only then what you perceive through your senses, because after all, that is the surface reality. It's beautiful. But as you perceive the beautiful surface reality of multiplicity of life forms, you can also sense an underlying stillness or presence.

As yourself, I can sense it at this moment. At this moment, words come out of my mouth, but I can sense the place where these words originate. And they do not originate in my mind.

My mind becomes an instrument for it. It formulates the words, but the words originate from a deeper place. And when you listen to these words, you can also listen to these words from that deeper place within yourself and something within you responds, not in words, but it's like a recognition of what it is that I'm talking about.

And so you can, as I speak from that deeper place of alert stillness, you can listen from that deeper place of alert stillness. And now that's a real retreat. Now it's become a retreat.

So whether you're on a retreat depends, of course, on your state of consciousness. So use the opportunity of being here and as much as possible, let go of the usual self, which includes your life situation that you've left behind temporarily. Everybody has one.

You have a certain life situation that's to do with where you live, who you live with, the job you have, your financial situation, even your health situation. It's all to do with your life situation, but you don't want to carry, you don't want to be a walking life situation because then you have to juggle all these things in your mind to keep them going. What about this and what about that?

And at least one area probably is problematic in your life, whether it's your living situation, your home, whether it's your relationship situation or your marriage or whatever it is, or whether it's your financial situation or your job situation or your health situation, it's unlikely that there's not at least one that's quite problematic. And for many of you, it's more than one. There may be even some of you if all these are problematic.

But do you want to walk around as a problematic sense of self? Not saying I'm going to ignore all these problems and never take any more action for the rest of my life. No, it's not that.

But when you don't need that, why be burdened by that? And right now, there's nothing you can do about any of it. So why not step out, transcend your life situation?

And I use that term in the power of now. Instead of being immersed and carrying around with you that your life situation is a burden, a continuous burden, a burden some sense of self, instead of that, be the life. You are life.

You're not just a life situation. You are life. You are an expression of the one life that manifests as the universe.

Underlying the universe, there is the oneness of life. You are that one life that was there before the Big Bang, if there was a Big Bang. You are the one life, the one out of which the whole universe came, and not only out of which the whole universe came, out of which the whole universe continuously comes, continuously brings forth life, new forms.

And you are that. And so, isn't that a much more satisfying way of being in this world than a walking problematic life situation? You are life.

So, and here on this retreat, it's the recognition that you are a manifestation of the universe, of the consciousness that underlies the universe. And you are that universe experiencing yourself, or the universe experiencing itself. And you go, it's all so wonderful.

This mind-made sense of self is also a manifestation of a much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 4] (30:08 - 30:37)
My question is, how do you do the power of now for business? And specifically, I understand this with our personal lives, but in business, I find we're making future goals and plans and such, and trying to align my team with those, and when things don't work out, so how do we sort of use what we're learning here in a business context?

[Speaker 1] (30:38 - 31:33)
Right, well, in business, you have, you set certain goals that you want to achieve, and then you take action towards achieving those goals. And in the meantime, there's a lot of interaction with other people who are also working as a team with you. And there's probably also perhaps interaction with other business organizations.

So first of all, the goal setting and the journey towards achieving particular goals that the organization has set itself. Before I continue, may I ask what kind of business?

[Speaker 4] (31:34 - 31:36)
It's an online business.

[Speaker 1] (31:37 - 31:37)
Okay.

[Speaker 4] (31:37 - 31:38)
Mm-hmm.

[Speaker 1] (31:39 - 31:41)
And what does it do?

[Speaker 4] (31:41 - 31:45)
So we sell information products, business training products.

[Speaker 1] (31:45 - 40:01)
Okay, okay. So that is a potentially a helpful thing for people. Once you have a goal, you will find as you pursue your goal as a team together, continuously obstacles arise as you go towards it.

Whenever you create something new, you will find it's not, it is rarely a very smooth progression. You have to overcome obstacles on the way in the form of people or situations that go wrong, this doesn't work, or try something else. The important thing is not to place an excessive emphasis on the achievement, which is the desired outcome, but to be as present in the doing as you can so that the doing does not become stressful.

Almost every business is, people who are working in it are under stress, I believe. There may be some that are not, but the stress is not the way in which you want to conduct your business because the environment is toxic. A stressful environment is toxic.

So when you can always tell, is the goal something that is for the greater good, or is it an ego-inspired goal? Are you looking, this applies both in a business environment and it applies equally when you have personal goals, it's the same process is involved. When an obstacle arises to immediately face the obstacle, which comes in the form of a situation, something not working, something going wrong, somebody trying to sabotage you, perhaps from some other organization who knows what happens, to never react against the obstacle as if this should not be happening, to immediately to face it and see what is the way beyond it?

How can I either dissolve it, bypass it, or use it? What is so that you don't enter a state of reactivity when obstacles appear on your path? That's important for anybody who pursues a goal.

How, what is your relationship to difficulties and obstacles that arise as you travel towards your goal? And the only conscious way of dealing with obstacles is not to react as if these obstacles should not be happening. So you have to look into what your relationship is with arising obstacles on your path.

And this is not just in business, but anywhere. The unconscious person in business or elsewhere gets upset, angry, aggressive, despondent, very stressed every time something isn't going the way they want it to go. And immediately dysfunctional inner states arise.

And therefore they experience, there are companies where the entire environment is toxic because everybody lives in that way. And ego is also a thing that arises as much as possible be aware so that you don't seek ego satisfaction in the doing. There's a personal ego.

Then one person can sabotage another person in the same company, because you are not free of ego identification. So it's very important to be aware so that you do not seek ego satisfaction through what you are doing. Be present in what you do so that the doing becomes joyful rather than placing so much focus on what you want to achieve that the journey becomes very stressful.

Then nothing is worth achieving if the journey is stressful. You might, let's say you spent a year or two years with some scheme that you want a new business model or whatever it is. How, what is the state of consciousness, the collective state of consciousness while you are traveling towards your goal?

Is it stressed? Is it stressful? Is there a lot of conflict?

Or is it a common enterprise? And is the doing joyful? And it can only be joyful if you place more importance in what you're doing in this present moment than attempting to arrive at some future point.

You know where you want to go to, but as the Bhagavad Gita says, do not be too attached to the outcome. Then it's much more likely that the outcome will be good. But if you have an excessive attachment, you need to achieve that.

You have an excessive attachment to outcome, then the journey becomes very stressful. That's something that is important. And I'm talking not from personal experience because I'm not in business, but I have spoken to people, quite a few, who are in the business environment.

And so I've met a lot of people I've met, been to some relatively conscious companies, they invited me. Of course, unconscious companies wouldn't invite me. And I have spoken to them, and I'm surprised that these conscious companies actually, it's a joy to be there for all the, do the employees, whoever they are, or their partners, do they enjoy being there?

That is vital. Sounds very simple. Or are they so focused on some kind of achievement that the doing is not enjoyable at all?

Do they love being there? What is the relationship between, with you and your colleagues, partners? And those things are vitally important.

And what, I don't know how many employees you have. Again, it's important to make the environment as pleasant for them as possible. Don't, encouraging people to, I'm sure if you are in that kind of environment that is probably more conscious than many others, and you are here, that's a good sign.

So I believe your company is already relatively conscious. Is there any particular problem still that you think is something that you have not been able to go beyond?

No, I just, as I'm trying to become more present myself, because a lot of what you talked about before, that's when I first got into business, it was for ego satisfaction. It was because I was trying to achieve things probably to make myself feel better. And now I've realized that doesn't work.

So now I'm working on it personally, and I'm trying to transfer these skills into the business. So you talked a little bit about that, and I guess the biggest takeaway I had is, it's okay to have goals, it's okay to project into the future as part of business and knowing what you're going. I'm the type of person that's like planning and planning everything down to the detail.

And I realized that that can be counterproductive and to know where we need to go. And then as challenges come up, which is normal, to then become present, become more present.

[Speaker 1] (40:57 - 41:03)
Yes, welcome the challenges rather than resent the challenges. With the team. Yes, together.

[Speaker 4] (41:03 - 41:04)
With the whole team, yeah.

[Speaker 1] (41:04 - 42:23)
Yes, so you can teach them. So I'm sure you have a lot to teach them. So it's wonderful.

So you will probably grow into something big and then invite me and I'll talk to you. Thank you. Relationships will reflect back to you your predominant state of consciousness.

And that's why they are so useful. And so if you are a hermit, then it's very easy to fool yourself as to your state of consciousness. If you avoid contact with other humans, because it's just, you just don't want to know anymore.

[Speaker 2] (42:24 - 42:26)
It's just too unsettling.

[Speaker 1] (42:29 - 45:11)
Then of course, yes, you can probably be in sustained states of if you're lucky enough, somebody brings you food, you don't, you can be in sustained states of presence and believe that you have finally arrived, but it will not yet be deeply rooted within you because it has not been tested in the fire of relationships. As a monk, I knew years ago, a Buddhist monk was telling me that he was in the East somewhere and he, the Westerner, but he had become a Buddhist monk. And his teacher, the abbot of the monastery where he was allowed him to go up a mountain and sit in a little hut for half a year.

And somebody would bring him food every day and he had nothing to do but meditate and sit. And after a few, first, the first month was dreadful, unbearable because he was sitting there with his mind, torturing him. On the inner and the mosquitoes torturing him on the outer level.

And then gradually he was able to let go of that and more and more presence was arising. And he then said, and then in the last month or so, presence was almost continuous and he was convinced that he had reached the state of liberation. And then a message came from the monastery which somebody had realized that your visa has expired.

And so he had to travel to the big city and stand in line at the consulate or whatever it was. And it took hours and then he was in the wrong line and said, I've just been standing here for two hours. No, this is the wrong lineup.

You have to go to that one. And that was the wrong one too. And when he finally got to the official, he was hitting his table.

I've been here for five hours. And then he suddenly became aware and he realized all that beautiful presence was gone. That's relationships.

And that was an easy relationship. Just an official.

[Speaker 2] (45:23 - 45:23)
Relationships.

[Speaker 1] (45:24 - 1:25:02)
Now, there are many kinds of relationships. We will talk about that. The essence of relationships, the question is always whether relationships are working harmoniously and beautifully or whether they are conflict-ridden is determined by whether there is space in your relationship.

Then that applies to any relationship. The question is, is there space in this room? What does space mean?

I don't mean space in the sense of distance between people. That's another aspect. I mean, inner space.

There is a line in Kahlil Gibran's prophet which talks about space, but this is not what I mean. This is also true, by the way. He says, let there be spaces in your relationship, which means don't cling to each other all the time.

Occasionally go your own way and then come back together. That's also true. But what I'm talking about here is inner space in the relationship.

And what that is, you probably know already, and we will come to that now as we address the different kinds of relationships that you encounter in life and see how the arising new consciousness can be sustained in those challenging situations because there is no doubt that human beings are very challenging. The others are the human beings. So you have, well, of course, the first thing that comes to mind when you talk about relationships is the intimate relationships, which often usually start off as romantic and then become something else.

Those, this is what all usually comes to mind, what is what many films are still about, movies that you see, a large part are still about that. And it is what many people's lives are preoccupied with, what people look to for their sense of fulfillment and happiness. And at the same time, those intimate relationships are one of the greatest sources of unhappiness.

So a little contradiction here, of course, people look to it for their fulfillment and happiness, and in many, many cases, the opposite happens. And in many, many cases, the people experience a shift from the very person that was going to, was supposed to make me happy, now makes me unhappy. That's the normal course of relationships.

I read the other day, I don't know who said it. And he said, there is no marriage in which a week after the wedding, there's no marriage in which one week after the wedding, you cannot find grounds for divorce. And the secret is in continuing to find grounds for marriage, he said.

Before we, let's put this aside, because that is the most problematic. But you are engaged, we will come to that, of course, but you are engaged throughout the day and throughout your life in many kinds of relationship, different types of relationship. You have relationships with your children, if you have children.

You have relationships with your grown-up children. You have relationships with your parents, relationships with siblings, family members, relatives. You have relationships with friends.

You have relationships, casual, brief relationships when you interact with people to do this or that, to buy something, to ask for information. On the telephone, these are all relationships and they're all part of, if you, if there is dysfunction in you, egoic dysfunction, that will manifest in all relationships. If you respond unconsciously out of the ego, then usually it amplifies, it fuels conflict and you bring more unconsciousness.

But in a strange way, you also, your state of consciousness affects other humans, even humans you don't come into contact with. That's a little mysterious, but all humans at a deeper level are connected. There's one collective human consciousness, which is an aspect of the greater consciousness of the universe, just a ray of the greater.

There's a collective human consciousness. On that deeper level, every human is connected to every other human. And what you, if you embody, if you begin to awaken into the state of presence, it's not a state, but let's call it a state.

If you awaken into a state of presence, dimension of presence, that makes it easier for other humans to also awaken into presence. And so in a subtle way, that's how humans are connected. For example, in a somewhat different way, it has been discovered when one person makes a new, fantastic discovery, quite often, almost at the same time in other parts of the world, some other humans have made a similar discovery almost at the same time.

It's often been discovered that's because all humans are connected at a deeper level. So in that sense, even if you have little or no contact with other humans, if you're present, you still affect the totality of human consciousness. But most humans are continuously interacting with other humans.

And then you become a teacher of presence. Obviously, if your profession involves a lot of contact with other humans, let's even a helping profession, then more obviously you become a teacher of presence when you realize that whether you are a teacher or a social worker or a doctor or a nurse or a therapist, a psychotherapist or physical therapist, so if you're in some kind of helping profession, then you become a teacher of presence. Of course, whatever you're teaching will be a different thing, but you realize when you convey the whatever it is that you, the modality that we used to interact with those humans, helping capacity, if you're present, that presence flows into the way in which you relate to the other human being.

Let's say you're a therapist. A therapist spends a lot of time listening to humans and they're talking. That's usually encouraged in therapy.

So you're listening and the other person, your client, your patient, whatever you call him or her, is talking usually about their problems. And then the therapist has a certain modality. He or she has been trained in a particular therapeutic approach, whatever it may be.

Could be old-fashioned psychoanalysis or something more modern. So the therapist will be applying their particular modality to be trained to approach the situation in a particular way. But when the therapist becomes a teacher of presence, in addition to being a therapist, there's an energy that arises when the other person is talking, the therapist is listening.

In that listening, there's an energy of presence because the therapist, if he's a good, if he becomes a teacher of presence, he's no longer listening so much to the conceptual mind, but listening in the state of the clarity of presence. Just, it's more than listening. Presence is there and you embody the presence for the other person who does not have presence yet, hasn't discovered it yet.

And then the most important part of your therapeutic relationship becomes a state of presence. And then you find yourself, regardless of your training, whatever you have been trained to say or do, you may find intuition coming in more and more. Maybe you've been trained in a particular therapeutic approach, but you will then gradually, your intuition will become more important than whatever you've learned when you're training as a therapist.

More and more, you will find your intuition will come in more. And suddenly you say something and you didn't know beforehand until you said it. It didn't come, you don't come from a place of knowing, you come from a place of not knowing, which is very deep.

And then you become an effective therapist. Only, and so I have met therapists, they've spent years sitting with people and applying their techniques, whatever they learned. And then gradually, or maybe not even gradually, they began to realize, or maybe they didn't realize even consciously, just gradually the ability to listen grew in them.

And then that became just presence. And then they became extremely effective as therapists, because presence was taking over. Whatever their training became secondary, in some cases they all completely didn't use it anymore.

But sometimes it comes only after, the question is, when can presence use you as a channel? Sometimes it requires a lot of practice before presence can use you as a, not always, but sometimes. This not only applies to helping professions, it also applies to presence arising in you when you are engaged in some creative endeavor, whatever it may be, you're a musician, or an artist, or whatever it may be, a composer, maybe, interesting.

Is presence able to use you as a vehicle, or as a conduit, can flow through you and inspire what you create and do? Yes, but often it requires many hours of practice so that the channel is ready for presence. There was a, I've often, a few times quoted, there was a writer who discovered, who examined creative people, like musicians, who created things that were, became classics, never, whether it's classic, for example, in music, classical composers, like Mozart or Beethoven, or modern pop music, like the Beatles.

And he looked at the hours they spent practicing their craft, so to speak, thousands of hours before presence was able to suddenly come in and they became inspired. And he stipulated, he even, he calculated, and said, 10,000 hours you need. And then there's a possibility for presence to flow in, and then what you then create through presence, you don't create it, what is being created through you becomes unbelievable.

How can a human create such beauty or such powerful thing? Even with, I mean, if you look at the Beatles is relatively, compared to Beethoven, Beethoven, Mozart are more complex, classical music constructions. Nevertheless, the Beatles also, the songs were deeply inspired as a quality to make many of their songs that, this is why they stay around, they'll still be played 200 years time, 300 years time, whereas most other music disappears after a few months or after a year, definitely, or even a few weeks, popular for three weeks and then it's gone, because it's just noise.

With a little bit of hype, you can make that noise popular for a little while and then it disappears. But some, there's a quality, what is created through presence, there's a quality to it that you cannot define, but almost everybody can sense it and feel it and even be touched by it. So I wouldn't say that, in a way, in a wider sense, you could say people like that, they are also teachers of presence.

They teach through whatever they create through presence, becomes extremely helpful to other humans because it still contains the energy of presence. How do I truly forgive myself for not being present with another, Janice? Well, I assume the question refers to something that happened in the past, not in the present, because if the other is here with you now, then there's nothing to forgive, you just be present.

So it must be something that you were not present with someone in the past because there was not enough presence in you. You cannot manifest any behavior beyond your level of consciousness. Either you had no idea what presence was, you were not yet able to access that dimension of consciousness, or it was there very weak in you, not strong enough perhaps to survive in that particular interaction or relationship.

Some parents have that feeling also because when they look back upon how they brought up their children, they cannot believe how unconscious they were as parents. Now, there's no such thing as totally conscious parents. No matter what you do, there's always something that you don't do right.

Absolute perfection is just not possible. But there are now for the first time perhaps in history, there are parents who are relatively conscious, who are endeavoring to be conscious as parents. In my generation, it was unheard of.

Conscious parents, what is that? You just, the parents brought you up in the same way that they were brought up and in the same way that was sanctioned by the surrounding culture. That's how you were brought up.

Conscious parents, what's that nonsense? And of course, in my generation, I didn't know anybody who had even remotely conscious parents. My parents, of course, they did the best they could.

They loved me to the best of their ability, but they were both very unconscious. In the later, when my dad was very old, some of the egoic self broke off, little bits of pieces of his ego disintegrated. There was still an ego left, but the massive ego that he had before started to dissolve.

If he had lived beyond his age, he reached the age of 90. Perhaps if he had lived to 100 or 110, he might've gone much further still. But my parents were deeply unconscious.

There was constant conflict at home, terrible drama and scenes and shouting and screaming and physical violence. It was a nightmare. And that was not uncommon.

Of course, even nowadays, there are children, still many, who have to endure that, still many, but there are conscious parents. And I have met children who are born into a conscious family. And that's a wonderful thing.

It's a new thing. So forgiving yourself for not being present, there's always a tendency of the ego to identify with certain conditions. So the ego identifies with the condition of unconsciousness and says, that was me, and I was wrong.

I should have been conscious at the time, but you were not. You couldn't have been more conscious at the time than you were at the time. So there comes a, you forgive yourself by realizing that nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness.

And whatever you did in the past was an expression of, on your personal level, of the evolutionary state of yourself and on a collective level, you manifest the evolutionary state of humanity until you begin to awaken. And then you become a forerunner, at the forefront, spearheading the growth of consciousness. There were many silly things I did in relationships when I was in my 20s, unconscious.

Nothing drastic, fortunately, but it could have been, but hurting people, but not being aware of it, ego, egoic motivations, and so on. I wasn't even there. I was, there was conditioning operating through me, the ways in which my mind had been conditioned.

I wasn't awake yet, so it was a kind of dreamlike state. So how, it shouldn't be that difficult to forgive yourself for something that you did in a dream. And it's the unconscious state is very much like that.

If you have still an opportunity to go to this person and perhaps explain that you were unconscious, if that is, we don't know what level of consciousness this person's at, whether this person would be able to listen to you and even understand what you're saying. So, or this person may not be alive anymore, or there may not be an opportunity to speak, but either way, you forgive yourself by realizing that there is ultimately nothing to forgive. And that even applies to another person because if forgiving goes both ways, sometimes you have to forgive yourself, but you also have to forgive somebody else.

If you do not want to carry the enormous burden of carrying a grievance, which is a dreadful thing, that could, just one grievance towards another human being, that is a heavy grievance that you carry, can stop the arising of presence in you. So letting go of grievances is vital. And again, it's whatever somebody else did to you, they acted out of their level of unconsciousness.

So then it, rather than make it into an identity, somebody does something that's unconscious to you, and then you transform it mentally into that person's identity that makes it almost impossible to forgive. In ordinary human interaction, it is very important to overlook things that humans do because every human being that you come into contact with will manifest, even if they are awakening, they are in the awakening process, they will still manifest occasionally areas of unconsciousness when they interact with you. They might lie to you for some reason here and there.

They might do this or that. And then if you focus on that excessively, you say, he lied to me. Okay, have you ever lied to anybody?

No, I never lie. Okay, then you need to. He lied to me.

And then you focus on that and you amplify that and you make that into part of his or her identity. And then it's very easy to do that. And this is judgment.

And you focus on that little thing and you amplify it and it becomes part of who you think that person is. So if you want to have a relatively harmonious relationship, many things you need to overlook in the other person because every person has his or her unconsciousness that occasionally manifests. Hopefully not massive unconsciousness because you might not want to be with him or her to have a close interaction.

But some unconsciousness, yes. Some insensitivity may arise in theirs. They may say or do something that is selfish or that they may have a very one-sided perspective of something.

They may misperceive you. They may misperceive your motivation. You misperceive their motivation.

All kinds of things. So to forgive in a present situation means to overlook. So it's not the big forgiving, but an overlooking of things so that you can focus on the being of the other person rather than focus on the faults, which are unconsciousness.

So the same applies to human beings. If you see a fault, don't dwell on it as applies to you if you're looking for a home in California. If you see a fault, don't dwell on it.

This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. Your sense of self-worth is diminishing, and that's a source of great suffering.

So the story, if we go back to the beginning, the story of you, let's travel back in time to a prehistoric, mythological time where we encounter a young man going for a walk in the woods, and his name, according to ancient Greek mythology, is Narcissus. Narcissus, the young man walking in the woods, very happy, contemplating nature, not disturbed yet by incoming text messages, or Facebook postings, or Instagram, or possible Tinder dates, not distracted by anything, just being there, present, enjoying the aliveness of the present moment. And then this young man came upon a pool of water or a little pond, a very still pond.

And of course, at those times, there were no mirrors yet. There was no technology. Mirrors had not been invented.

He looked into the pond, and he saw his own reflection in the pond. And he was amazed at the beauty of his own reflection. Now, you might think, is that perhaps a very ancient prophecy of the selfie?

Can't take my eyes off it. No, it was not a prophecy of the selfie, but there's a connection, of course. There is a connection.

This is the glass surface of the selfie, and here we have the reflection of his own image in the water. Now, the story goes that he fell in love with his own reflection, and he could not get away from it. He got drawn back to it again and again.

And although the story says that he fell in love with his own reflection, a more precise way of putting it would be to say that he became obsessed with his own reflection, because ultimately, I don't know if you have experienced it ever, falling in love is a kind of obsession. Not loving. Love is something else.

I'm talking about falling in love, of course, is a very obsessive thing. I need you. Don't you ever leave me.

And then, of course, he or she leaves, or you leave. That's a long story. We all know it.

And he lost his happiness. He was no longer happy. There are different versions of the story, but in the more ancient versions, eventually he commits suicide.

So that story, in mythology, often expresses a deep truth which otherwise humans would not understand or could not express in any abstract way. The truth needs to be embedded in a story. And there's a very deep truth here that points to the arising of a mentally-created self image that people have and live with.

So it's almost as if you had a phantom that walks with you wherever you go that is your mind-created image or concept of who you are. And that is what we call the ego. The ego is a mental image conditioned by the past, conditioned by your environment and many other factors, a mental image, a conceptual sense of self that you identify with so completely that you disappear in it and live through it.

You believe that that is who you are. And that is the conditioned mind-made self. It consists of layers, different layers.

At the most fundamental level, first of all, everybody identifies, first of all, with your physical body. That's the most fundamental level of identification. You are, you believe that you are the body.

You identify with the body that you are. And the body, of course, already is a problematic thing to identify with because you compare this body, that you say, I am this body, this physical form, and then you compare to others. And it can be a source of pride if your body is better looking or stronger than most other bodies.

The ego gets in there and feels inflated, greater. And it can also be a source of suffering or shame if your body is not the way you think it should be or society tells you it should be, or when you compare it to others, it's not as strong or as beautiful as others, then you're, again, you suffer. You have a sense of self that feels less than.

On the other side, you might have a sense of self that feels more than. People who have a strong or beautiful body, when I was young, I would have given 20 years of my life if God or the universe had said to me, I can give you a beautiful, strong body and make you into a good-looking man that attracts countless women, I would have said, it's a deal. 20 years of my life, I'll be happy, but it didn't happen.

But I can see how people who are good-looking or strong or both, how easy it is for them to seek a large part of their identity in their external appearance. And that can be fine for a while, but inevitably, of course, what is a source of pleasure for some years, gradually and perhaps even quickly turns into a source of suffering because the body does not last. And a day comes when you look in the mirror and the mirror image is no longer the same as it was 10 or 20 or 30 years ago, especially if you have a photo of yourself next to the mirror.

Something went very wrong here. And then it becomes a source of suffering. Now, in our civilization, there are repair jobs that you can do that for a while will help you feel you're still okay, good-looking, but inevitably you suffer, begin to suffer more and more because who you think you are is diminishing.

Who you think you are, the value, your sense of self-worth is diminishing. And that's a source of great suffering. And of course, humans who identified with a negative body image, they are suffering already when they are young.

They don't have to wait until the body grows old. So we have identification with the body and then you put clothes on the body, of course, that they become an extension of the body and they can add something. They can hide things.

They can conceal things that don't look so good or they can enhance things that look good. And then it's nice when people are looking at me and it feels good to the ego. In particular situations, you may lose awareness and regress to total identification with some reactive pattern.

[Speaker 2] (1:25:02 - 1:25:30)
And it could be the pain body, a usually problematic area for many or most people is relationships of whatever kind or on whatever level.

[Speaker 1] (1:25:31 - 1:26:50)
It's where people seek their happiness and it's where many people find their unhappiness. And so I'm talking about both intimate relationships, somebody you live with, and I'm talking about other kinds of relationship also, at work, other family members, relatives, friends, and even very brief relationships because any interaction with another human being is, I'm using our relationship in a wider sense, any interaction with another human being is a relationship. You are relating to that person.

And so it is, for many people, most of their or a large part of their suffering or unhappiness, unfortunately, is derived from relationships. They tend to go wrong so often or present so many problems and obstacles.

[Speaker 2] (1:26:52 - 1:27:05)
And it seems that human beings are just so terribly difficult, except one.

[Speaker 1] (1:27:08 - 1:27:30)
The one who is listening to these words. You remember the statement, know thyself, famous words of wisdom.

[Speaker 2] (1:27:31 - 1:27:36)
Knowing yourself, there are two levels to knowing yourself.

[Speaker 1] (1:27:38 - 1:35:53)
One is a level of mental, emotional, and reactive patterns that you display in your life and the ability to be aware of them. That is one level of self-knowledge, of knowing yourself. That is the kind of thing that in sometimes in good therapy sessions, if you have a good, aware therapist, it can be helpful to become aware of that level in yourself so that you know what your predominant patterns are.

Doesn't everybody know what their patterns are? They are so identified with their patterns that there's no awareness left. And that usually means when a person is so unconscious, that unconscious, the definition of unconscious, the way we use it here in a spiritual sense, not in a clinical sense, I'm not talking about unconscious, but in a spiritual sense, unconscious is to be totally identified with thoughts and emotions.

So there's no room for any awareness left. So you are in the grip of the thought, in the grip of the emotion, and often the thoughts and emotions are linked, go together. They have you in their grip so that they basically, you are them, you are the emotion.

And those people who are so unconscious, there's still millions around, you might've noticed. Often they have a tendency of seeking always, there's always the people are always to be blamed out there. There's always people that point their fingers at why these people are so bad and what they're doing to you or how awful they are.

There's never looking at oneself. Jesus already had that statement. Why do you see the, what is the saying about the, but, yeah, you see a little splinter in the other person's eye, but you don't see the huge splinter that is in your eye.

Very profound statement. So why don't you find that first, he says. So in other words, he says, know thyself, be aware of your own patterns.

And most people here have that awareness, but perhaps not all the time. For many of you, when you are challenged in a particular way, in particular situations, you may lose awareness and regress to total identification with some reactive pattern. And it could be the pain body.

As you know, the pain body is old accumulated emotion that still I regard it as an almost autonomous entity that lives in you. It's a way of looking at it, but there's a lot of truth to this. There's an emotional field that lives in you as almost as an entity, one could say.

That sounds slightly spooky, but one could say that even a thought is an entity. When you think a thought, it is an energy formation. It is a little being that you give birth to.

So it has a life, it depends, for its life, it depends on you, on your life, but it is a little entity. And so in some forms of either deep unconscious or when mental illness, sometimes it can happen that the mind gets completely taken over by these little thought entities. And so you're totally then totally occupied.

Your mind is totally, pocky, another word for occupied is, I won't say it, it sounds too spooky. So you're totally occupied by these thoughts. And they pretend to be you.

So that is total lack of awareness. So it's essential for your spiritual growth to be continuously alert and aware. And vigilant so that you are able to be there in the background, so to speak, as the awareness in your daily life.

So that you're not completely taken over by the arising thoughts and arising emotions. When you interact with people, when you become upset about this or that, always any kind of upset or disturbance in your energy field can be very helpful. Do not believe that, oh, I shouldn't have this disturbance in my energy field, or I shouldn't be upset because I'm spiritual.

I don't get upset about these things anymore. But be honestly, observe what arises, and then observe how does it arise? And as I already mentioned last night, very often you will find it is caused by certain thoughts in your mind, certain interpretations, certain reactions.

It can also happen that a reaction comes so suddenly that it's just an emotion waiting to come up, an emotion. And this is what the pain body does. As you may know, the pain body is not necessarily always active in you.

There are periods when the old emotional pain that you still carry around with you is dormant, and then it leaves you in peace for a while. Then you are fine. You meet somebody, and this person is lovely, and it all goes fine.

And you might spend some time together, and it's still fine. And then you go on vacation together for the first time. And then there comes a moment when something else comes in that's not fine, either in you or through the other.

And what happens in relationships, the pain body periodically needs to feed on a certain experience that corresponds to its energy field. The vibrational frequency of its energy field is, ah, ah. A good external image of the pain body in, I think it's in Lord of the Rings, is this little being.

I can't remember the name. It goes, ah, ah. Ah, ah.

[Speaker 9] (1:35:53 - 1:35:57)
Ah, ah. Ah, ah. Ah, ah.

Ah, ah. Ah, ah.

[Speaker 1] (1:35:57 - 2:20:49)
Ah, ah. Ah, ah. And even the little being once was a normal being, according to the legend in this.

It's kind of modern mythology. That being was once a normal, lovely human. And there is still, although this being has been completely taken over by what I call the pain body, occasionally there are still instances when the original being that's been completely taken over still shines through.

There's a little bit of tiny glimmers of awareness come in occasionally. And then you almost feel sorry for it. But then again, the pain body, and if you feel sorry and you give in, then immediately the pain body will take advantage of that.

So that's a lovely mythological, modern mythological illustration of the pain body. So to observe that in yourself, in relationships, how it periodically comes up, either in your partner or in yourself, wanting some kind of drama, amplifying something little into something big, because it wants to feed on your partner's reaction. It wants the emotional negativity.

It needs emotional negativity from the other in order to suck it up. And then you give back of it to the other, the pain body. Then mutually they energize each other.

And that is unconscious. That is how couples, many couples, most couples perhaps, unless there's already considerable consciousness there in both of them, or at least one of them, they go through that periodically, don't realize that that is what it is. And at first, there are even people who feel they need that drama to feel that the relationship is still real.

And that is, there comes a point when it gets too much. So then the pain that arises so often and so frequently, it gets too much, I can't live with this person anymore. And then you separate.

But if you haven't, if the awareness hasn't come in so that you can be aware of your own pain body, what you contribute to it, then you will repeat the same thing in the next relationship. So the pain body needs to re-experience emotional pain through drama. And whoever it comes up first in, it is usually an over, it's always recognizable by being an overreaction to something, an event, something you said, something you did, or something you failed to say, or you failed to do.

But the person who is displaying the pain body does not know it's an overreaction. So only an outside observer or the other might see that it's an overreaction. But to the pain body, it seems a totally natural reaction.

So you need to know what situations, there may be certain situations in your life that tend to trigger the pain body in your relationship or at work. There may be certain people that your pain body is susceptible to, resonates with. If you live alone, then the pain body has a little problem.

What am I going to feed on? I can't have drama with myself, or can I? Yes, you can.

You can have the drama in your mind. You can have a stream of destructive and negative thoughts in your mind, either about yourself or others. They may not be here, but you have the thoughts about them.

They may be in your past, they may be dead. But the pain body, if there's nobody around that the pain body can feed on through negative emotion, it will feed on negative thought streams, your thought streams. And this is where the addiction to negative thinking comes from.

You can speak out, maybe you can post something on one of the many platforms that are available, something that is sane rather than insane. But it may, perhaps you can post something that points out the insanity of it all. So how you respond, and that, if you're, I have to, we can use the two words, react, respond.

The way I use them is, react means it's a karmically determined reaction. You react out of the conditioning of your mental, emotional field. Response implies that you are present, and your action is no longer determined by the mental, emotional conditioning of the person.

There is a higher intelligence, one could say, or I call it wisdom, but in other words, there's a higher intelligence that can then operate in your daily life. A higher intelligence, which we could call wisdom, but it's not the conventional intelligence that you can measure in IQ tests. That's a very limited version of intelligence.

There's a higher intelligence that comes in through presence, that deals more intelligently with any situation that arises in your life. That's the only possible way of dealing intelligently is by dealing with the situation through presence, especially important, of course, in human relationships, because there's so much unconsciousness that happens in the interaction between human beings, between two human beings, and larger numbers of human beings, and then groups of your collectives of your millions of human beings here, and another million there and there. You can see when you look at politics and affairs and to what's happening in the world, there's very little intelligence.

The way they deal with things, and you would be, you're amazed. How can they be so short-sighted and ultimately have to use a simple word, stupid? But these people have degrees.

They have university degrees. How can they be so stupid? Well, they only activated a very limited version of intelligence that you can measure in IQ tests.

That's not enough. I'm sorry, I don't want to offend anybody who has a very high IQ, or is a member of this, there's an organization called Mensa, I believe. So if you have a very IQ, you can be a member of that, and that's good for your identity, of course.

Intelligence. So I don't want to take anything away from you, but that is not real intelligence. Yes, it's a form of intelligence, but it's a relatively low form of intelligence.

A much higher intelligence comes in through presence, and that is lacking in the world. There are, occasionally you see, very rarely you see a politician, actually you can see, oh, this person has some real intelligence and insights, and it's usually not the people who are running things. If it's a politician, it's usually somebody who's been pushed to the periphery of politics, and from there he or she comments on the stupidity of what's happening in the world.

I've observed it, it's in different countries, a similar phenomenon. There are, okay, there are a few people here and there who can see clearly where we are going and what we are doing, and it's crazy. Because there is a lack of true, this higher intelligence that is beyond the egoic mind.

And, well, at the moment it doesn't look good because we are going, what, no. I was going to use that weird expression about the hand basket again. So when you can see it, now it's important when you look at the state of the world, it's important that you do not enter a reactive mode because that will draw you into unconsciousness.

If you watch too much television or current affairs, you will be drawn into, most likely, unconsciousness, unless you watch it as an, unless you watch it as an anthropological study of how misguided humanity can be. So you need to stay present while you look at all this and see what's happening. Question may arise, shouldn't I be doing something to, well, there may be something you can do, bring some sanity into this world, perhaps through saying something, speaking out, pointing out something, not creating enemies.

If you see people are deluded in what they say or do, don't make them into enemies and attack them and say, you are totally crazy. No, it's the, it may be that the, what they, what they do may be and probably is dysfunctional and stupid, or the opinions they hold may be extremely misguided and irrational. So you can address the opinions that they hold their mental positions and point out the irrationality and so on, without making the people who hold the opinion into enemies.

So don't equate the mental positions that people hold with who they essentially are. You can speak out, maybe you can post something on one of the many platforms that are available, something that is sane rather than insane. But it may, perhaps you can post something that points out the insanity of it all.

Some people do that, so that's a good thing. No, because some people may suddenly see, oh yes, that's true. So higher intelligence comes in and that can then deal with situations and that's the end of karma.

What humanity is doing now collectively is karma playing itself out, the movement of unconsciousness. And so, as we mentioned yesterday, with reference to individuals, you remember we talked about responsibility. Can you hold a person responsible for what they do if they are unconscious?

We talked about that yesterday. If they are in the grip of their mental, emotional conditioning, that is part, that's their karma. Can you hold a karmic formation, person, can you hold a karmic formation responsible for what they do?

Not really. So there's a deep wisdom in what Jesus said, forgive them for they know not what they do. Forgiveness means the realization that they are not responsible, they cannot do otherwise.

But we also, and this also applies to the collective, what all the politicians are doing and so on. They don't know any better. They are in the grip of egoic reactivity and short-sightedness that comes with it and so on.

But as is the case with individuals, although they may not be and cannot be held responsible and yet they have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness, this is how humans ultimately awaken. They are not responsible, but they still have to, they create suffering for themselves and others. And through the suffering that's created by the unconsciousness, an awakening happens.

So in other words, the ego is necessary for the awakening to happen. The ego ultimately self-destructs. It has built into it a self-destruct function.

That is ultimate wisdom. So that also applies to the collective. Already, if you look at the 20th century, the wars that happened and the internal conflicts in countries that happens, the countless millions upon millions killed by other humans, what they did, the terrible suffering, this is all the movement of unconsciousness.

They don't know what they do. And then humanity suffers and suffers and suffers. Through the suffering, gradually an awakening happens.

So the ego's dysfunction creates suffering and ultimately the suffering acts as an awakener. It's just a question of how much longer is the suffering going to go? And what's the next stage, you may ask, on the scale of collective suffering?

I don't know, but it doesn't look good at the moment. But you are here to represent, to embody the higher intelligence. I mean, hopefully you don't make that into a mental concept.

I embody the higher intelligence. It is true, but it should not become a mental concept that you identify with. And so the sanity, you embody the sanity in a world that is still predominantly, one has to say, insane in many ways.

Not all of it is insane, but a lot of it, some important parts are insane. So let's then see what the, whatever comes is, may be bad from a lower perspective, doesn't look good. But ultimately, everything that happens is in the service of the evolution of consciousness, even in your own life.

And if it applies in your own life, it also applies to the collective of humanity. When you wait for the next challenge, do you completely, does it completely draw you out of yourself? Ha ha.

Now let's look at a little bit from a different chapter. You can see that it doesn't really matter where you open the book. That's ideal for meditative reading.

He that knows how to walk interiorly and to make but little account of things exteriorly does not look for places nor wait for seasons to perform exercises of devotion. The man of interior life soon recollects himself because he never wholly porous force himself upon exterior things. Exterior labor is no prejudice to him nor any employment necessary for the time.

But as things happen, so he accommodates himself to them. Let's look at those two sentences, very important. The man, the person, the human being, of interior life soon recollects himself because he never wholly porous himself force upon exterior things.

A lovely way of putting it. The interior man, again, we had that before. It means, it points to who you are at the level of awareness, the unconditioned being, the timeless in you, the essence of who you are, the interior being, soon recollects himself.

Never really, you never, the interior man never completely loses himself in the external. He or she soon recollects himself because he never wholly, I'll just put it into slightly more modern English. He never wholly porous force himself upon exterior things.

To pour yourself into exterior things, to completely lose yourself in exterior things, you observe it all the time. When you just, before you see it in yourself, look at other humans around you, how they lose themselves or that the slightest challenge comes in the form of an unexpected setback, something going wrong here or there, some difficult situation, a person not doing what I expect them to do, whatever it is, how quickly people pour themselves into exterior things. And so this thing suddenly becomes of absolute importance.

That's what it means, pouring yourself out into things, which ultimately, of course, you pour yourself into your thoughts. Every thought that arises takes complete possession of you. You pour all your attention into that.

So you're continuously lost, a continuous loss, amazing. You can see it in others. Just wait, people around you, how, what they do when challenges come.

Okay, you've done that. Now you've recognized in others. The next step is, oh, can you recognize in yourself?

Do you do that also? When you wait for the next challenge, do you completely, does it completely draw you out of yourself? And when it does, don't beat yourself up.

But even just noticing that that's what's happening is a huge gain in consciousness. So you don't beat yourself up and say, oh, I can't do it. No, just notice it.

Any pattern you notice in yourself means there is some consciousness. There's awareness there. It's when you don't know it, that you're completely trapped in it.

And if you don't know it, there's not much you can do, except after the challenge has passed, perhaps you can look back and say, oh, I completely lost it there again. And when that, so awareness comes after the challenge, which is even, which is still better than no awareness at all. And because if there's no awareness at all, even the most unconscious reaction, you will justify afterwards to yourself and to others.

The ego is good at finding excuses and justifications. The most absurd justifications will do. It's an automatic defense mechanism of the ego.

So if you're very unconscious, of course you wouldn't even be listening to this. I'm not talking to people who are totally unconscious because they're not listening. They can't.

There's no space in them to listen to this. Without a little bit of space at least, you can't listen to this. It will be dreadful, completely meaningless or threatening.

There's a difference between appreciating something and being attached to something because you derive your sense of identity from it. This, by the way, also applies to possessions because in a way you could look at the body as something that you have rather than something as you are. Although I've said somewhere in a book, just as a meditative practice, you are your body, but not the physical body where you go deeper into the body.

That's another story. But really the physical body, you are not the physical body. Even the language knows that.

When people use language, in all languages, I assume, people refer to my body. And they say, I have a body. I have a good-looking body.

I have a ugly body, whatever. But they say they have a body. So they must have realized language has, maybe a little bit of wisdom has crept into language.

And so you say, I have a body, which means you are not the body. So anyway, everybody says they have a body. So they are not the body.

But to appreciate something that you have, whether it's a body that you have or some kind of object that you have or some kind of ability that you have, whatever it may be, to appreciate that is fine. To like it, you love it, but not in a deeply attached sense that you do not, to appreciate something is different from deriving partly your sense of identity from it. Let's say you have a nice, an object that you own, and you, perhaps it's been with you for a long time or not, and it looks nice, it has quality to it, perhaps, whatever it may be, and you appreciate it.

There's nothing wrong with your body. If you happen to have a lovely body, you appreciate it, you look after it too. You do your best to keep it going through good nutrition and exercise.

Nothing wrong with that. And even to say, oh, I look great. But in a superficial sense, not that knowing that it's not going to last, nothing is going to last.

Everything will leave you or you leave it. And to appreciate something is actually an important thing. You can incorporate it into your practice of gratitude, which is a spiritual practice strongly linked to present moment awareness.

On this, gratitude is to appreciate the goodness of things, whether you own them or not. You can walk and have gratitude for the beautiful things, such as the flowers, the trees, the sky, the sunshine. Gratitude doesn't necessarily mean thank you for this.

It doesn't necessarily involve words. It's just to give it attention and to appreciate it, its aliveness or its beauty. You can have gratitude for the flowers that are here, which means you appreciate the goodness of so many things in this world, but you are not attaching yourself or using it in the service of your sense of self.

So there's a difference. I have a car. Well, I talked about my car that I had when I lived in England.

I had this Lada, beautiful, lovely car. And I loved it. I had gratitude for it.

People laughed at it. And I was sitting, driving. Sometimes people say, ah-ha-ha, a Lada.

And I realized the people who are driving this car are either relatively poor or they have no ego. In my case, both was true, both applied. And then 17 years ago, I was no longer poor and I bought a luxury car and I still have it.

And I'm going to keep it until either it dies or I die. And I love it just as much as the Lada. It just embodies quality.

Don't use it that much, but it's still there. And when I go down, I greet it, say hello. Hello.

And it seems almost that things, even so-called inanimate things seem to almost respond. It's almost as if it could sense you. A weird thing happened when I left England.

I sold my Lada. A friend of mine needed a car. I sold it, not very much.

And this car had never broken down while I had it. And it was a month after he started using it, it broke down completely and couldn't even be repaired. And...

And... And... And...

And... The car was not happy, it seems. So yes, the appreciation of things, a gratitude for something that is in their field of awareness, whether you own it or not, become secondary.

There are people, of course, who tell you, I've met some very wealthy people who tell me, I have this wealth, but I'm not attached to anything anymore. And whether or not this is true, you can't really know until you experience loss. So if you say, okay, I have a Ferrari.

I don't have a Ferrari. That's not my type of car, but somebody says, I have a Ferrari Tester, Testeros, Testostero, Testerosa. I have to get the name right.

But I'm not identified with it at all. And so, but you, but of course you have this car and it's red, it's red and it's very noisy. It's meant to be extremely noisy because it attracts attention.

Everybody looks when you drive. Baa! Baa!

Baa! Baa! Baa!

Baa! Baa! Baa!

Baa! But I'm not attached to it. I'm not at all.

I'm not at all. And then one day you come back and somebody has scratched your car. And, Baa!

or somebody, it's gone completely. Somebody stole it. You were not attached.

No. So when you say I'm not attached, you may not know whether this is true or not until you lose it. So to appreciate the difference between ego attachment, to have some in the service of ego, or to really appreciate seeing something without using it in the service of the ego, there's a big difference.

So whether it's a body or objects or abilities also, if you're good at certain, you have certain abilities, whether they are physical or you're very good at something, it could be playing an instrument, or you're a great expert at this or that. And again, that's lovely. Again, the question is, are you deriving your sense of identity from it?

Let's say you're a great musician, piano player, and you derive your identity from it, and then something happens, perhaps something happens to your hands, and suddenly you can't play anymore. There would be, that is maybe a certain amount of pain can be involved in that, but if there has been an ego attachment, if this function was the main source of ego identity, you as the famous, let's say a famous pianist, then, or let's say a sports person who is very good, he got a gold medal or whatever place, and suddenly an injury, can't do it anymore. Does your whole life suddenly collapse, and the rest of your life you're unhappy, you're totally defeated?

It does happen to people, because their sense of identity was exclusively derived from that great ability that they had. And that is the difference between appreciating it, being grateful for what you can do, but your identity needs to come from a deeper place, a more real place, the only real place from being, not some kind of function that you may be good at, because at some point, most likely, you won't be good at it anymore. And so it's very, a huge difference between those two approaches to what you can do.

Important, be careful that you don't derive your identity from something that is part of the flux of impermanence. Impermanence, it could leave you at any moment. That's the summary of the entire course, and the course is about as long as the Bible, it's huge.

But it can summarize in these few words. If you understand what that means, you don't need to do the course, you might still enjoy reading it, but you don't need it. Now, a few, these are the interesting lines here.

About defensiveness, when you feel the need arise to be defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. It is not danger that comes when defenses are laid down. It is safety, it is peace, it is joy, and it is God.

So, when you feel the need arise to be defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. When you become defensive about something, then it will be something that is conceptual, you as a concept or some concept you hold that you need to defend because you've identified with it, so you are defending your sense of self, your fictitious sense of self. That means you're defending an illusion.

When you don't defend because the truth of who you are does not need to be defended, so to let go of defenses can be a way of accessing the deeper dimension of who you are. And, of course, it takes you beyond ego because the defensiveness is ego. Ego is conceptual identity.

And then there's one short line here. In my defenselessness, my safety lies. You're safe already, so you don't need to defend anything.

That brings me to, at the very beginning of the Course in Miracles, before even page one, there are a few lines that are supposed to summarize the entire course, and they go like this. Nothing real can be threatened, nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

That's the summary of the entire course, and the course is about as long as the Bible. It's huge, but it can summarize in these few words. If you understand what that means, you don't need to do the course.

You might still enjoy reading it, but you don't need it. Nothing real can be threatened, nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

Herein, meaning knowing this, lies the peace of God. I'll just let it be at that. I'm not going to interpret those lines.

I believe it's the most powerful if you just let them sink in. Judgment, again, the choice to judge rather than to know is the cause of the loss of peace. The choice to judge rather than to know.

So judgment is applying concepts. And then you have another dimension that Course in Miracles calls to know. And Course in Miracles would say that the judgment is not real knowing.

It's the illusion of knowing. You have no idea of the tremendous release and deep peace that comes from meeting yourself and your brothers, brothers and sisters, totally without judgment. You have no idea of the tremendous release and deep peace that comes from meeting yourself and your brothers and sisters, I'm adding the sisters, totally without judgment.

So when you meet another human being without imposing conceptualization, it does not mean you become defenseless or it just means that you know the deep truth and the deeper reality of that human being. But you also know in a non-conceptual way if the personality of that person is dysfunctional, has deep unconsciousness. You see that also.

It's not a judgment. You just see it for what it is, but you don't mistake the personality and its unconsciousness for who that person is.

[Speaker 3] (2:21:17 - 2:22:42)
For many years now, I've kind of been dealing off and on with certain degrees of depression, sometimes more intense, sometimes less intense. Actually, lately, a lot less intense in large part due to discovering you and kind of reading your works and stuff, which has been super helpful, so thanks for that. But one aspect of this is that my ability to feel things has, as I feel, greatly kind of diminished over time.

Things that I used to be excited about don't excite me anymore. I don't look forward to things. When I kind of hang out with my friends and things like that, which is stuff that I enjoy, the joy kind of goes away very quickly, but what doesn't go away and what I can feel is the kind of negatives in my life, the sadness and the suffering and stuff, and it got to a point where I started to crave it in a certain degree because feeling those type of emotions almost kind of reminded me of my ability to feel at all and sort of reminded me of my humanness.

So I guess my question is, how do you eliminate suffering when suffering in a certain way is all that you have left?

Right. What about your practice of giving attention to the present moment? Now, we give attention to the present moment.

You first, you become aware of whatever it is that you feel within, and then you need to be aware of within and without, that's part of the present moment, so that your attention is not completely absorbed by whatever it is that you feel, because there's also the vastness of the outside world. And so presence, to be present means to be present within and without in both worlds. So you acknowledge whatever it is you feel inside you at this moment, be also very vigilant to see whether there are any associated thoughts with that feeling.

Are there certain thoughts that go through your head that reflect what it is that you feel? For example, if you feel depressed, do you have thoughts that are telling you that life is, after all, not worth living or whatever the thoughts are saying, that people are, people suck, life sucks, I suck, we all suck, I don't want to be here, that kind of thought. So you need to observe, be aware on both on the, as far as the inside is concerned, be aware on both on the level of the emotions and feelings and on the level of mind activity, what kind of thoughts, and so it requires vigilance so that you don't indulge without knowing it in unconscious thinking, and you can't separate the unconscious thinking and the feelings, so only you can know.

I don't even know whether you can answer this question now because you have to find out in the moment of it happening what kind of mind activity accompanies those unpleasant feelings, and to see whether this mind activity actually feeds the unpleasantness that you feel or the suffering that you feel, that's a very important thing. What role does your mind play in all this? Very important.

Is your mind feeding it? Because this is, you have a big pain body there, which is not in itself a bad thing because the pain body becomes a strong motivating force for you to awaken. I also had a very heavy pain body.

That's why I had to awaken, couldn't stand it anymore. And you at this point too, can't stand it anymore. That's good.

So be very careful so that you examine your thinking. Am I feeding the feeling? And if you are, that means there's enough awareness for you to realize it.

Then you let go of the thoughts. And one way you can do it by, you remember I just mentioned, be present within and without. You can use, for example, your sense perceptions, directing attention to your sense perceptions that takes attention away from thinking.

And then you experience, the next step would be, you still feel the unpleasantness, but you're also observing sensory perception around you. There's the sky, there's the flower, my hand, the hand. And you don't have to, I'm labeling it now, but you don't have to label it.

It's better not to label it, just to perceive it fully. Come to your senses, look around. There's an entire world there.

And your suffering ends here, where your skin is. The suffering that you experience is inside you. Just one step next to you, there's no suffering.

Isn't that strange? So the table isn't suffering, I'm suffering. And this inch on the chair here is not suffering.

It's just inside this back of skin, I am the suffering entity, that's me. And then if you don't know that, then you identify with that feeling. And then you look at this, then you call, and you still have the conditioned thinking that reflects the suffering, and say, oh, it's all pointless.

The trees are pointless, the sky is pointless. What's the point of it all? I don't see any beauty in this.

And this flower is going to die soon, of course. It all, everything dies soon. So what's the point in even living?

When there's a dog, he doesn't look that healthy. Whatever it is, then you would just look at the world around you through the feelings. So to be present, you have to not label and just look.

And take in auditory, visual perception, breathing. So, and then, of course, if you give more attention to your surroundings, especially when you're in nature, but nature is everywhere. Even if you're in the middle of Seattle, there's a sky.

Well, it's usually at this time of year, it'll be gray, but that's fine, too. There's sunlight filtering through the sky, and you have lots of trees. Lots of trees.

The evergreen state, Washington, as it says on your license plate. So that's good, you have that. And that takes your attention away from, you're not denying what you feel, but you're adding a dimension to it, the external dimension.

And then nature has a very healing effect if you truly give attention to nature. And you're no longer fueling the suffering that you feel inside you. Of course, it doesn't go away immediately, or a miracle could happen, and it does, but usually not.

It's just the beginning of it gradually dissolving or becoming transmuted. Now, looking back retrospectively, if you even know the answer to this, what kind of mind activity accompanies the suffering that you feel in your body? What are the typical thoughts that go with that?

[Speaker 3] (2:30:22 - 2:30:38)
I guess it kind of depends on the situation. Obviously, it comes in kind of phases, but a lot of it is just kind of generalized self-loathing, I guess, I don't know if that's the right term.

[Speaker 1] (2:30:39 - 2:34:44)
Watch out for what kind of thoughts. It might even be helpful to write them down if they're repetitive thoughts, to see what kind of repetitive thoughts you can catch. Because they can obscure your awareness so quickly, especially old thoughts that come again and again and again, they become part of your fictitious identity of the self, the egoic self.

So you carry with you then the burden of an unhappy self. I remember that, I had that too, carrying the burden of an unhappy self. That is, and that is what motivates you to awaken.

But there's already been a diminishment of your depression. Absolutely, yeah. So that's a good sign.

That means presence is arising and it is gradually dissolving this pain body in you. But your work is not to renew the pain body through unconscious thinking. So you need to be really alert and watch your mind so that you don't create more suffering by unconscious mind activity.

And if you no longer feed the pain body, because that's, now the pain body, of course, also feeds through drama in relationships. It has the two ways of feeding. In your case, perhaps more through your mind, but I don't know, could be also enacting and reenacting drama, emotional drama in relationships with a partner, family members, or whoever it may be, usually people you're close to or work with, but the closer, the better.

The intimate partners are the best ways for the pain body to renew itself through. So don't add to the pain body. It wants to feed, it wants your unconsciousness, but don't give it to the pain body.

You're not feeding it with your mind anymore and you're not feeding it by being drawn into insane drama in relationships. So you're watching it. There it is.

It may not be pleasant, but it's not that bad. Your presence is infinitely more powerful and it doesn't even fight the pain body. It just, by shining the light of awareness on it, it gradually dissipates, or a better way of putting it, it gets transmuted because the energy is not lost.

There is enormous life energy in it, but it's trapped. It's trapped energy, so it's felt as negative. When that's freed, it becomes part of presence.

It is fuel for presence. The pain body is fuel for presence. That's amazing.

So you have plenty of fuel for presence. That's the good news. I have, as you may remember, occasionally mentioned the symbolism of the cross.

Well, one of them, the cross, the intersection of the vertical and horizontal dimension.

[Speaker 2] (2:34:47 - 2:35:11)
And that's a useful reminder for your life so that at any time you don't lose your connectedness with the vertical dimension, which opens up in the present moment, which we could call the being dimension.

[Speaker 1] (2:35:12 - 2:36:29)
In that vertical dimension, you are already whole, complete, there's nothing to add in your, because that is your essence, the timeless essence of who you are. And that is connected to the source of all life, connected eternally to the source. It is an emanation of the source, whatever name you want to give to what I now call the source, the origin.

So that is your connectedness to source, and that is your oneness with the source, only to be found in the vertical dimension, which we can also call the being dimension. It opens up when you become present. There is a, no matter how long, cessation of the stream of thinking, and a space opens up.

[Speaker 2] (2:36:29 - 2:36:32)
An inner spaciousness.

[Speaker 1] (2:36:33 - 2:40:08)
And in that, you realize the depths of who you are, but there is no conceptual realization. There is only a silent knowing, a silent realization of the being that you are, the presence that you are, vertical. And the horizontal dimension is the dimension, we could call it the doing.

It includes thinking, because thinking is a kind of doing also. So the moment you move into thinking, you're in the horizontal dimension. And then doing, also thinking then becomes doing.

You do something. In order to do something, immediately time needs to come in. You need time, whatever you do, you need time.

Even to make a cup of tea, you need time to make it. And in doing, thinking also requires time. So time comes in.

That's part of the horizontal dimension. And you need time there. Time is the, has the two polarities, the time.

It's on the one hand, it enables you to grow, it enables you to evolve here in this dimension, but to acquire new knowledge, new experiences, to try things out. And as a person, you can become more mature. You can acquire more knowledge.

But if there's a continuous lack of vertical, then the limitations of the person will increase as the older you get, you realize that whatever you achieve on the horizontal dimension has enormous limitations and are ultimately never fulfilling. But it's not to be denied. You're here, you need the vertical, you need the horizontal also, and you need to give it, you need to honor it.

You can't just say, okay, I'm not going to be bothered with anything anymore because it's all future, no, nothing, just leave me alone. I just want the vertical. Then the horizontal dimension will make demands upon you.

And if you don't challenge yourself, it will challenge you. And even if you challenge yourself, it will still challenge you. So that's the two, these dimensions, the art of living is to bring the two together so that when you're engaged in thinking and doing, you don't completely lose yourself in the thinking and doing.

And then you give an importance to the world, an absolute importance to the things of the world, including your possessions and your achievements and whatever it may be, the economic situation. You give an excessive importance to the things of this world, and then this world will consume you and you will lose yourself in it.

[Speaker 2] (2:40:09 - 2:40:11)
And that's a terrible fate.

[Speaker 1] (2:40:11 - 2:43:07)
And there's a difference between honoring the things of this world and giving it, the things of this world, an absolute importance that they don't have. They have a relative importance. So you need to deal with it, but at the same time, know that there is something more fundamental.

It doesn't exclude that, but there's something more fundamental and that is the being, the being, which is the consciousness of you, but that you is not the person. So the great thing about things going wrong on the horizontal dimension, which happens from time to time, you might have noticed in your personal life or in the collective, things go, no matter how careful you are, no matter how many insurance policies you have and pension plans, there's nothing wrong with these things, but no matter what the world will challenge you and you will notice there's something unstable about the world. There's something unstable about people. You trust in this person or in that person, and then suddenly they turn into somebody else.

There's no matter what, wherever you go, you find an element, small and very often big, an element of instability. And so, and then after a while, when that's all you know, you become distrustful of the world and of people too, because you never know what they're going to do next because you've trusted so many men or women and then say, I don't want to know of men or whether it's men or women, it doesn't matter. I trusted them and they always disappoint me.

As the Buddha already recognized, every situation and every person, if that's all you know, and if that you give an absolute importance to it and you demand that it should satisfy you and make you happy, whether it's a personal situation, will disappoint you, disillusioned. And then you become, that's a wonderful word. I'm disillusioned.

Well, that must be a good thing because it's the end of an illusion. I'm so disillusioned with this world and people. And then people formulate weird theories on the basis of that about the world and they can tell you how bad it all is.

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (2:43:13 - 2:43:15)
So that's important to remember.

[Speaker 1] (2:43:19 - 2:45:40)
The horizontal dimension, whatever happens here in this world, will let you down. If you give it an absolute importance, it will let you down. And if you don't give it an absolute importance because you are connected to the vertical, out of which emanates, that it's a continuous source of satisfaction of the beingness of you, then yes, the world may still let you down, but it doesn't matter very much anymore.

It doesn't make you unhappy. You are quite okay with recognizing the limitations of the things of this world. And you don't become unhappy and you don't judge people on the basis of behavior they manifest as part of their mental-emotional conditioning.

You don't confuse the mental-emotional conditioning of a human being with who they essentially are. You can look beyond that dimension because that is part of the horizontal and you can look deeper. And that's a wonderful liberation, but that can only happen if you are connected to the vertical.

If you're able to become still and present, doesn't matter how long, but you find these inner spaces, inner spaces of awareness where thinking is replaced with awareness or presence. And then you look a totally different way of looking at another human beings through the veil of thinking. Even if you've accumulated a lot of psychological knowledge and you look at another human being, the psychological knowledge, it might have a lot of truth in it, but it's very limited.

All you're recognizing is the conditioning of that human being that makes up the person. And so you're looking at it through the veil of thinking and then you let go of that.

[Speaker 2] (2:45:40 - 2:45:46)
And then you look at a human being through awareness or presence.

[Speaker 1] (2:45:46 - 3:38:04)
And there's no conceptualization. There's a deep knowing, and you can kind of penetrate into the essence of who they are, but only if it comes, that ability comes from your essence and the essence is one with you and the other. And then comes the recognition of the other as one with who you are in your essence, because you emanate from the same source.

So you're not one out here, but you're one down there. When I visited Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher who has now passed away, he lived on Maui. On his car, I saw a bumper sticker which said, I'd rather be here now.

So as you go back into your regular daily life, hopefully the retreat does not come to an end, but remains with you and within you. The essence of the retreat is not the physical location, but a state of consciousness, transcendent state of consciousness. Your task is to live, one could say, in both worlds or both dimensions at the same time.

Occasionally you may lose yourself in the worldly horizontal dimension, the doing realm, the thinking realm. And usually when that happens, you will notice dysfunctional, unpleasant inner states arising very quickly, anxiety, fear, anger, irritation, resentment, trouble. And if you're in that state and are disconnected again from the transcendent, the being dimension, the other dimension, then that's the unconscious state.

And if there is no trouble, you will create it. That's what humans do. Troublemakers.

Both on an individual level and collectively. If you want to learn a lot, troublemaking collectively and watch the news. As much as possible, have the main focus of your attention in your daily life in the present moment.

The rest of your attention, so that's the main focus, here's this. The rest of your attention is where you want to go to. Whatever task you're engaged in has a certain purpose.

The purpose is you want to finish the task and it has achieved its purpose. And that's here. And that's in your peripheral, the peripheral vision of your consciousness.

That's where you want to get to. And this is what you're doing in order to get there. And your main attention is not where you want to get.

And in the meantime, you're just doing it in order to get there. You can see how that's already creates an inner stress. I'm here, but I want to be there.

That's the normal way of living is the main part of people's attention is there. But in the meantime, they are here, where they don't really want to be. They'd rather be there.

As shown in famous stickers on bumper stickers on cars, which say something like, I'd rather be fishing. When I visited Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher who has now passed away, he lived on Maui. And on his car, I saw a bumper sticker, which said, I'd rather be here now.

That's a good teaching on a bumper sticker. So your attention is, and this is a reversal almost of how humans normally usually live. It's the opposite.

That is in itself already a shift in consciousness. And then of course, you're also aware of the past, the certain things that may have a relevance in the present. That's fine.

So peripherally, past and future, usually future is more important because you're moving towards that. And here's the central vision of present moment. In the present moment, you're either actively doing something or you are more passively perceiving something.

You're there as an observer or you're just there, not actively doing, but simply perceiving. That could be when you travel back from here already, you might be sitting in a car. If you're driving, you're doing something.

That's particularly important to be present. Or you might be sitting on a plane and that's a good opportunity for being the, you go into the witnessing mode. There's nothing particular to do unless you get out your laptop and start doing.

It's fine. And sometimes situations arise that are problematic. That's quite normal in life.

They are challenging rather than problematic. And then you face the challenge. You look at it, so to speak, not necessarily visually, but you give it attention that this is a challenge.

Instead of unconscious reactivity, the challenge is your flight is canceled. It's not one of the greatest challenges a human can have, but some people react as if it were. And when any challenge arises, is there anything I can do to respond to this situation?

Or is that something where I simply have to say, well, for the time being, for the time being I accept the way it is because right now there's nothing I can do. I heard, for example, at some airports, they're so busy, not sufficiently staffed people. When the plane lands, they're still trapped on the plane for two or three hours.

It has happened in Toronto and other places. That's a good opportunity for surrender. Some people can't do that.

They start screaming and shouting. Doesn't have no particular purpose, but they can't help it. It happens to them.

So always the question is, is this an opportunity for surrender or is action called for? And that is some practice to get used to until it becomes second nature to have your attention in the present moment rather than elsewhere. And it usually implies you are aware of your surroundings.

That's inseparable from being in the present through your senses. A more alert human being than a normal human being, but an alertness in which there is no tension. Often alertness in a human is associated with being tense, but there's an alertness without tension, but it's not enough to be just aware of your sense perceptions.

That's a good thing. It also can help you to avoid dangerous situations that otherwise you just stumble into and you don't know how you got there. You're more alert of your surroundings.

You see how animals in that sense are very alert because if they are not, they get eaten by other animals. So many animals have this incredible alertness, not the same as the human alertness, but it is an alert awareness of their surroundings that many humans don't have. They walk in the street and they're not really there in their minds, thinking about all kinds of things except where they are, and so they're not here.

Whereas the bird sitting on a branch or the deer that's stepping out of the forest and there's a field and the deer stops for a moment and the ears, they're very huge ears, they go, and it can hear probably a hundred times better than the human, or a bird on a branch sitting, it goes like this, and then suddenly it goes. And of course, there's no decision-making involved when a bird suddenly flies off. It did not think, I'm now going to fly off this branch.

And I'm going to go over there, it just happens. There's a flow to life. There's no mind, there is a consciousness there, but there's no conceptualization at all.

But when an animal rests, an animal also rests completely. It is completely at rest, not thinking about my life. I have to figure something out.

What's the purpose of it all? Every human being, every life form emanates also a certain energy frequency. So even by the emanation, your emanation, you would become a teacher.

One of the terms that's frequently used in A Causing Miracle is the Christian term, salvation, used especially by Jesus in his teachings, salvation. Salvation can also be called the way, especially the way in which it is used in A Causing Miracle, but also in the way Jesus uses it. You could use the term liberation.

You could use the term enlightenment, realization. And the Course says that salvation asks very little of you. What is it that it asks of you?

It says, salvation is undoing. Salvation can be seen as nothing more than the escape from concepts. So you can see that why in some other spirit traditions you would say liberation, because the escape from concepts is also the liberation from the prison of conceptual thinking.

When you're identified with it, when conceptual thinking supplies you with your sense of self, then you are trapped in a conceptual prison. And that is ego, that is unconsciousness, and people don't even know it, that they are trapped in it. So the spiritual realization is through letting go of the prison of concepts so that you no longer inhabit the conceptual reality, which is what most people do, where every perception that you have is filtered through your conceptualization.

When you look on something, you immediately have an interpretation for it, you have a label for it, you have a self-reference towards it, I like it, I don't like it, et cetera. So there's already, you cannot see without concepts. So inhabiting a conceptual reality, so you have a prison that you have for other human beings because you conceptualize them, and for yourself because your self image is an edifice.

Made of concepts. And salvation is the escape from concepts. And this little part ends with these three lines.

Those who would let illusions be lifted from their minds are this world's saviors. And again, it links in to the word salvation. When you let go of the prison of concepts, when you awaken in the terminology of the cause in miracles, you become a savior of the world.

Because by embodying that state of consciousness, you help others become free also. Even just by being, not necessarily by formal teaching, although you might do some teaching too. And when you embody that state of consciousness in the terminology of the cause in miracles, you become a, as it's called, you become a teacher of God.

That's the term frequently used in the cause. Even though you might not necessarily teach as such, but by embodying this, the awakened state of consciousness, you cannot not teach. Might not even be through words.

It could be through your non-reactivity, through the way in which you relate to other human beings, and so on. And everything you do is a teaching, the way in which you behave. Even your very emanation, because every human being, every life form, emanates also a certain energy frequency.

So even by the emanation, your emanation, you would become a teacher. And then some of you also, of course, will use words to teach. So you will, perhaps even in a formal sense, you might teach groups, give talks, write books, who knows.

But anybody who awakens, even if you're not fully awakened, even if you're awakening to who you are beyond concepts, you're already a teacher of God according to the cause. Identity. All humans are very interested in identity.

Who am I? It's a very important question for humans. First, the primordial needs of a human being are, of course, food and shelter.

And for a young child, some love, loving attention. But soon after that, the next very, very important thing comes up is identity. Who am I?

A sense of self develops. And that begins in early childhood. In early childhood, the first thing a child learns is there's a sound that the parents pronounce.

And at some point, the child learns, that's me. John, Mary, Mary, Mary, Mary. Ah, it's me, I'm John, I'm Mary.

Wow, this is the first step. What arises is the beginning of a conceptual identity, a conceptual sense of self. And so the sound of your name is the beginning of that because that name is a thought form that can also be expressed vocal through the vocal cords, but it is a thought form.

And that's the beginning of it all. That's me, I am John. And then John looks at the body and there's my body.

And sometimes for a brief period of time, a child talks about him or herself in the third person as John is hungry, or Mary is. And then gradually it merges with John. It's no longer he or him, it's now I.

And then I, as the child learns to speak, the most important word becomes the word I. And again, that's another step in developing a conceptual identity, I. Another concept in the mind, I.

But you begin to identify with the concept. I is most people's favorite word. In some languages it's used more than in others because in some languages the first person is already built into the verb.

But in English or German, I don't know how it is in fact, I is used a lot. So here we have the beginning of a conception. Now the next step is John or Mary.

They have contact with objects. Objects, they play with objects, toys. And then the parent gives the toy.

And now the next step is the child learns that this is mine, my, my toy, mine. And so another interesting thing develops. Identity is the beginning of seeking identity in external objects.

Seeking identity in external objects. And once this has happened, this toy assumes enormous importance in the child's mind because it's not just an object or a toy, it's mine. And you can see how important it is when somebody tries to take away, another child takes away the toy.

And at that moment, dukkha, suffering, enormous suffering arises because it's mine. You've taken something away from my identity. It's not because five minutes later the child would have lost interest in it anyway.

But here's the identification with it. And the identity, the growing identity of the child feels diminished if somebody takes away this toy. It's like somebody tearing the piece out of you.

It's so painful. And some children scream if you take something away from them that they had identified with. Oh, I have terrible suffering.

And that's the beginning of it all. And then further things happen, of course. The child grows up and more and more begins to identify with other things.

Identity is not yet complete. It's never complete, but identity seeks more to identify with because otherwise, who am I? So the next very obvious thing is, of course, the body, the physical body, my body.

And then the child grows. The body gets stronger, grows. And then the body, you compare the body mentally to other bodies and see, is my body better or not as good as other bodies?

Or can my body do more than other bodies? Another favorite thing for a child is the child can jump. I can jump this high.

Can you? You can't do that, but I can do that. I can jump higher than you.

Oh, identity has grown a bit more. I can jump higher than most other children. Or, and then gradually the child gets older.

Then parents, who are my parents, your parents. I remember when I was, my parents were not very well off. It was in the fifties.

The next thing, what car does your dad have? My dad didn't have any car. It was a terrible problem for my identity, felt diminished because I couldn't say what car.

Others said, well, at that time, there were only about three or four possible cars you could buy. One was a VW Beetle. One was Opel.

And the other one was a Mercedes. And there was only one type. That's all.

So that determined the value of your parents. So what, I was afraid of the question, what car does your dad drive? He's going to get a Mercedes soon, I said.

And that's okay. He's going, any day now, he's going to get it. He never did, but that's okay.

And identity, and then, it becomes more and more complex. Your identity seeks other things to add to itself. It seeks, yes, body.

Of course, it's a very primordial one. Social class, what your parents, this is a little bit connected with what I said about car. Your parents have a nice house or not.

Or what social class do you belong to? In some countries, that is still important. In other countries, not so much.

And so, and gradually, other things arise. Identification with things. Identification with things which become concepts in the mind.

We need to talk briefly about body because it's such an important identification for many people. Obviously, people identify with their physical body. And it is a source of great suffering for many people.

And for others, it's a source of pride. It's a source of pride if your body is either stronger or better looking than other bodies, then you have pride. You feel your identity is enhanced.

Look at my body. You don't say it, but you show your body off. Or you're ashamed.

You don't know, my body is ugly. I was so unhappy. I'm so unhappy with my body.

And that also is a conceptual identity, but a negative one. So, whatever becomes part of your conceptual identity, not everything is good. There will be other things added to your identity that are very painful.

For example, the body. If it's too thin, too fat, too this or too that, I was very unhappy with my body. It was never as good looking at most other people's bodies.

So, for many years, it was a source of suffering to me. What do you put on your body? Clothes, so that becomes an extension of your body.

So, what clothes you wear become part of your identity, as everybody knows when you see advertisements for designer wear and so on. They are not selling clothes. They are selling identity, a piece.

They're basically saying, if you buy this, you will have added something very positive to your sense of identity, to who you are. Buy this because it will make you bigger in your own eyes and in the eyes of others. So, and then you have Prada or whatever it's called, which apparently is what the devil wears.

There was a movie called, The Devil Wears Prada. And you have a little son. Are they looking at it?

Yes. But what is it really? It's more added to a conceptual identity of who you are.

Or if you're not good with body, you can have other things. You can have your social background. Let's say, maybe you have ancestors that were famous or maybe you have ancestors going back.

You're maybe an aristocrat. Well, they don't exist anymore here, I'm sure. But in some places, you can say you have an ancestry, very distinguished, and you can think about that and talk about it and you display it in the way you behave.

And this is the home of my ancestors. There, there it is. Oh, oh.

Enhance, you feel more than others. So the ego seeks more. It fears to be less.

It seeks more. And then other things become part of identity that are painful because you compare yourself to others, conceptual identity, and then others have more than you or are better at this than you or have higher status than you. And that's very painful.

So this, what I'm talking about is the ego, the human ego, the egoic identity. And what the human ego is, a conceptual sense of self, conceptual sense of self that you carry around with you and that you call it I. When you say I, the word I, you refer to this conceptual sense of self.

But what has happened through the gradual evolution of thinking is that now humans tend to overthink. There is a lot of not only unnecessary thinking that generates unnecessary, and in many cases, non-existent problems, such as when you lie awake at night in bed and start worrying. It generates a lot of unnecessary unhappiness.

So people don't realize that a significant part of the unhappiness in their lives is actually generated by unnecessary, negative, often destructive mind activity, and they don't even know it. But mindfulness is, first of all, discovering the simple fact that there is a voice in your head that continuously comments on your life or on what's happening around you. It's, there's the self-talk in there.

Everybody knows what the self-talk is in there. You talk to yourself. Sometimes you talk to yourself in the first person, I.

Some people talk to themselves in the second person, you. So you can get annoyed with yourself, and then you say, you shouldn't have done that. And then you have another thought that says, yes, but I couldn't help it.

And you might even get a third voice come in, and whatever it says to this, why can't I get out of my self-talk? That's self-talk too. But it's an amazing, the first thing, what I call the first awakening, spiritual awakening, is something very basic and something very simple.

It's a discovery that there is a voice in your head that always talks to you, mostly silently. If it talks out aloud, then you're continuously, and there's nobody around, then you are considered insane. But, and that's only if it's loud, but most people have that inside their heads, and they are not considered insane.

It is considered normal. But there's not such a big difference between the two. And sometimes when you listen to, there might be a man walking in the street, muttering, oh, this white man, he's talking.

And you say, oh, he's really insane. But it might be that you are doing the same, but it's just not out aloud, it's in your head. Why didn't I, I should have said that.

Why didn't I say that? Next time he does it, I'm not exactly know what I'm going to reply. And it goes on and on.

Or you lie awake at night and start worrying. You wake up and, oh my God, what's going to happen? What if that doesn't work?

I mean, that goes wrong. And what if he does that, and oh, and then you go into, you get drawn, one thought leads to another thought and another thought, oh my God. And then the body, the body cannot distinguish between an actual reality, an event that's happening in the real life and what your mind is saying.

So when you have fearful thoughts, the body reacts to every fearful thought, but the, and that's an emotion. The body reacts with an emotion, the emotion you feel in your body. The body cannot distinguish between an actual event and a thought.

So when you think fearful thoughts, the emotions you feel are the emotions that are saying, I am in danger. There is an actual danger here. So you feel the emotion of fear, anxiety.

You might, you might, you feel agitated. And it's not, it's not only not pleasant, if you indulge in that kind of useless, dysfunctional, destructive thinking year after year, after year, it has its effect on the body. And it decreases the ability of the body to have the energy to fight disease.

Even mainstream medicine is discovering the connection between your state of mind and your state of health. And so gradually we are seeing in the past, they denied it completely. They only looked at your body and not only at the, they not, they not didn't just look at the totality of the body, even within the body, they just looked at one particular symptom.

What's wrong with that particular organ? And you have, of course, in mainstream medicine, you have specialists. I'm a specialist for the liver and specialist for this and this and that, not only not taking into account the totality of the body, but more importantly, not taking into account the totality of the person, which includes the physical body and the mind.

So it's vitally important to discover first of all, that there is a voice in your head that indulges in self-talk most of the time. And for many people, interestingly enough, that self-talk for many people is not always negative, but for many people, it is more negative than positive. A good event that happened yesterday, a nice, you might have gone to a nice reunion or you went out into nature and you witnessed a beautiful sunset.

Okay, you can remember it today and think that was a beautiful sunset or we had a nice talk yesterday, but you can't do that much thinking about a nice event. But the mind, when there's something negative that happens yesterday, somebody offended you or didn't give you the attention that you needed, that you wanted from him, then you can start thinking of how, oh my God, what he did, he's really, next time he just said, I'm going to say that, or he's really shouldn't, why doesn't he, you can go on for a long time, dwelling on something negative much longer than dwelling on something positive.

It is so seemingly a negative event is much more food for useless mind activity than a positive event. And this is why for many people, a significant percentage of their mind activity is negative. For some people, it is almost 100% negative, but it is unlikely that these people would get a job in this company.

And I mean that because your predominant state of consciousness, your predominant mental emotional state, there's a certain correlation between who you associate with, where you find yourself, and even what kind of things happen to you. There is a correlation which is not always immediately recognizable, but there is a correlation between once a person's predominant mental emotional state and who they are with, who their friends are, where they work, and even what happens to them. So if you are in a very negative state a long time, you tend to attract also negative events, but you can only have to find that out for yourself, not saying, believe me.

I know it from my own life because when I first discovered this, I was still very young, I discovered that there is a correlation between my mind activity and what happens to me. I found a book that somebody, several books that somebody left with us when I was 17. And there, for the first time, I read about a person's mind, and I suddenly realized my mind was predominantly negative because I was a very unhappy child.

And so my childhood was not pleasant. And so the initial conditioning of my life was that my mind was continuously commenting and saying how bad my life was. And whenever something bad happened to me, I had a phrase that would occur again in my mind.

Of course, bad things always happen to you, don't they? They're bound to happen to you. It always happens to you.

So I was talking to myself and saying that bad things would always happen to me, and they did. So you can discover first that the spiritual awakening is to discover that there is continuous mind activity. And for some people, it's a discovery that a significant part of their mind activity is negative.

But the vital thing is to discover that there is this continuous talk in my head, which is considered the normal human state. And of course, you cannot abolish thinking. Of course, there will be thinking.

But the question is, is there an awareness behind the thinking? If you can become aware that you are indulging or caught up in that useless mind activity, and you suddenly become aware of perhaps certain repetitive thoughts that tend to reoccur in your mind again and again. You might see it in others, too, more easily in others.

When you go for your Thanksgiving dinner, I think is it next week, you will meet your family members or relatives. And some of you may realize you already know what they are going to say this year, because it's the same thing they said last year and five years and 10 years ago. And if they have negative judgments about you or somebody else, then it's the same thing you will hear again next week when you go to them.

So it's easier to see how others are caught up in repetitive thought forms, not as easy to see it in oneself. This is why there's a saying that self-knowledge is the most difficult knowledge. It's easier to see others.

But if you can discover, even in the midst, perhaps, in the moment of a certain thought appearing in your mind, realizing, oh, that thought is, I've had this thought for years. It comes again and again and again. And so there is an observing presence.

From there you get, and that observing presence isn't a thought. It's just the ability to realize that there is a voice in your head and that there are thoughts. And you realize that some of those thoughts are negative.

And many of those thoughts actually are not only unnecessary but make your life very difficult, such as worry. So most people live with what I call a cluttered mind. A cluttered mind means they are completely unaware that there's a continuous stream of mental commentary.

They'd go, and wherever they meet somebody, and immediately certain judgments form. And everything they feel, they need to immediately adopt a position towards it. Immediately say, I'm against it.

I dislike it. Immediately adapt a mental position and being identified with one's mental position, which is a thought. So if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you're in a state of lack, of insufficiency, of not enough, and you feel that the answer to, the remedy is to be active in this world and to achieve and do as much as possible, then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack.

In order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough, spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary. Focus on the realization of being. It's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack, which is ego.

Go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person.

[Speaker 10] (3:38:29 - 3:38:29)
Hello.

[Speaker 5] (3:38:31 - 3:39:44)
I want to ask, I work with people and I notice, I work with people and talk about lifestyle change quite a lot and how it will relate to health. And I notice in myself, as well as in those people that I work with, that sometimes in the face of really clear experience that making a certain health choice will make them better, and in sometimes serious situations, like say they've got diabetes or something, and I just want to make this distinct from things that we know that are addictions like smoking. So I'm not talking about that, because that's an addiction and that's got a different force.

But sometimes people, for example, they'll go on a gluten-free diet, say, and they'll be much better for three months and then they'll come back and they've started to lose that momentum, lose motivation and they're drifting back into the diet that doesn't suit so well. What is that force? What is that in us, in me too, where I know that, for example, if I go to bed earlier, I'll feel better in the next day, but something in me sort of says, no, I don't want to go to bed earlier.

[Speaker 9] (3:39:44 - 3:39:48)
No. What is that?

[Speaker 1] (3:39:49 - 3:48:07)
Yes. So there is a, that's the, these are forms of conditioning that is inertia and a certain momentum in certain ways in which people live that have been there for many, many years. They could also almost be seen as energy streams inside you and they have a certain momentum.

And some of these are sluggish energies, the inertia, the pull of gravity, gravitational force of deep seated habits that are associated with the person. It's part of conditioning, mental, emotional conditioning. So then the motivation goes away again.

And sometimes it's only in a crisis situation that people are able to break out of it. And sometimes not even then. If they really realize it's a crisis situation, then sometimes that can be the trigger that pushes people out of that, gravity, the gravitational pull of deep seated conditioned habits.

So there's also a reluctance because these things are associated with the egoic sense of identity. There's also reluctance sometimes to abandon these habits because it's almost as if you were abandoning a part of yourself and people don't want to die. The ego doesn't want to die.

So often the ego is stuck in unhealthy habits, but it's become so much of their sense of self that they can't do anything about it and they don't want to. So all you can do is explain what it is that they are doing and what, there's only that much that you can do for somebody else. You cannot force them to evolve.

You can only provide the triggers for their evolution. So, and there are humans who don't want to evolve. They're not ready yet.

It's like an apple that's on the tree and it might be close to getting ripe, but it doesn't, or it might be, it doesn't want to fall. It wants to cling. Or let's say another example.

The caterpillar says, no, I don't want to become a butterfly. It's so, it's, I know who I am and I'm comfortable with who I am. Why do you want me to become a butterfly?

I don't want to fly around in the air. It's, I belong here. And then it munches, this is where I belong.

And no matter how much you talk to the caterpillar, you have to wait until finally the caterpillars, when it gets close to the transformation or metamorphosis, then the caterpillar experiences life becoming quite unpleasant. He cannot be a caterpillar anymore and he can't even crawl anymore and something is very wrong suddenly. And it's only when life becomes totally unbearable for the caterpillar, then finally he gives in and says, okay, I can't stand this anymore.

I'd rather be a butterfly. And so humans are a bit like that. And some are ready, some need more suffering before they are ready.

That's the unfortunate truth. And not all, not necessarily physical suffering. It can also be self-generated mental and emotional suffering.

Some people are not ready to give up their self-generated mental emotional suffering. They're just not ready. They may come to you and say, help me, help me.

But when it comes to the moment where they could be free, as happened to me years ago when I was still working with individual people, I was pointing out to a lady who came who had a terrible irritation with her husband. For years, the very presence of her husband caused intense irritation and everything her husband said and did, everything, the way he moved, the way he sat, the way he ate his food. I can't stand him.

And so I explained or attempted to explain these in the early stages of, before any books were written, the early stages of the teachings when I sometimes surprised myself when I gave answers, things I didn't know beforehand. They just came. And so I explained to her the mechanism behind the suffering and the possibility of, of course, she could leave him or she could discover that this is self-generated suffering and she could be free of that.

And then suddenly she began to see it and she began to see the possibility of letting go of all that self-generated suffering. And then she suddenly said, if I let go of it, what have I got left? So she was so identified with her suffering, it was like not only a close friend, the suffering was an essential part of, had become over the years, an essential part of her sense of identity, of her sense of self.

She did not want to let go. And soon after, she didn't want to come and see me anymore. So, but I do know that some of the things I said to her, later I put in the power of now.

So she's in there somewhere. And hopefully she lived long enough so that she could read the book and perhaps saw herself in there. And then perhaps at that stage, perhaps she was ready.

We don't know. We just have to accept some people are not yet ready, but do all you can, not to force them to change, but to provide that to them, that triggers has to come from within them. The readiness to let go or to change has to come from within them.

So how you do it will vary from person to person. Use your intuition, go to the place of not knowing so that the intuitive, you can say helpful things that come from that deeper level that might make a difference to them. What that is, I cannot tell you because you can only know that you in that situation with that person.

So go to the place of not knowing when you are with people, not continuously, but be there sometimes. And then it's possible that what they need that can trigger an awakening, you might say to them or do to them, well, do, what would you do? Like be the Zen master and hit them sometimes, but you don't want to do that.

But life does that if they don't change. Thanks. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 8] (3:48:40 - 3:49:29)
In my life, I've always felt like a little bit of an outsider or the weird one. And there haven't been really people that I can talk to the way how I see the world. Like neither in school or later at work or in family and friends.

And like people in early life were fighting a lot and I always try to handle things differently. And now I'm at a point in my life where I wonder if I will ever find people or like in near me that I can be connected with.

[Speaker 1] (3:49:29 - 3:49:35)
Right. Right, I understand you completely. Yeah.

Yeah. Yeah.

[Speaker 9] (3:49:40 - 3:49:40)
Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (3:49:41 - 3:53:57)
Yeah. Yeah. There are probably quite a few people here you can connect with.

Yes. But of course, after our event here, all these people here become dispersed again throughout the world. You can, through the miracles of modern technology, which is not all bad, you can perhaps keep in touch with some of them.

And quite a few of you, I'm sure, will keep in touch with each other. The sense of being an outsider is also something that I have had throughout my life. And the sense of not belonging here, watching my parents being engaged in continuous conflict, not because they were bad people.

They did what they did and they loved me as best they could. And they did what they did as a reflection of their state of consciousness at that time, which was a normal state of consciousness, egoic state of consciousness. But I sometimes felt, how did I get here?

Somehow, I didn't, there must have been a mistake. I think it's often outsiders being feeling an outsider on the one hand seems a terrible limitation that you can't participate as much. On the other hand, it's a great opportunity because some of the most creative people in the world have been outsiders.

They did not fit in. Misfits is the English word, misfits. Now, the friendships I had when I was a child, and that's another interesting thing.

I had a friend, one of my friends was severely physically disabled. And nobody else wanted to be friends with him because of that. And he was probably my closest friend.

And the other one was so weird that nobody wanted to talk to him. But he became my friend, so they were outsiders too. And, but the interesting fact here as you know, I couldn't believe it when they told me that there are people here from 70 countries.

It seems almost unbelievable, but it's true, I saw the list, 70 countries. And you may find, I'm sure you will find quite often you can feel a bond or you have more in common with many of the people who are here than you have with your own people in your own country at home who are not going through any spiritual awakening, who are still totally conditioned, 100% conditioned by their culture. So you feel a connectedness here with other humans that transcends culture and conditioning and all this silly political stuff.

It transcends that, and this is a wonderful thing. So to some extent, you can now connect with people even if you don't always see them physically, where you might live. I don't know whether you live in a big city or a small village.

[Speaker 8] (3:53:58 - 3:54:00)
A small city.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:00 - 3:54:01)
Small city.

[Speaker 8] (3:54:01 - 3:54:02)
Small city, yeah.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:02 - 3:54:03)
Yeah, what city?

[Speaker 8] (3:54:04 - 3:54:05)
Innsbruck in Austria.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:05 - 3:54:06)
Ah, yes.

[Speaker 8] (3:54:06 - 3:54:06)
Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:07 - 3:54:12)

Nice, very nice. I don't know how many people in Innsbruck are.

[Speaker 8] (3:54:13 - 3:54:14)
120,000.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:15 - 4:29:19)
And how many of those are awakening? We don't know. We don't know.

We don't know, of course. But this helps, I believe, being here and feeling you are not alone, you are connected. So this should be a help for the rest.

You just have to accept that this is how it is. And no matter how hard you try to fit in on the normal level, you probably won't, nor do you have to. So I know there are many people here who feel that and be happy with it, but don't make it into some kind of superiority because the ego can always creep in.

Before you know it, there's always a backdoor and then the ego is back in. So you could go from feeling bad about being an outsider to suddenly feeling, okay, I'm an outsider because I'm superior. So you have to be careful, don't go there.

So that's just how it is. If you, you probably would not be here if you had not felt like an outsider for many years. So it worked.

Well, this line is so long, I'm going to be here for at least another two hours. That's a thought, it's future, not now. There's no two hours now.

The body gains in strength because you made life difficult for your body. Don't go so far as to make life so difficult for your body that it collapses completely. That's another story.

You find the middle way, the middle way in everything. So, but again, there was a famous orator in ancient Greece, what is called Demosthenes, I don't remember the name. He had a speech defect.

He could not talk well as a young man. And in Greece, to be a great speaker was one of the most highly regarded things, to be an orator. And he wanted to go beyond his speech defect.

And they say he, in order to get beyond it, he put little pebbles in his mouth and started delivering speeches to the ocean, the sea. And he was there with pebbles and was shouting and talking to the ocean, to the sea for several years. And in the end, the speech defect disappeared and he became one of the greatest orators in ancient Greece.

And again, there was a demand for it. So if the obstacle hadn't been there, there was a philosopher, probably it wasn't Nietzsche, who said, everything important happens in spite of. Everything important happens in spite of, don't add anything, in spite of something, whatever.

In other words, something was holding it back and then it had to, the energy was. So when you face tribulation in this life, then there's an opportunity for generating more consciousness when you encounter life's difficulties. There's an opportunity for developing more consciousness.

And as you rise in consciousness, the transcendent dimension of awakened consciousness comes in, you begin to transcend these very problems that before seemed unsurmountable. You transcend them or you live with them and they are no longer that important. So you can transcend them internally.

Let's say you have a body that is disabled in one way or another. And the problem then, as you awaken spiritually, sometimes it happens that the body gets healed. And at other times, it happens that the transcendent consciousness arises and the disability of the body is no longer a source of suffering for you.

But it was a source of suffering for probably for quite a long time until a very deep surrender happened. And in this deep surrender, you transcended this source of suffering. And then you still have the same body and yet you're no longer psychologically suffering because you have transcended so many things in this life.

They can be, you can overcome an obstacle or you can transcend an obstacle. If you overcome an obstacle, when external things, you do external things in order to remove the obstacle, to get beyond it. If that is not possible, then internally you transcend.

So it no longer, the obstacle, the so-called obstacle is still there, but it doesn't matter anymore to you. It is no longer so. In fact, you may be grateful for it.

I describe in, I believe in the New Earth, when I was a student, I learned something from observing the famous scientist, Stephen Hawking, who happened to be at the same college as me in England. And every time at lunchtime, I would see him next to the table that I was at with friends. He was not famous at the time.

It was a long time ago. He was in a wheelchair, unable to move his arms already, unable to put food in his mouth, unable to speak except make croaking sounds. Later he had a machine that he could use for communication.

At that time, he just could make croakings. He was already a professor. And at first I didn't know who he was.

I asked him, who is this person? He was being fed by his, his graduate students would feed him food and he would sit there and go, oh, what a horrible fate. If you are unhappy, think of a fate like that, to be buried with a body like that.

I can't imagine anything worse. And then a great lesson was when I saw him once or twice, especially a first occasion, I opened the door for him, and he came in at the same time, he came in with his wheelchair. I opened the door and I looked into his eyes and he looked up at me.

And then I saw he was not suffering anymore. There was not a, there wasn't a psychological suffering entity. There was just an acceptance.

So although he may not have gone deep into spiritual awakening, there was an enhanced ability to use his mind. I believe he had some spiritual, he had some spiritual awakening, but he used his mind a lot in a, his mind was still active. If he had reacted against his condition, he would not have been, had achieved anything.

His ability to think creatively would have diminished. But he, through his acceptance, he was in touch with that deep power out of which intelligence arises. And so he was free of, there was not a suffering personality there.

He would have been totally justified in being very unhappy and miserable. So that, again, is an example of transcendence, transcending something that before was a seemingly impossible obstacle. I believe that the entire, all this is contained in the story of, even, which can be appreciated, even if you're not a Christian, perhaps you can appreciate it more, actually, if you're not a Christian, that there's a deep truth in, that is hidden in the image of Jesus on the cross.

It's an image that's very strange. I think if somebody from an outer planet, an alien from another planet came here and they saw that humans are worshiping a man nailed to a cross, they might think, what is that all about? And if you look more deeply, there's a teaching in there, whether you regard it as a historical fact or a deep mythological truth, it's up to you, but there is a deep teaching there that the cross is a torture instrument.

And this man, who I would regard, perhaps, the archetypal human, is suffering. He is nailed to the cross. He is in deep suffering.

There's a torture instrument. The cross then leads to death and then is resurrection. And then the cross itself, you often see it without the suffering human, and it's a symbol of the divine.

The torture instrument is also a symbol of the divine. And that is contained in the story of the torture instrument and the symbol of the divine. The cross is both.

And then there's a very deep truth embedded in there that perhaps humans would not have been able to understand if one had explained it conceptually, but they can see that this archetypal human surrenders to the suffering, brings about the rebirth and the transcendent state. And so torture instrument and the symbol of the divine are merging to one. That's a very deep, very deep teaching.

So when things happen in your life, you face it and you look at it and you become, the alertness is required when you're faced with a difficult person or situation. You become alert so that you don't react out of the conditioned mind. Even little things, when people could get irritated.

Airports these days. Airports these days are wonderful places for spiritual practice. Yes.

They've always been places for spiritual practice, but much more so now, because there's many, this is a small scale thing, but if you don't practice with small scale, you will not practice with big things. Relatively small things. Yes, your flight is canceled again.

Nobody can give you any information and the luggage is lost long ago. And there you are. You can either react out of the conditioned mind or you can say, this is what is.

That's what is. And if you have been irritated, and you can use any situation, it's been irritated or angry. I said, I recommend this spiritual practice and you do it like this.

How would I experience this situation if I didn't add any thought to it? No, you can't answer that unless you actually do it. So how would I experience this irritating moment and these awful people who are working for the airline and they're completely uninterested in their job anymore and so on and so on and so on.

How would I experience this moment if I didn't add any thought to it? Well, I'm just standing here in this line. Any thought would be, for example, well, this line is so long, I'm going to be here for at least another two hours.

That's a thought. It's future, not now. There's no two hours now.

It's just, how would I experience this moment if I didn't add any thought to it? Okay, let's try it. We might as well.

Nothing else to do. So there you are. And here you are.

Okay, I'm not adding any thought to it. I'm not, in other words, I'm not interpreting it either favorably or unfavorably. I'm not trying to convince myself this is really good.

That's another thought and it would be not really true in that here. It just don't add any, and there you are. And you look around and here we come back to sensory perception.

That's the first thing you notice is, hmm, oh. Lights, there are lights, there's people everywhere. Or movement of people standing.

But you don't even call it that. You just, artificial lights, lamps, all right. And you're breathing.

Oh, yes, yes, I'm breathing, breathing. Breathing. And if you become aware that you're breathing, it's part of this moment.

When you don't add thought to it, you may suddenly become aware that you're actually breathing. And then when you become aware that you're breathing, you might also sense that there is an aliveness that pervades your entire body as you stand there. I am trying to understand why a person would attract others who ultimately betray them.

Assuming that we create our relationships consciously or unconsciously, why is there the experience of betrayal? Assuming also that I know and love myself profoundly, what is to be learned from being betrayed? The question sounds a little abstract, but the questioner is not here.

I assume that the questioner feels betrayed. By someone. And since the questioner is a woman, perhaps she feels betrayed by a man.

Perhaps, maybe it's by a woman. Now, of course, betray already is a word that is quite heavy. He betrayed me.

She betrayed me. There's already a huge amount of heaviness and story in that. If you put it slightly differently, it loses some of its heaviness.

And putting it slightly differently could sound like this. He is a human being and he manifested behavior that corresponded to his level of consciousness at that particular time when he did it. Perhaps at other times when I met him, he seemed to be at a better, higher level of consciousness, but then he fell back to a more unconscious state and then his behavior manifested that.

Where's the betrayal? It suddenly disappeared. So that makes it easier on you to deal with it than to impose a huge narrative or judgment on another person and involve you in this dreadful act of which you become a part, the act of betrayal.

Yes, of course you suffered. We all suffer and we all encounter humans who make us suffer because many humans, most of them are unconscious and they're not always at the same level. That's an interesting fact that humans can be at enormously varying levels of consciousness according to the situation they find themselves in.

There are some humans who have a potential for committing a crime, but circumstances never put them in a position where that potential becomes actualized. And then it can happen that other humans encounter a situation that is very challenging and brings out all the worst accumulations within them that come up to the surface and suddenly they turn into these monsters. And before you might have known a completely different person, a completely different level of consciousness.

So humans get challenged or encounter situations that bring out certain aspects of their unconsciousness between in sexual encounters, because it's not unlikely that the betrayal has something to do with the man going off with another woman, not unlikely. Now, that is an area that that kind of attraction that can make people very quickly, very unconscious. There are expressions for that, but I won't say.

So, yes, that's the unfortunate thing with human beings. They're not fully enlightened. So, and then of course you say, I trusted him.

He promised me when we got married that he would be faithful. And I trusted him. And I'm sure when he promised it, he meant it.

I don't think when he promised to be faithful, he meant, well, I'm not really going to do that. When he promised to be faithful, he meant it. But then a few years passed, and then one day he had a few drinks, and then he looked at that woman there and he was gone.

Completely unconscious. And again, in Jesus' words, forgive them for they know not what they do. Now, to forgive them is only something that you do for yourself because you free yourself of the burden of having to live with a narrative or a story of betrayal and be part of that.

And then part of your sense of identity, this is very painful, but seductive, part of your egoic, your ego identity, then is I am the one who has been betrayed. And that's a dreadful burden to carry in your sense of self. So if you believe in that story that your mind has created, the act of betrayal, he betrayed me, so you're setting up for yourself an enormous amount of suffering because that story will become part of your sense of self.

And if that's the case, then even it will influence and color the way from now on in which you relate to other, men or women or whatever it is, can easily color that. So you have to be very careful and see what you're doing to yourself by creating these stories. On the conventional level, they are true.

You can say, he betrayed me. That's conventional way of using language, but it's not the real truth. You might have heard of Byron Katie, the spiritual teacher.

She always questions whatever thoughts the mind produces. And that's a wonderful thing because otherwise you might feel tempted to believe in every thought that comes into your head. He betrayed me.

And of course, Byron Katie would ask, do you know that for sure? How do you know that? Yeah, of course I know for sure.

And then eventually, if it works, the person is meant to disidentify from the thought that the mind has created and become free of being trapped by this thought, which really means consciousness is trapped by this thought that the mind has created and you are trapped in it. So be careful with the stories that your mind creates. And sometimes if you rephrase, as I just did for you, rephrase the story, it suddenly does not cling to you anymore.

And it no longer becomes part of your painful identity or sense of self because you want to be free of that. So, and of course then you, unfortunately you have to forgive him. Sorry, you have to, that is part of it when you realize, yeah, he was unconscious, you have to, forgiveness comes and that's fine.

It doesn't mean you want to start all over again or maybe you will, but probably not. Because unless a shift has happened in him, the same kind of thing might happen to him again. Next time he has a drink and sees a woman.

So careful with, very careful with stories that the mind creates and then become part of your sense of self. The feeling, first of all, needs to be acknowledged and accepted. You can't start with letting go.

So we have to start with acknowledging it and accepting that it's there because it's part of what is, the is-ness of the present moment, whether it's an external thing or an inner thing, it is what is. And to deny or to argue with what is creates suffering. So you acknowledge, you accept that it's there.

Then how much time you need to be with it depends, varies from person to person and what kind of a feeling it is and so on. And then the question arises, what is the link between that feeling and your thought processes? The person needs to find out whether the thought processes keep that feeling alive continuously, whether they renew by playing out, for example, a past scenario in their minds, by reviving memories from the past, by dwelling on certain narratives that are painful, repeating them in their minds, that gives renewed energy to the feeling.

So the first, the most important thing is to be aware of both levels. What's the level of my thinking? How does that contribute to the perpetuation of what I feel?

And so you also then acknowledge that, oh, these are the habitual thought patterns that go through my mind in relation to the feelings. And then you would begin to realize that the letting go, the most important step in letting go of feelings is to cut the link between your thinking and what you're feeling. How do you do that?

You do it by being aware of your thinking and realizing that that thinking is pain. It feeds the old feeling and the narrative, whatever it is, is a painful narrative. And you realize that you've been keeping it alive for some years.

And when there's enough awareness, you realize that it has no purpose except to make you unhappy and to perpetuate that feeling. However, it has, you need, and this is how you can help, or any counselor or therapist or spiritual teacher can help the other person by observing the feeling and seeing how the mind, the mental narrative, has both the mental narrative and the feeling seem to have a life of their own. And if they have been in there for a long time, they don't want to go.

What they want is they want you to be identified with them. They don't want you to be conscious of them. So this is really the mind aspect of the pain body and the emotional.

The pain body is predominantly an emotion, but there is a mental aspect that the pain body needs to rise up into your mind in order to feed on certain types of thinking, in this case, the old narrative. So you also need enough awareness to know that this thing does not want to go because there's a momentum behind thought patterns that have been active in your mind for a long time. So there's a momentum behind it.

So you need to be acutely aware of the process of how it creates further pain. And when you look through it and see that's actually what it does, then you've recognized you cannot be deceived anymore by completely believing in it every time it happens. In other words, you see that you create your own pain ultimately.

When you see that, that's the beginning of the end. And then you can reach a stage when the pain is no longer, the feeling is no longer fueled by thinking. Then you arrive at a stage where you realize I don't need the feeling anymore.

In fact, you don't need to let go because then when you do not revive it continuously, it subsides by itself. So you don't need to actually say, I must let go. It lets go of you rather than you need to let go.

It's because you're no longer giving it energy. You're no longer feeding it. So that's the process.

So you need to let go is a bit like saying you need to forgive. That's another one like that. You need to really need to forgive.

Okay, I'll try. I'll really, I have you forgiven your parents. Yeah, I think I have.

The forgiveness again is in a similar way happens naturally when you look, when first of all, you realize that no human being can act beyond their level of consciousness at that time when they acted. So if you haven't forgiven your parents and yet then you can see they behaved the way they did because they could have done otherwise. My father, for example, I loved him dearly.

Well, especially after I became conscious. And before I became conscious, I had a love hate relationship with him. And I found him very obnoxious, but there was love there too, emotional love.

But then when I was free, I could love him unconditionally. And then I could see that pattern in him that produced so much, gave me so much pain, his uncontrollable anger. Most of, mostly fortunately not directed towards me, but directed towards my mother.

But the anger that was directed by my father towards my mother hurt me probably more than it hurt my mother as a little, as a child. And his anger was so explosive. It could flare up at any moment.

So you were always walking on eggshells. And when I was seven, eight, I already knew, my mother seemingly never learned it. I already knew what comment that she made would immediately produce the anger.

I knew that when I was seven, she never learned it. And so I was ready. I was listening to my mother saying, oh no, she's saying that.

And so there was, I had a dream when I was seven or eight, I was asleep and I had this dream. And in the dream, there was a bag under my bed. And in that bag were the body parts of my dad.

I had cut him up and had to put all his body parts and had hidden it under the bed. So I was, I didn't, the actual cutting up wasn't in the dream, that had already happened somewhere else.

[Speaker 9] (4:29:20 - 4:29:22)
You were just cleaning up?

[Speaker 1] (4:29:22 - 4:31:20)
Yeah, so I was pushing him under my bed. And then still in the dream, at that moment, I heard the front door opening and my dad was coming in and I ran towards him and gave him a hug. Okay, so that shows the conflicting feelings.

And then later I realized, I realized where that anger came from. I don't need to go into this. Of course, it goes back to childhood, how he was treated in his family.

The seventh child, the youngest child, nobody wanted him anymore. The mother was tired. He wasn't given much attention, not treated well by his female, his sisters and so on.

Long story, don't need to go into that. It came all from there. It originated from there.

Anger towards his mother and so on and so on. And later I realized he could not help himself. He did not have the awareness.

He was taken over by this anger. And the moment I realized that he, that was, he acted according to his level of consciousness at the time, I didn't need to forgive anymore because there was nothing to forgive anymore. I had, and that's a beautiful thing.

So again, similar to letting go of feelings, when enough awareness comes in, the feeling let's go, let's go of you and all becomes transmuted into something, an energy field that is good. And so forgiveness, again, cannot really be practiced in the same way that letting go can't really be practiced. It just happens.

And then that's how it is.

[Speaker 2] (4:31:38 - 4:31:43)
The memory of what happened to you is more than just a memory.

[Speaker 1] (4:31:44 - 4:34:03)
There is self-identification with the memory. In other words, it's not perceived as just something that happened to you, but it becomes part of who you perceive to be. Now, almost everybody has in one way or another been a victim of other people, but in some cases, much, much more so than in others.

Some element of having been victim is probably present in everybody's life. In other words, you are surrounded by unconscious humans and then unconscious humans will inflict suffering on themselves and others. That's just how it is when you're alive on this planet.

Childhood, particularly, is a place where many children experience abuse, either minor forms of abuse, emotional abuse, or they live in a very toxic family environment. And then, of course, there are other children who experience much more serious forms of abuse and really suffer and have these experiences. Care and carry with them the memory, both mental and emotional memory, of what happened to them.

In some cases, the memory is repressed because the child, the emotions may be repressed. The child could not deal with them and they had to repress them. And then later, the possibility of remembering arises and then you remember what happened to you.

And how do you do, is the question, what do you do with what happened to you, what was done to you? How do you deal with what was done to you by other humans, whether it happened in childhood or whether it happened later in life, whether it was a relatively minor thing or whether it was a very serious form of abuse?

[Speaker 2] (4:34:04 - 4:34:06)
How do you deal with that?

[Speaker 1] (4:34:11 - 4:41:48)
Now, the ego, the human ego is always looking for something to add to its sense of identity. It's looking for a stronger sense of identity because it always feels, I'm not enough. So it's trying to add something that it can identify with, so add to its sense of self.

And very often happens that the memory of having been abused is used by the ego and is added to the ego's sense of self. So that means you not only remember what happened to you, the memory of what happened to you, which is a bundle of thoughts and emotion that go with it, the memory of what happened to you is more than just a memory. There is self-identification with the memory.

In other words, it's not perceived as just something that happened to you, but it becomes part of who you perceive to be. So I am a victim of that. It's not that this was done to me, but I am a victim of.

So it's the transition from memory to self. That is the victim identity. The ego does that because victim identity is a very powerful form of identity, a very powerful form of ego.

And particularly in cases where the ego is always, does not find sufficient things that it can identify with in this world, because the most common form of identification, for example, is with the way you look. You look better than others. So you can identify with that.

If you look worse than others, of course, that could become part of your victim identity because you've been treated unfairly by life and life has made you look worse than others. That could become part of victim identity. Although that's not actually abuse, but it could also be incorporated into victim identity.

However, so normally what people identify with or what ego identifies with is appearance, which is physical appearance of the body, what external looks, even what you put on the body is then regarded as part of the body. So clothes become something you identify with because they're on the body. So firstly, if it's being part of you, possessions, common thing, what I own, I own this car, you don't.

Therefore, I feel a bit stronger in my sense of self because I have a Lamborghini and you only have a VW or bicycle. So I have a stronger identity compared to others. House, any form of possession.

Then we have social function in this world, position that you have, social position in this world you identify with that you feel gives you superiority. With every ego identification, the most important thing is superiority, a sense of superiority. The ego seeks that.

It cannot tolerate inferiority. So superiority, whether it's possessions, looks or appearance, achievement in this world, social position, oh yes, knowledge. Some people who are intellectual or highly educated, you can identify with that and feel superior to many other humans who know much less than you.

So you have identified with knowledge, identified with, you can identify with your ancestors in some countries, in the West, not so much anymore, but in some countries still, it used to be like that in the West, but in some countries still, your ancestry is extremely important, like who your parents were and your grandparents and so on, you go back several generations. So you can have that, you identify, and again, superiority is always implied. Now, it's not many humans find it easy to find things in this world that they can derive a sense of superiority from, well, children already start doing that.

They have to look for something. I can jump higher than you, look at me, that's good. That's the developing ego, gives you a bit of superiority or whatever it may be.

So many humans don't find a lot in this world that does give them a sense of superiority. They don't have a lot of possessions or no possessions. They're not particularly highly educated, don't really know that much.

They're not great looking. So what else? The ego is looking for something.

Now, it could be things like resentment, so that's a great one. Grievances towards other humans, that's a big one. So the ego can have anger towards other humans or groups of humans.

He says, well, of course, so the ego can get in there, identify with those thoughts and gives you a sense of superiority. You can sometimes, I don't know if you've all met, people who are kind of considered half crazy who are walking the streets and you have people, you see them often in big cities, particularly, they're shouting, they're shouting at everybody. They're very angry and they're shouting at everybody.

You, you, you, and you can see, it's a rudimentary form of superiority by being angry at others. It's implied, ultimately, you are superior to those humans that you're angry at. So even if you have nothing, you can get, the ego can make you angry about other people and you start shouting at them and you feel suddenly superior to everybody, all these awful people out there.

And that brings us already in the direction of victim identity. Victim identity, again, you remember what was done to you and the memory becomes incorporated, as I said, into your sense of self that becomes me, the victim of those people.

[Speaker 2] (4:41:49 - 4:41:51)
That's me, I am the victim.

[Speaker 1] (4:41:52 - 4:48:05)
So you become, in your own perception, a victim of this or that other people. This enhances your ego because by being a victim, you feel superior to others, not only to those who inflicted suffering on you, whether real or imagined, but you also feel yourself superior to anybody else who is not as much a victim as you are. It's an unconscious process.

So if you can talk about your victimhood, anybody who is less of a victim than you is inferior. And so the superiority, it's a moral one, one could say, because if unjust things were done to you, then by being a victim of unjust deeds, perpetrated by other humans, you automatically become morally superior, not only to those humans who inflicted that on you, but also to other humans who are not victims or cannot claim, have not as much claim on victimhood as you have. So you are morally superior to them.

It's a delusion, it's every egoic identity is a form of delusion. So ultimately, it's a delusion that the stronger the ego is, the more deluded you become about who you are. And that you can also have collective victimhood as very common these days.

You can, your group of people who undoubtedly has, people you identify with, whatever it may be, gender or race or a social class that was oppressed, whatever it may be, and certainly these things have happened. People, social groups have been victimized, so to speak, in the past, suffering inflicted by humans or other groups of humans, certainly happened. And to remember that is fine, to recognize it for what it is.

It's like similar to a memory of an individual person suffering abuse, injustice, and so on. And now you, if it's collective, it's a very similar process. You remember what was being done.

The question is, is it just a memory? And do you recognize what was behind it? What other, or is it more than a memory?

Is it something that becomes in doubt with a sense of self, selfhood? Then you have a collective victim identity that is also very powerful. And this is to say that that's an illusion, is not to say that these abuses did not happen.

The illusion is what are you doing to yourself by deriving your sense of identity from this thing that happened in the past? The memory is fine. We need to remember these things, fine.

But do I derive my sense of who I am from being a victim, either on an individual level or on a collective level? That is an enormous limitation on my life because I'm immediately, the implication, when a significant part of your identity is that of a victim, the implication is that you remain a victim. There isn't much you can do because they've made you into a victim.

You've made yourself into a victim. What can you do now? You're obviously morally superior to everybody who is less of a victim than you, but you condemn yourself almost to powerlessness.

When you, any kind of victim identity, you want to remain powerless because to say that you could transcend what was done to you, you can overcome the effects of it. You can go beyond it. You have the power to go beyond the abuse that was done to you, which every human has that power.

You can never discover that power if you are trapped in a victim identity. So the power to transcend, to go beyond what was done to you, not to be held back by what was done to you on an individual level or collectively, the power to go beyond it is you do not have this power as long as you remain trapped in a victim identity because the ego does not want to let go of being a victim. Once something has been incorporated into the ego, the ego does not want to let go.

It becomes part of your, it is precious to you. Is there another question that has not dissolved?

[Speaker 7] (4:48:17 - 4:49:04)
It only has partly dissolved. Hello, Eckhart. Moin, moin.

My question deals with parents. With practicing presence, felt love for them after many years, not feeling love and feeling guilty for that. But I still have huge problems to meet them.

When I meet them, if they are in the same room, even if I try to be aware of my breath and my inner body, after a while, I have huge pain body attacks. And...

[Speaker 1] (4:49:04 - 4:49:07)
Is that triggered by something they say or?

[Speaker 7] (4:49:07 - 4:49:27)
I can't even say that. Sometimes it's the way I managed to go through the meeting quite fine and my mother leaves the room and I break down. And yeah, I don't know what it is.

[Speaker 1] (4:49:29 - 4:49:31)
German parents can be difficult.

[Speaker 3] (4:49:33 - 4:49:34)
Okay.

[Speaker 1] (4:49:36 - 6:05:58)
I know. American parents too. So on one level, there's already an acceptance of them on a mental level, the acceptance of who they are, the acceptance of their limitations, they behave the way they behave.

Is the pain body is still there inside you, of course, and the pain body reacts. It may also be that the mental level, the mental acceptance is not yet complete either to see that they act the way they act, speak the way they speak, not because of who they are, but because of their past conditioning, which is their mental emotional conditioning is speaking through them. They can't help that.

If there's not enough presence, everybody is in controlled by their mental emotional conditioning. They can't help it. They are afflicted by that disease.

Which is identification with unconscious conditioning. I'm not the only one who calls that disease. Even in the ancient teachings of Zen, they sometimes call it the disease of the mind.

And there are some Zen teachers who have said they are here to cure that mental illness. I've said, that's what Zen is about. It's curing that mental illness.

So you need to, on the mental level, as you sit with them, you need to know that continuously that what you are observing is not who they are. You're observing a form of mental conditioning. Underneath that, there is the being.

And you may sometimes get a glimpse of it. My mother was very much identified also with her mind. And occasionally I looked into her eyes and suddenly there was a light shining through when she stopped talking for a little while.

In other words, the mind catching a breath after talking for 10 minutes incessantly. And then for a moment I could see, oh, there's their being. Her being was shining through.

And I have one or two photos where her being shines through. And then of course it gets obscured again. And then you get the same, get the suspicions, the complaints, the accusations, all the stuff associated with unconscious thinking.

So on the mental level, you need to know that, be present enough so that you don't forget that what you're observing is not who they are, but you're observing the past in them, the conditioning. And then comes the emotions that you feel. Of course, there's your past, the past, the living past in you from your childhood, all the things they did or failed to do because they couldn't help it.

There wasn't enough presence to change it. So that's something for you to find acceptance as you accept them, you accept what you feel at that moment. Whether you can even label it, we don't know.

Is it sadness? Is it anger? Is it heaviness or a mixture of all of that?

A feeling of wanting to run away? A contraction, whatever it is, that's all there. You don't need to even analyze it.

You just need to feel the entire energy field of that. And it doesn't feel pleasant. And it's the past in you.

So there you're observing the past in them acting out and you experience the past in you. And so what do you do with two pasts? You have the past out there and the past in here.

Only presence can dissolve the past. So you need to access the power of presence in yourself. And how do you do that?

A quick way in a situation like this is the acceptance of whatever arises inside or outside at this moment. You accept this is what you feel. This is what they do or say.

There's the acceptance of the inner and the outer. Because it is already happening. You have to accept or you suffer.

In a way, if you don't accept, you suffer more. If you don't want to feel what you feel, that's more suffering because you're resisting. Acceptance does something that I could describe as, let's say, here's the emotional field and it doesn't feel good.

And acceptance means just to say, okay, that is, I can feel that. I'm verbalizing, acceptance doesn't even require after a little while, you don't need words anymore. You can just see what is, be with it.

And at that moment, a little bit of space opens up around that emotion. A little bit of space. That space comes from your acceptance.

The acceptance gives it space. And that's already a tiny bit of freedom. You've given it a little bit of space inside yourself when you say, yes, this is what is.

And that's a beauty. You have given both them space externally to be, and you've given yourself space internally. And then as you notice that actually, it feels already a little bit better than before because there's space around the emotion.

And then you go into it more deeply and you accept even more, continue to accept. And that space grows a little bit around it. And then you encounter the strange phenomenon of an emotion that is not pleasant existing in a spacious field, so to speak, that's around it.

And then you realize that who you are is you are that field. And you can allow the emotion to be in that field. And you can allow your parents to be there and say what they say and do what they do.

They're repeating the past. Space comes in. So acceptance brings space.

And space is the transcendence of conditioning. Space is the transcendence of the past, the transcendence, transcendence of the personality and the person. And it's freedom, space.

That's the practice. And so the best place to practice is with your parents. There are many other places where you can practice, but the ultimate mastery you will achieve when you can practice with your parents, that's the graduation.

You graduate. It's the PhD in presence with. Don't jump into it too much.

Don't, if you say, okay, I'm going to spend a week with our parents now, it's too much, too much. You should give yourself short time periods at first. Say, I'm going to come for coffee and cake.

That's what they like to do. At least my mother did. I'll come for coffee and cake and I'll stay for an hour.

Or you know, if you can, I don't know how that works practically, but. And then you practice, you give yourself one hour to practice. And you know, it's only an hour.

I have to be present for an hour. And it's your spiritual practice. So the, as you know, I've written the quote in a book, Ram Dass said, if you think you're so enlightened, spend two weeks with your parents, two weeks.

The ultimate test. So happy practice. Life does not cease from challenging you.

And that doesn't change. Even if you awaken spiritually, you will get other challenges, different kinds of challenges. The only difference is as you awaken spiritually, the way in which you respond to the challenges changes.

And that is all important. How you confront the challenges of life, how you react to or respond to the challenges of life determines how you experience your life. How you experience your life ultimately is not determined by what happens to you, because most people think that that's the case, but how you experience your life or what you call your life is ultimately not determined by what happens to you.

It is determined by how you respond to what happens to you and how you respond to what happens to you determines what happens in the so-called future. How you respond now. Some people, whenever they are challenged by life, they behave as if there was something very wrong with their life, that things are not supposed to go wrong or be challenging.

This is not supposed to happen. And this works on both a small scale and large scale. And you might've met people, and perhaps you were one of those people in the past, people who are continuously complaining about things.

They're continuously not in alignment, continuously out of alignment with whatever is going on around them, situations and people and places and events. Either something is there that shouldn't be there, something is happening right now that should not be happening or something is not happening that should be happening or I should be somewhere else, but I'm here. And that's a huge problem.

I'm trying very hard to get there, but I'm here. Now, this sounds a little weird when I say it like this, but the sad fact is that many people, people live like that for most of their life. They are not aligned with what they are doing right now.

Yes, they are doing it, but they are not fully in the doing because they'd rather be somewhere else. They would rather be already at the end of this particular activity. And when you're very much in that mindset, that means your life is stressful continuously.

Stressful means there's a mental projection of where you need to be or should be, but you're here. So you're engaged in this activity, but there's a, you have mental, you have certain thoughts that tell you either you already want to be at the end of what you're doing or although you are doing this, you really should also be doing that and that and that, but you're doing this, a dreadful way to live. Normal, by the way, it's called normal.

And you see it when you watch the movies, everybody's like that in the movies. So it must be normal. They're all like, and people love to see the dysfunctional way in which people live, reflected on TV and in the movies, they reflected their own dysfunction and that's a confirmation that, okay, I'm actually okay because everybody's unhappy.

Everybody is living in this way, in this state of almost continuous dissatisfaction except for brief moments, sometimes to do with having a good meal or sex, could do it for a while. This doesn't last very long. Or you get what you wanted.

You get what you wanted. The thing that you said, oh, that's what will make me happy. And then you get it.

And for a moment you feel, ah, and you feel this happiness arising. And why do you think you feel this happiness? Because you got what you wanted.

But if you look more deeply, you will realize that you do not really feel happy because you got what you wanted. You feel happy because for a very short time period, the mind structure that was always unhappy with the is-ness of things, there's something is missing here. I need that.

I need to get rid of that. That mind structure subsides. And for a moment you don't want anything except what is here now.

And that suddenly you feel more alive. You feel, ah. And now then perhaps you begin to understand why the Buddha talked about the greatest obstacle to spiritual awakening being continuous.

Well, he called it, and in the translations, it's called desire. But a better translation of what the Buddha was talking about is a more vital term is wanting. The continuous wanting, wanting this, wanting that, wanting the neediness, the wanting.

And that is the mind structure that operates in humans that prevents them from experiencing the deeper dimension of reality, which we could call the timeless dimension, the timeless dimension of consciousness. Remember, we talked about time a few minutes ago. We talked about time.

And yes, a few minutes ago. And we talked about the express train that you can't get off. We talked about the fire that is consuming you.

That is time. That is true. But the good news is that there is in every human a deeper dimension of consciousness.

In many humans, it's only a potential, a latent potential, like a seed. In others, the seed has already began to sprout. There is the possibility in humans of accessing and living from the deeper dimension of consciousness.

And accessing that deeper dimension of consciousness is what we could call spiritual awakening, where you realize that in addition to being a person a personality or a person who lives in this world of time, of past and future, in addition to being this person, there is more to you. There are other dimensions to who you are, or more specifically, there is a deeper dimension to who you are than the merely historical person. And that's why we are here tonight, because I want this not just to be a conceptual talk, although of course we're using words, but the aim is for you to experience at first hand, even if it's only a glimpse, or to deepen, for many of you, it'll be just a deepening because you already are sensing what it is that I'm talking about.

You say, I think I know what he's talking about. You're already sensing within yourself what it is that I'm talking about when I speak of a deeper dimension of who you are, a deeper sense of identity of who you are. But basically for the really important things, it's preferable to be in the state of not knowing, which is a non-conceptual awareness.

Sometimes presence is compared to listening, and that is an analogy one can use, and Jesus used to describe it to people so they can experience it, who have no idea what you're talking about. So when you are trying to teach it to your mother or your children or your dad or your grandparents or whatever, or your uncle or aunt to say, what's all that nonsense that you can say, when you, if you're listening, if you're trying to catch the very slight noise, what stage would you be in inside if you were very intent listening, trying to catch the slightest noise that's arising, what inner state would you be in? And then let's try it.

You can practice with your children. It's a game. It's a wonderful game.

Can we listen to the slightest? What noises can you hear? Let's say you're out in nature and there's very subtle noises.

What noises can you hear? And then they go, okay, but you have to get still. Otherwise you won't know.

So you get still and then you go, okay, listen very carefully. Okay, and then they go, of course they're not thinking then. You can't think and listen very carefully.

Ah, and then they might hear noise. Oh, I can hear that. Okay, anything else?

They listen again. Oh, now I can hear that. Okay.

And so that you're putting this person or that's a child you're doing it with, without them knowing it, you are actually putting them into a different state of consciousness simply by asking them to listen very carefully because you cannot carefully listen and think at the same time. Presence needs to be taken. Consciousness needs to be reclaimed from the thinking function.

And it's all because all that consciousness is required to go into the auditory perception. So consciousness is reclaimed from thinking and then flows into auditory perception. And so you experience that you have a choice of where you want your attention to be.

You don't have to always have your attention absorbed continuously by the stream of thinking. Most people don't know that. They are identified with a stream of thinking.

They don't know that they can reclaim their consciousness from where it is usually lodged in thinking. And that's a wonderful freedom. But this is the beginning of it is to show somebody, listen, as I mentioned the other day, Jesus used the example of the master is coming home at night and you have to be awake to know when he's coming because he may be very quiet.

That's a parable used by Jesus. Why does he say that? Some people misinterpret it and think he's talking about the end of the world.

Why would he talk about, why do you have to be quiet when the end of the world, it comes whether you're quiet or not. So you're listening. It's a different state of consciousness.

You could do the same with a visual perception. Look very clearly. What is it that you can see?

Let's say, so you're out in nature. What is it that you can see over there? What's that in the distance?

What could that be? And then you're asking that person to enter a different state of consciousness, to stop thinking and putting all attention into visual perception. And they would go, and until they find an interpretation and know what it is they're looking at, they are not thinking.

So to look at something unusual, it's very helpful because when you can't interpret it, there's no thought yet. So if you see a UFO, then you would, for a while you would go. It's why it might stop your mind for a while until you say, oh, now I know what it is.

It's a UFO, which is of course a contradiction in terms because UFO means it's unidentified, so you don't know what it is. But very often the mind, by finding a word for something, seems that now you know. This is how a lot of mental knowledge operates.

You find a word for it. It's, oh, okay. The child asked the parent, how do the birds find their way when they travel thousands of miles from the Northern Hemisphere to the Southern Hemisphere, and then they find their way back in the next year to the same nesting grounds, thousands of miles away, and they, how do they do that, dad?

Can you tell me how that happens, says the child, and the dad says, oh, yes, it's instinct. Oh, okay. Okay.

Write it down, instinct. Now I know what it is. So a lot of our knowledge is just covering up our ignorance with words.

Entire PhDs are like that. And there's a refusal to recognize that at the heart of life or the universe, there is a deep mystery that we cannot conceptually understand. But because people have these huge egos, they cannot admit, especially if you're a scientist, you can't admit to yourself that there is a deep mystery and there's a huge amount of things that you do not understand.

And they can't get themselves to say that, so they have to pretend that they know. It's just words or little scribbles on a piece of paper. So to continue to be open to the mystery of life is vital so that you stay connected to the mystery.

If you pretend to know, you cut yourself off from the mystery because the mystery is also the source of all life. So to deny the mystery is a dreadful thing to do to yourself but to remain open to the mystery and to remain comfortable with not knowing most things. You just know, of course, things that you need to operate in your daily life.

That's fine. You dial a phone number, you know that. That works.

You know how to use your iPhone or your BlackBerry and all the other devices and many other things you can do. But basically for the really important things, it's preferable to be in the state of not knowing, which is a non-conceptual awareness, especially in relation to other human beings. I don't even want to understand you.

I allow you to be who you are. And I know that in your essence, you are one with my essence. We are more than connected.

And that is enough for me to, when I meet somebody, that's enough. I don't need to know their story to know them. There is a different, there are two kinds of knowing.

One, the one that most people are familiar with is conceptual knowing, you know, through mental concepts. What many people are not familiar with is direct knowing that operates without any concepts. So when I walk in the forest, which I love to do, I can apply conceptual knowledge to what I see by interpreting the trees, what they are called, by looking at various phenomena in the forest.

For example, in the Northwest Pacific, you have things like trunks, a tree, old trees that have fallen and are beginning to decay. And out of the trunk of the old tree, a new tree, a seed of a tree has gone into that decay trunk. And it's called a nurse log.

So you have a huge log. And out of that log, a new tree, totally new tree grows. The old log is nursing the new tree.

So they call it the nurse log. I haven't seen those things in Europe. I don't know if they exist.

But so I can look at that and say, ah, that's a nurse log. And I can look at other things and the birds and so on. I can also, it's one level of knowing the forest, but it's not very deep.

It's conceptual. There is another way when I do not interpret what I see at all. And I simply contemplate the trees, everything without naming mentally.

From the point of view of conceptual knowledge, it now looks as if I had abandoned all knowledge because if I don't have any, if I'm not naming it in my mind, what do I know? Nothing from a conceptual viewpoint. And yet I am relating to the aliveness of the forest and of every being in it much more deeply than I could through the conceptual level of knowing.

And if I'm confined, when I go for a walk in the forest, if I'm confined to only conceptual knowledge, or if I'm totally elsewhere, thinking about something totally different, what's going to happen next week, or my problematic life situation, I'm totally absent. But even if I'm in the forest and looking, but only knowing it through concepts, as many people do, birdwatchers, they love to interpret. And then they write, this is such and such a bird.

That is fine, there is a place for that kind of knowledge. But if you are trapped on that, you're missing something much more important. You are missing the deeper knowing that is non-conceptual that can only be there when you stop naming.

And that means you're open to the mystery of the forest. You're no longer pretending because even if you call it a nurse log, what do you really know? And even if you look more deeply, you still don't know what the life is.

No scientist knows what life is. They only know how life manifests. But nobody has found the life is the mystery.

Nobody knows what consciousness is. Scientists don't even mention the word consciousness. I'm told, I'm not sure, in the latest book by Stephen Hawkins, who's quite a good thinker, the word consciousness, it's about the universe, the history of the universe or whatever it is.

I can't remember the title. The word consciousness is not used once. The greatest mystery of life, the fact that there is consciousness, which is able to perceive the universe, he doesn't mention it because the scientist doesn't know what to do with it.

It is, so let's stay connected to the mystery and then realize that there is a very deep knowing. Let's go back to the forest. When I go through the forest, that is my preference without naming continuously, but simply perceiving the totality and the various things.

Sometimes I perceive just one thing, a blade of grass, a branch, one particular tree, or the nurse logs, or the different kinds of fern, moss. In the Northwest Pacific, apparently there are several hundred different types of moss and that's to do with conceptual knowledge. But just looking at it, just seeing, and then the totality of the forest, you take that in too.

And you can then notice it is an energy field. It is alive. It is pervaded by something.

It is alive. And you can sense that. And this is a way of knowing the forest that is non-conceptual.

And you then know it. And that knowing is no longer separate from knowing yourself because as you know the forest, you are very deeply connected with the awareness within yourself. And somehow they are not separate.

And as you walk through the forest, the forest, as I like to put it, because that's how I experience it, the forest becomes conscious of itself because it's not separate from you. You are connected to everything. You are not separate from the totality.

So suddenly as you, the person with a name and a birth date has transcended its personal self and becomes a field of awareness through which the forest becomes aware of its own sacredness and beauty and aliveness. And you go, welcome to our live meditation. We are not going to do a technique-based meditation here, but a more natural, spontaneous meditation.

So allow me to just talk you into, so to speak, the meditative state of consciousness. The two ingredients of our meditation session here are the words and the spaces between the words. Yes, there's also the visual.

You see the image on the screen, but mostly it's the words that you pay attention to and there's the silent spaces. And usually you would always just be waiting for the next thing the speaker says, but here to enter the meditative state of consciousness, you become aware of the silent spaces too. You just notice them right now.

And you may notice that when you notice the silent spaces, for that moment, your mind also becomes silent. In other words, there is a brief cessation of thinking without loss of consciousness, like now. That is the beginning of the meditative state.

And it may come as a surprise to some of you that although you probably think continuously, every moment, almost every moment of your waking life, it doesn't have to be like that. You can invite into your life these still or silent spaces. In fact, it's absolutely vital essential for any human to have some access to that inner stillness because that inner stillness is a source of great power and aliveness.

And it's also a place where you can sense the deeper feeling of being you. The word I is used a lot. It's probably one of the most frequently used words in the language, I, I, I.

And usually it refers to yourself as a, let's say, historical person, somebody, a person with a history. The history of you makes you into who you are as a person, your past. And then it includes, the I refers also, of course, to your current circumstances, whatever you identify with, whatever you derive your sense of self from, whether it's possessions, or you can derive your sense of self from your possessions.

You can also derive your sense of self from your lack of possessions, which could be interpreted as either that you are worse off than other people, and you have a sense of identity there made up of certain, certain thoughts, or it could be interpreted, the lack of possessions could be interpreted as I am more spiritual than all those people who have these possessions, which, again, it's a sense of identity based on a little story in your mind.

And usually the word I refers to that mental entity that consists of things that you, over a period of time throughout your life, have identified with mostly, and those things become a sense of who you are, successes, failures, relationships, possessions, status in society, things that you, other people did to you, you did to other people. All those things become mental stories, and they give you a sense of self, and this is what usually the word I refers to. And most people don't realize that there can be a deeper meaning to I, a deeper sense of identity than one that consists of your personal history.

And meditation, in a wider sense, or the meditative state, is here to help you realize that there's more to you than your personal history, or the story in your mind about who you are, which may be predominantly great. That may be a fiction, but I'm better than most people. It may be predominantly negative.

I'm a victim of everybody else. Or it may be a mixed bag for most people. It's probably a mixed bag of good and bad.

But if you never go beyond that sense of self, that's a very limited existence, but that kind of limited existence is normal. Whenever you watch movies and so on, it's usually about people who lead that kind of limited existence, although there are some movies occasionally where you see a glimpse of something else. That's the spiritual dimension.

That's going deeper within, as we're doing now. So when we come to that, you may remember I said, be aware of the silent spaces, even though they may be short. And as you become aware of the silent spaces, your mind becomes still, just for that moment, like this moment.

Your mind becomes still means, of course, there is a cessation, a stopping, of thought. But the voice in the head, as I sometimes call it, suddenly stops speaking. There's no longer any mental commentary about what's going on here or now.

And there's no longer a mental projection into some future moment like, what am I going to have for dinner or lunch? Tomorrow. So what's left of you when there is that brief cessation of mind activity, but you have not gone to sleep.

You are as alert as you were before in fact, you are more alert than when you were engaged in thinking. And suddenly you go. And for a moment, what's left of you is that alert presence.

And the historical person has kind of temporarily disappeared. That's quite interesting. And without having any story in your mind to tell you who you are, you nevertheless get a very strong sense of beingness or presence.

You can sense that there is a presence. And of course, that presence is perceiving through that presence is the background to your sense perceptions. Right now, you hear the voice.

You see the image on the screen, but no particular commentary on it. It's actually possible to be aware of the present moment, the now, and to be aware of the now is the state of presence. Now there are two levels to being aware of the now.

On one level, you're aware of what's happening in the now, outside or inside of you, whatever is going on around you or whatever arises in your field of perception and whatever arises inside you, a feeling or an emotion, even be aware of the occasional thought that may arise. But to be aware of the now is really more than that. There's another deeper level.

And this is what I'm referring to when I'm saying being aware of the now. Yes, you are aware of what's going on in the now, but you can also be aware of the now itself. This is very hard to talk about because obviously the now itself, you can't see it or hear it, taste it or smell it or touch it.

And obviously it's not a thought. Thinking now, now is not being aware of now, now, now, now. So to be aware of the now as something that is deeper than what appears in the now that's of course the state of presence.

And this paradoxical thing is when you're aware of the now, you're not really aware of anything because what we call the now is a field of presence, a space. So to be aware of the now is as elusive as being aware of the space outside of you. Usually you're not aware of the space in the room that you're sitting in.

You're aware of what's in the room, but you're not usually aware of the space. In the same way, you may be aware of what goes on inside you, in your mind, mental, emotional formations, one thought and another thought. But can you be aware of a deeper level within you that is the equivalent of the space in the room that you're sitting in?

And the equivalent of the furniture in your room is your thoughts, the content. And of course, the essence of this room is not the furniture. The essence of this room is the space in this room.

And the essence of you is not the furniture in your mind, which means the content of your mind. Although most people mistake the content of their mind for who they are, you have ideas in your head of who you are, and you derive your sense of self from the ideas in your head about who you are. But of course, that's not essentially who you are in the same way that the furniture in the room is not essentially the room.

So there's a space in you, so to speak, that is essentially who you are. And the furniture comes and goes, it's interchangeable. You can, when you don't know that space, which is another way of speaking of the now itself, is that inner space in which things appear.

If you can be aware of that, in addition to being aware of what comes into the space, what is in the space, as sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions, which make up your so-called life. If you can be aware of the space in addition to the things that appear in the space, then that is enlightened living, conscious, then you are conscious, you are present. So presence is being aware of that deeper dimension so that you don't delude yourself and believe that the content of your mind, because even sense perceptions, ultimately, you experience as the content of your mind.

So you don't delude yourself into believing that the content of your mind is all there is. To you, and the things happening around you, that's all there is, that's your life. Whereas it's only your life situation.

Whatever's going on in your life is your life situation. You remember, I sometimes speak about that. Is that all there is?

It's a very impoverished existence when all there is to you in your perception that is your life situation. Whatever's going on right now, with whatever's going on in your living situation, your work situation, your relationship situation, your financial situation. And at any one time of your life, at least one of these areas is probably going to be problematic.

If you don't have a problem with finances, you may have a problem with people, a relationship. If you don't have a problem with your relationships, you have some problem at work, you have a problem with health, things that rarely is your life without so-called problems, another word for which is challenges. So to look for an end to the challenges so that you can finally take a breath and say, ah, I have arrived.

And thinking that by somehow sorting out your life situation, you're going to arrive at a point where you can take that breath and say, I finally arrived. It's not going to happen. You never finally arrive as far as your life situation is concerned because it's in the nature of life to give you challenges.

So is that pessimistic or negative? When I say you're never going to arrive, of course, not on that level, not on the level of the content of your life situation, the content of your mind. But you can arrive and you can take that breath and say, ah, that's it.

I finally made it. You can do that by accessing, by realizing the deeper dimension in you of whatever you want to call it, whether you call it the now itself, whether you call it being aware of awareness itself, being aware of your beingness, the presence behind everything, being aware of yourself as the presence, not as what happens in the field of presence, but as the presence itself, a self-awareness of presence.

That is having arrived. And that is when you can take that breath and breathe out, ah, that's, I made it, so to speak. So you have arrived already because on the level of content of your life situation, you're never going to make it.

There will continue to be challenges, although there are periods when you have little plateaus, when you say, oh, life is great at the moment. I'm okay financially. I'm okay.

My work situation, relationships are fine. Family is fine. I have a nice place to live and the weather is good.

But is it going to last? Not for too long. And really, if we even want to use the word happiness, let's call it true happiness.

It's a delusion to believe that true happiness is going to come to you when certain things are sorted out or attained in your life situation. Yes, I'm not denying that it is comfortable and pleasant to achieve things, but any achievement is already an end point. So you achieve, you'd create this great thing.

And there it is. And everybody says, oh, you're great. And then what?

Okay. And for a while, that might give you satisfaction. And then it doesn't anymore.

Or people don't think it's that great anymore. So happiness, true happiness, arises from the deeper, the realization of that deeper dimension in yourself. That's the source of satisfaction, true satisfaction.

And to arrive at it, you don't need more time. In fact, as far as the realization of that dimension is concerned, time is the hindrance. That sense of psychological time prevents you from realizing that, prevents you from finding true happiness, contentment, not sleepy contentment, alive contentment.

It is peaceful. Another word for it is inner peace. But there's a dynamic quality to that inner peace.

So really, that's the only way to become a truly peaceful human being and to bring peace into this world is to access that dimension in yourself. But what that really means is to be truly yourself. To be who you are beyond the content of your mind, the unconditioned consciousness.

Then you become intelligent in the true sense. Or rather, the one underlying intelligence that pervades the universe can then flow through you and express itself even as the creation of some new form, whatever that may be. And the master raised his finger and said, enters in from there, from here.

Every point is, these things cannot be explained. You spoil them if you explain them. I just explained it, unfortunately.

Do you remember the story I recounted in a, I believe in a new earth, the story of a Zen master who is on a pilgrimage? That's the ancient word for hike. He's on a- He's on a- is on a pilgrimage somewhere with a disciple.

And so they're walking in silence, of course, except of course, a disciple hasn't quite arrived yet at the realization that Zen aims at. So the disciple is walking, but obviously thinking while he's walking. Finally, they sit down somewhere for a little picnic, a break, and then disciple says to the master, master, I've been thinking, I don't quite, still don't get it.

I've been here for five years and I still don't get what is the essence of what you teach? What is that essence? I just can't get it.

I've been trying to figure it out, but I can't. And the master said, can you hear the sound of that mountain stream, that little, and the disciple said, what mountain stream? I don't hear anything.

The master said, listen carefully. And so the disciple goes, and then in a very far distance, the disciple hears the sound of water of a little mountain stream, very distant. And then the disciple says, yeah, I can hear it now, master.

And the master says, that is the, that is the, something like, that is the portal into Zen, or that is, there is the beginning of Zen. That's it, that's it. And for a moment, I don't know how long the disciple actually gets it.

Wow. Wow. And he gets it because his mind stops and awareness remains.

And why did that happen? Because all his consciousness, conscious attention was required for the sensory, in this case, auditory perception. There wasn't enough left to be, so to speak, to be consumed by thinking.

So there was a cessation of thinking and the arising of presence. The master very cleverly arranged it in that way, rather than saying, stop thinking, which wouldn't work. So there wasn't the master, the disciple got it.

In some versions, there's a continuation of the story. So they finished their picnic, they walk on, and an hour later, by then the disciple has fallen back into a stream of useless thinking, of course. And the disciple says, I have another question, master.

What would you have said if I hadn't been able to hear that mountain stream? What would you have said then? Okay.

Slight correction in how I told the story before I finish it. When the disciple originally says, yes, I can hear the mountain stream. Yes, I can hear it.

The master says, enter Zen from there, or from here. Enter Zen from there, enter Zen from here. In other words, that's the entry point into Zen, this one.

And then hours later, when the disciple had been thinking again, they're walking again, what would you have said if I had said to you, I can't hear the mountain stream, what would you have said then? The mind is so weird, it never stops ruminations. And the master raised his finger and said, enter Zen from there, from here.

Every point is, these things cannot be explained, you spoil them if you explain them. I've just explained it, unfortunately. The mind, it doesn't stop.

So you have the mind, such a wonderful tool, such a wonderful instrument for creation. The ability to think, that's inseparable from the arising of language, ability to use language. And thinking is a kind of inner talk.

And it grew and grew, and gradually it took over. And so humans lost their connectedness with being, which before the arising of thinking was unconscious, but they felt that deep, they did not live in a state of, in a problem making state of anxiety, or if there was fear, it was short-lived because there was immediate danger. But there was no anxiety or fear generated by the thinking process, because there was no thinking process.

There was no identities that were before the time that Narcissus saw his image in the pool of water and became obsessed with it. And then, that I talked about yesterday, the first selfie, the world's first selfie, me, it's me. And then people began to have a relationship with themselves.

I hate myself, I love myself. Sometimes I hate myself, and sometimes I love myself.

[Speaker 9] (6:05:58 - 6:05:58)
Hmm.

[Speaker 1] (6:06:01 - 6:42:05)
Loving yourself is certainly preferable to hating yourself. I would recommend it, but it's not the last step. It's an intermediate step.

Beyond loving yourself is no longer having a relationship with yourself. I'm ending the relationship with myself. I'm ending the relationship with myself.

Goodbye. This is it. So this, after loving yourself, the next step is simply being yourself.

Oh, then you know that you don't hate yourself, you don't, you can't really say, I love myself, because the moment you say, I love myself, you have created a duality. I and myself. So who is that self that you either love or hate, and who are you?

Now, at first, this space of pure awareness seems to be nothing. And in a way, it is nothing in the sense that it is not a thing, that it is not an object of consciousness, because everything else is an object of consciousness. Every sense perception becomes an object of consciousness in your mind.

Every thought is an object of, in other words, you could say, it is a form that consciousness temporarily takes. It incarnates into a form, and that form is a thought, or it could be a sense perception. And so that is the incarnation of consciousness into form.

When you come, sometimes Buddhists argue, how many more incarnations do I need before I no longer need to incarnate? You can do it right here and now. Don't incarnate into thoughts.

That's the end of incarnation, which means don't identify with the rising thoughts. Be the awareness behind the thoughts, which is what you are. And so at first, it seems like, let's say, what we call it, stillness.

By the way, I wrote a little book that some of you might not know. It's called Stillness Speaks, which is a little paradox, of course. Stillness Speaks, it's a book for meditative reading.

You just read a few lines and you kind of become still. That's what it's for, but anyway. So the stillness is one way of putting it, but that's not, it's just a term, of course.

Stillness is the inner equivalent of silence in the outer world. Silence in the outer world is the absence of noise. Stillness in the inner realm is the absence of thought.

And so in the absence of thought, what remains is you do not fall asleep. In ordinary existence, when thinking stops, you very quickly fall asleep. So the only way that humans who are not awakened or awakening can experience the cessation of thinking is when they move from the wakeful state into sleep.

Then there comes a moment of you cannot remember your problems anymore because you're so tired. Five minutes before you were thinking about your problems would be the problems for your identity. And now you get very tired.

You can't remember your problems anymore. And thinking comes, but you're not totally asleep yet. And it feels so good.

You're moving towards sleep, and it feels so good. And temporarily, briefly, you're free of yourself. And then you move into the unconsciousness of sleep.

Now, most humans, without knowing it, are looking for becoming free of themselves, of themselves. And then again, they look in the wrong places. Some humans find temporary relief from themselves by taking certain substances.

And again, for some humans, it can be a good thing to have, especially those who are totally mind-possessed, that can give them a glimpse of something that's beyond their mind. It may temporarily stop their mind, but don't become dependent on anything. But, and I don't recommend it.

Now, you don't need it. But if you take such, humans, they love that smoking, these dried leaves, they were illegal for many years for some reason, but now you can smoke them. Well, no, I don't know about here, but.

So you, it temporarily calms the mind. It's like your mind becomes a bit, I tried it once when we were visiting Amsterdam. And it kind of dulls your mind a bit.

That's how I experienced it. But I can see what it does to people whose mind is very active. They go, temporarily, they become free of themselves, the mind made self.

And they've become, oh, happy, so happy. I can't stop laughing. That's how happy I am.

I'm free of myself. So the way I put it is, with this, yes, you are becoming free of yourself, but you're falling below thinking. You're going to a state prior to the rising of the ego.

You're falling below thinking. Yes, you are free of the mind that tortures you every day, but you're falling below thinking. This is not where the awakening path, otherwise we would call it the sleepy path or something like that.

The awakening path is the ability grows in you to rise above thinking. That's what it is. You are actually, you are conscious without thought.

And that is very, that is the simplicity of it. And then you find, at first, it's just an absence of thought, in the same way that externally silence is an absence of noise. This is the absence of inner noise.

And then at first, okay, and then you stay with it, and it comes back again at the end. Once you get a glimpse of that state of pure awareness, you may want to invite it into your life more often. And because then, from the point of view of time, one could say that it deepens this power that manifests through you, grows stronger.

Not that the power itself grows stronger, but it manifests into this dimension where there's time, it manifests more fully through you, so to speak. So the power, presence, power, as I sometimes call it, grows in you. That is the power of life itself.

That is the pure, pure intelligence, you could call it, pure consciousness, the very primordial thing that is behind everything. It is, that is, sometimes I'm, are you, am I talking about God here? Am I saying that this, the consciousness itself is God?

Well, yes and no. The analogy I like to use that is maybe helpful is the sun. The sun emanates light into here.

It gives, it's the life on a physical level. The light of the sun is the life-giving thing here that enables life to be, and the sun pours out light continuously, energy, and there's the sun. Now, this light, of course, is still connected to this, is connected to the sun.

It's not separate from the sun. It emanates from the sun, but it's not the sun. It's, so it is and it isn't the sun, because the sun itself is a vast and inconceivable form of energy.

This is only an analogy. So what I mean then is God is the source from which consciousness emanates into this dimension. This is the closest, as far as I'm concerned, it's the closest, and in words, to explain that which cannot really be explained.

It's the medium, nothing in excess. The challenges of life, it's important then to see that there is no end to it. So on that level, you want, life won't leave you alone, but on a deeper level, once you accept that challenges will come, you don't have to become negative when they do come.

You can actually, oh, there's another one. And then it's often through intense challenges, the bigger ones, they drive you deeper. It's, now the interesting thing is, it's not the great things that happen to you that make you more conscious.

It's, in many cases, the so-called bad things that happen to you if you deal with them correctly and come to a place of acceptance that make you more conscious. So there's an ancient saying, I believe it comes from Sufism, but I'm not sure, that says, when the ego weeps for what it has lost, the spirit rejoices for what it has found. And so many times, you may find that in your life, you lose something, death, loss of security, loss of income, loss of health, loss of long-term relationship, both these kinds of, when the ego weeps, because the ego weeps, it's terrible, but then something suddenly arises of something that had been part of your sense of self has been removed.

It leaves a hole, an empty space, such as when somebody close to you dies, you lose your livelihood, your home. It leaves an empty space, which is painful from the point of view of a personality. And when you, it is potentially also able to drive you deeper into the, who you truly are beyond form, the unconditioned.

And then you experience suddenly, how can I feel so peaceful, suddenly, if something bad has happened, and yet suddenly you feel a sense of liberation. It doesn't happen to everybody who experiences loss, but potentially, that is always there. So next time a challenge comes, and it won't be long, then say, oh, there's another one.

And then you go with it. You look at it. Is there anything I can do to change the situation?

First, when you look at it, first, the first is always to accept the present moment as it arises. Now, sometimes whatever arises in the present moment requires you to take action. And then you look at it.

Now, this looking is an important part of it, to look at a situation. It's not necessarily visual looking. It means to give attention to a particular situation that has arisen or is arising in the present moment.

And then in this, this thing that I call looking is you give it attention. In that moment, it could only be a few seconds or a minute or two, you give it attention. And that is a very important thing.

It's not, at that point, you don't think. If your thinking comes in too soon, you might come to very wrong conclusions about what action you need to take because that action will be conditioned by your mind, the old stuff. You bring in the old and try to deal with the present moment by bringing in old conditioning.

So you will act according to your conditioning. But if you can give something attention, this giving attention, you face it. You don't, you've let go of the inner resentment, and this is the most important thing.

You've realized it is in the nature of life to give you challenges. And when they come, there's no resentment. You just see, ah, there it is, another one.

Okay, now, even as you say there's another one, you don't say, oh, no, another one. There's another one, okay. And then you look at it, and by looking, I mean to be in that state of consciousness in which there's an alertness, but not yet thinking.

You don't immediately, unless it's a situation that requires immediate action, which is called an emergency situation, in which case you'll do whatever you do anyway. Often emergency situations cut your mind out completely, and something else takes over, and you take action. And sometimes people do heroic things, and afterwards, when they are praised by others, they say, I don't know, I just did it.

And then others, it can happen that they become paralyzed in the face of an emergency. They cannot get out of their mind. And their mind doesn't have time to deal with it.

It can't do, it's suddenly the whole engine in the head gets stuck. What do I do now? And then it's too late.

It's happened already, and you're dead, or whatever it is. And you didn't jump out of the way soon enough. And there the train was coming towards you.

What do I do now? The train is coming. So in emergency situations, you cannot think.

If you think, you're stuck. And so many people experience actually that the mind gets out of the way, and something else, presence suddenly does. And this happens to people who engage in dangerous activities and love it.

Climbing up a steep wall, mountain wall, driving dangerous cars fast, motorbikes, or whatever they do. Anything, any dangerous activity forces you into the present moment. You don't need that.

And it could, of course, dangerous activity means it is dangerous. Don't get addicted to just one activity to take you into the present moment, then because then every weekend you'd have to climb up this wall. So, and in the meantime, of course, you're still not present.

So if it's not an absolute emergency situation, but a challenge, then it's important. So that means you have a little bit of time to deal with it. Don't immediately go into thinking about it.

So give it attention, face it, and now this giving of attention, which I sometimes call looking, but it's not, it might involve looking, or it might not, is this clarity of consciousness with which you look at something as an entire situation and don't immediately come to a conclusion as to what action you need to take. So you go, it's that facing it and looking that connects you to a deeper level and challenge. And in other words, you become still, alert and still.

And then after a few seconds or a minute or two, it is likely that a thought comes in that tells you what the right action is. So that's not an emergency, it's just a challenge. Or it might be that you still don't know what to do, or it may be that you have to become still again after a while and look at it again.

And then you may come to the realization that there's nothing you can do, at least for now. There are certain situations that are problematic, and yet for now, there isn't really much you can do. And then you leave it alone.

You accept this is what is, the acceptance of what is. So, it happens very often when people are not able to really have that clarity of perception, a look into it. Often people take action when it would be better to leave it alone.

Many situations, it depends, of course, on what it is. Many situations are made far worse by taking unnecessary, superfluous, or excessive action. Balance in everything.

There's a balance that you need to find. But the most important thing, challenges, accept them, even welcome them when they arise because they're a great opportunity, especially the little ones. You might not welcome the big challenges, but they are great too.

Don't resent the challenges. Get rid of the belief or transcend the belief that you should not be challenged by life, that these problems should not occur. Think about the movies, how boring a movie is.

And not only the audience would go to sleep if nothing ever goes wrong in a movie, the characters would go to sleep too. And in the end, they're all asleep. And I use asleep, not necessarily as actually asleep.

You would, in the absence of challenges, you would, your level of consciousness would decrease. So if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you're in a state of lack, of insufficiency, of not enough, and you feel that the answer to, the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible, then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack. In order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough, spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary.

Focus on the realization of being. It's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack, which is ego. Go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person.

When I say give attention, there's an element of appreciation of everything, of the little things. And you begin to realize that your entire life consists mainly of little things. We are always going from here to there, looking around, handling things.

That is sometimes called gratitude. As you might have noticed, it always takes a while before I start to speak. I often say it's good to start with a moment of stillness and it is, but the main reason is that I don't know what to say.

And that could be a very uncomfortable place or situation to be in. Some people have nightmares like that. You're on stage, curtain opens and suddenly you're facing the audience and you've forgotten your lines, but I don't have any lines.

So here's the secret. It's becoming comfortable with the state of not knowing. Otherwise it would be awful.

What can I say now? Would be terrible. And of course that is a kind of trust which I suggested the other day as a better word for faith, trust.

And that's incredibly important to become comfortable with not knowing. But what do you do when you become comfortable with not knowing? You enter the state of non-conceptual knowing, but you have to be uncomfortable with not knowing anything on a conceptual level, thinking in other words.

So another way of putting it is to say that when I come on here and then I sit, I don't think because that's the state of not knowing. And in the gaps between sentences or words, I also don't think rather than there's no next sentence or word being prepared. It just comes and that's for you.

I'm saying that because that also is a state of consciousness that you can enter and you're doing it to some extent when you don't label things, when you step back from thought, and become comfortable with just being present. And all these questions of things like self-esteem, which apparently is a problem for many people, either they have low self-esteem or they have exaggerated self-esteem or it fluctuates. And books written about how you can improve your self-esteem and probably workshops.

I don't know what they teach you. Maybe it's good, maybe not. But the simple thing is that in that state of no thought, but alert presence, all these questions about self-esteem resolve themselves into nothingness because you're no longer looking for some perceived value in a conceptual sense of self, the personality.

And you can sense the power that is within you that has nothing to do with a person. And that's where your self-esteem comes from. And it's not comparative.

In the normal state of consciousness, self-esteem is always comparative. How do I rate myself relative to this person and that person and that? And on what level, external appearance, strength, knowledge, beauty, possessions, status.

And of course there's always, you're always inferior to some in one or two or three areas and you may be superior to some in another one or two areas, but that's the power of stillness. That's another way of putting it. The power of inner stillness, that is the true seed of self-esteem.

And you can't really call it self-esteem anymore, but you realize the infinite value that you not possess, but are, because that is the essence that underlies the entire universe. It is the light of the world. And you don't compare yourself to others anymore.

You feel neither inferior nor superior. The ego is always either inferior or superior. So you might be surprised if I tell you even, I'm a small guy, even if I'm standing next to a big muscular guy towering above me with a big ego, I'm not thinking of anybody in particular at the moment, but it has happened in the past.

I don't feel inferior, just nor do I feel superior. I'm spirit, you might have a big body and muscles, but I'm the spiritual guy. That would, of course, it's the ego talking.

And this is a very interesting strategy of the ego. The spiritual ego can come in and without you knowing it, you still have a conceptual sense of self, but it's not spiritual. That's a trap that some spiritual teachers fall into too.

And you know it when they make certain pronouncements. We touched on this before, and that is they explain that they are superior to any other teacher, for example, either any other teacher alive now, or I've seen one or two spiritual teachers or read about them who actually claimed that they are superior to any spiritual teacher that ever lived or ever will live. Well, that should cover it.

Here or any other galaxy. So the most important practice on your journey, spiritual journey into the present moment, the journey without distance, is to become comfortable with not knowing, which means to become comfortable with not thinking. You don't need to demand that there should be long periods when you're not thinking, just moments when you're simply looking, listening, perceiving, or being, and you don't know anything in that moment.

Not conceptually, but you access the source of all knowledge of all knowing. And that is a way for the ego to gradually become weaker, just gradually subside, no longer runs your life, which is what is the ego, the unobserved mind. It may still come in here and there, it probably will.

[Speaker 2] (6:42:10 - 6:42:11)
That's fine.

[Speaker 1] (6:42:21 - 6:54:27)
So part of this is, of course, to give more attention to the present moment, because the more you think, the more future you generate, and the more attention you give to the present moment, the less thinking, because to be really present, you don't think about it, you just are with it, give it attention. I recommend the little things of life to be more attentive to all the little things that make up every hour of every day, every minute, every hour, and give them more attention, walking steps, one step at a time, objects that you're handling, all the time you're handling objects in your life, you're always touching something, putting something here and there. Is everything that you handle just a means to an end, or are you able to just appreciate the simple presence of even of a so-called inanimate object, contemplation also of all the lovely things that make up your environment, part of your environment.

For example, if I were sitting here alone, let's say I'm waiting for everybody to arrive, I might be sitting here looking, of course, at the flower, sense of stillness, and then there's a glass table here, and then there's a glass of water here, and there's a clock and a bell and tissues, and they all reflect the light in different ways. There's a little bit of a rainbow effect in the glass of water here, and then the lights are reflected on the bells, almost like a mirror, and there's the clock ticking away. It's a beautiful scene.

Sometimes you go to an art gallery, well, not so much with modern art, but a very favorite thing would be still life artists, and it took a while in art before they discovered, the artists in the history of art, before they discovered the seemingly insignificant things and started to give attention to those. Before that happened, they were very much interested in the huge things, the saints or the kings or the huge battle scenes or the big, they had to, they painted those things or the important people or some dramatic thing, the volcanic eruption or whatever, a fire. And then at some point, they started to discover the beauty and the incredible sense of the quality that is in the little things.

They started painting, for example, simple people. The Dutch artists, perhaps, perhaps I'm not that knowledgeable about artists, but the famous Dutch paintings show, they don't, it's not so much big, important people, they show simple people, a woman in the kitchen, baking bread, people, simple people, sitting around the table, eating a very simple meal, and there's a light, incredible light effects that comes, light comes through the window, and there's an incredible sense of presence and aliveness in the painting.

And this is a scene that in normal life, you would never have, unless you're really very conscious, nobody would have stopped and said, oh, isn't that amazing? These people are sitting around a table, eating a simple meal, and there's light coming through the window. Nobody would have done that.

Perhaps after these, more of these artists depicted relatively, seemingly insignificant things, perhaps it motivated some people to give more attention to that, but even now, it's still, people very much overlook that, and you overlook, then, a large part of your life, you don't give it attention. When I say give attention, there's an element of appreciation of everything, of the little things, and you begin to realize that your entire life consists mainly of little things. Even if you are VIP, it still consists mainly, you're always sitting somewhere, standing somewhere, looking around, handling things, going from here to there, either on a bus, or your private jet, and this giving attention, that is sometimes called gratitude.

That's kind of part of it, this appreciation, but I don't necessarily use the word gratitude too often, because it implies that you say to somebody, oh, thank you, but there's a simple appreciation of the is-ness of things, of their presence, so you no longer regard, almost continuously, your entire environment as a means to an end, and what's the end? You need to get to some future moment, where suddenly, everything is going to be better than now, and so you're always on your way, it's a stepping stone to the next moment, and every object that you handle is only, has only utilitarian value, but has no value in itself, is never appreciated for its beingness, and then you do the same to human beings, they're only regarded, what can they do for me now? How do they fit into my schemes, into my plans?

Because there's a future orientation continuously, which is the mind, because there is no future, it's created by the mind. And it becomes extremely enjoyable to be, just to be contemplating the little things that surround you, then you, there is something, yes, there is an element of gratitude that comes with it, this appreciation, it's an element, or you appreciate the sense-perceived world, this is an aspect of reality, it's not the deepest aspect of reality, but it is the surface of the ocean, and it's beautiful. And that also means, it's not just when you are quietly contemplating, it's also when you're going from A to B to perform some action, you're going to buy something, going to the, whatever it is, post office, appreciate the journey, and every step of the journey, and look around so that the 10 minutes of going to the shop, or driving to the shop, or taking a bicycle to the shop, isn't completely wasted, and reduced to means to an end, then you can actually, that every moment is significant, and ultimately it's only ever the one moment, and then this waiting game comes to an end, waiting for the big break, that's an expression, I don't know what break, what breaks, but waiting for whatever it is, of course you have a goal, you may have a goal in life, and you're moving towards it, but in the meantime, this is now, and yes, you know you're moving towards it, it becomes very enjoyable to be wherever you are, when you have this ability to contemplate the little things, both when you're passively contemplating, or even when you are moving, in being engaged with things, I started off with the talking about coming on stage, and not knowing what to say, I'll tell you about dreams that I sometimes have, two types of dreams, because dreams can come from different levels, there are deep dreams, and there are surface dreams, in deep dreams, I sit in front of an audience like this, and it's basically very much like this, and I speak and wonderful things coming out of my mouth, and I don't know where they come from, and the teaching arises, and I can sense, and sometimes I know towards the end that it's a dream, and then in the dream, I think, oh, it would be nice to remember what I just said, but usually I don't, it is almost like in the deepest dreams, in some astral dimension, the teaching is actually happening, and then occasionally I have a surface dream, in which I enter a building to give a talk, and then things happen, for example, I can't find the entrance to the stage, and when I finally find it, then the audience is very restless, and they're moving about, and they're not even paying attention to me, and then other things go wrong, and so these dreams come from a disconnected, when the mind is disconnected, they arise, and when the mind is connected with source,

[Speaker 2] (6:54:27 - 6:54:30)
then this is what happens.

[Speaker 1] (6:54:56 - 9:19:47)
Welcome to our meditation, people all over the planet, at the same time now opening up to the spaciousness inside, in a space, that which is prior to thoughts, prior to emotions, prior to sense perceptions, always there, can be called stillness, presence, inner space, you just have to pay attention to it, and that attention already is it, attention to awareness, or awareness of awareness, in other words, you become conscious right now, of the fact that you are conscious, you can actually sense consciousness that you are beyond the person, completely non-conceptual, nothing to do with thinking, it's that which transcends the person, and that which transcends the world, without awareness of that, the world and the person are troublesome, and without awareness of that, the world will inspire fear, because it's not all that stable, continuous flux, especially at this time, even if we are not affected directly by upheavals that are happening, or have recently happened in different parts of the world, Japan, earthquake, tsunami, nuclear reactors, North Africa, upheavals, Middle East, even if we are not directly affected, we can get a heightened sense, just knowing that this is going on, we can get a heightened sense of the fact that the world is not all that safe, some people would say it's not safe anymore, it never was safe, of course, it never is safe, it cannot be, and it's not meant to be safe, it's the world of form, continuously changing, so whether it's your personal life, if you're clinging for security, there's nothing wrong with arranging your life so that externally you have a certain degree of security to the extent to which it is possible, but if you're looking to beyond the practical, if you're looking to the world of form, whether it is the structures around you, whether it's in your personal life, through relationship, or through your job, or through your life insurance, whether you look to that for a sense of inner peace, what is sometimes called peace of mind, or whether you look to the collective structures of your economy, social structures, whether you look to that for a sense of security, it cannot provide you with that for too long, so it's finding something within where a true sense of safety arises that has nothing to do with the externals of your life, personal or collective. Then if some kind of disaster comes, and of course, inevitably, some kind of disaster will come, because this body is going to die, that's a big disaster, sooner or later, and of course, other disasters may happen or may not happen, or small, small ways in which things around you dissolve, doesn't have to be a big disaster, it's often those collective disasters that can bring about a leap in awareness in many people who are personally affected by that. If that is your destiny, that's fine. It may not be your destiny to be affected by some collective disaster.

I am sitting here in California at the moment, probably on a fault line, so there is no absolute security that this chair that I'm sitting on and the floor the chair's on is still going to be here in 20 minutes' time before we finish. It probably will be, we can't be sure, or even that this body will still be alive in 20 minutes' time. Probably, we can't be sure.

Now it's for many people, it's the challenge of major or minor disaster in their lives that can push them into awakening. Without disaster, and I'm using this term now in a very wide sense, meaning any kind of dissolution of form around you, without that, consciousness would not even evolve. So although on one level, it is true to say that disaster, it is tragic, yes.

It's terrible, yes. True. On another level, that also is part of a much larger context, and that larger context is the evolution of consciousness here.

Consciousness, of course, is the formless essence within you. Not a personal possession. So somehow the fluctuation of forms is part of the way in which consciousness evolves here in this dimension and comes into this dimension more fully.

The dimension of time. The timeless coming into the dimension of time. There's a paradox here, but that's how it is.

The timeless within you coming into your personal life of time. That which is beyond the person, shining through the person. And that is security.

Because you can then sense beyond any conceptual explanations or beliefs, you can sense that which is timeless in you, which means eternal, which means indestructible, beyond death. It's not that consciousness, don't believe mainstream culture which tells you that consciousness is an epiphenomenon or a byproduct of brain activity. The brain is born out of consciousness, not the other way around.

There's a modicum of consciousness even in this chair or wherever you look, even inanimate, all around you. All the forms around you are consciousness having taken on a temporary form. Life, another word for it.

So there's life and there are forms of life. You move in that between the two. That's the balancing act, the dance of life between who you are in your essence, which you can sense at this very moment if this has any meaning to you.

You can sense at this very moment that which is beyond the person in you, which is just the light of consciousness. And you're also aware of you're still a person, the form. But the security, sense of security can never come from the forms.

That's always an illusory security if it's there. And illusory security is always threatened by an underlying fear. True security, true peace of mind, to use that expression, although it's not the mind.

And we do not need for disaster to happen in our lives to find that. And perhaps if we find that without a disaster, or because we've already had our disasters and it has taken us there, perhaps we don't need to experience further external disaster. But if we do, it'll just be a deepening.

It will result in a deepening. Please know that the words that are being spoken here are only moving on the surface. Underneath the words which you hear, which become concepts in your mind, underneath that is that to which the words point.

That which is beyond concepts, beyond words, the underlying deeper sense of beingness, which is consciousness itself. So as you sit here, as we sit here, as I sit here, I can sense that it's a little silly to quantify it, but I could say as I speak here, and this can also be true for you as you listen, 80% of my consciousness or maybe 90% is just an aware presence. And the remaining 20 or 10% is the mind formulating thoughts which become words.

But the mind that is formulating thoughts is inspired by that which is beyond thoughts. It's just giving expression, always very limited, to that which cannot be spoken, but can be sensed here and now. Some traditions may call it the higher self or whatever.

It doesn't, as long as higher doesn't mean that you, that concept could mislead you into thinking that it's floating up there. I'm looking for my higher self. So you're already looking somewhere else.

Maybe if your inner self would be a better, deeper self. Essential self, or don't call it a self at all as the Buddhists do, the no self, the empty space. Or call it the fullness.

The main thing is not to get attached to any concept, but just use it as a pointer. What's important is not the concept as an explanation, but that to which it points. That's why we're here.

And the strangest thoughts that always went through my mind when I was on my bicycle cycling in nature, and then I sometimes would get off my bike and just sit there, look around. And always I had this thought in my head which said, this will always be here. I already mentioned perceiving without labeling as a practice, a large sense perception.

Nature, especially natural things, and they're everywhere here. Nature is extremely helpful, especially in this, the world that we live in. For sanity, even not just here, where you go back into your everyday life, sanity can easily be found in nature if you go.

Because you can divide the world into the human-made world and the natural world. And some people live almost exclusively in the human-made world, especially if you live in a big city. But there is always, there's this vision that when I was a child, I was not happy a lot of the time when I was a child because of dysfunctional family background.

They couldn't help it. They were just in the grip of their ego. But when I was given a bicycle, I was able to leave the city and cycle to the outskirts where there was some nature.

And not magnificent nature, just ordinary trees and some fields and trees. And there I experienced my moments of happiness and relief in nature. And already there, I knew the difference between the human-made world that was a world of unhappiness for me, and the natural world, which was the world where I experienced a sense of freedom.

And the strangest thoughts that always went through my mind when I was on my bicycle cycling in nature, and then I sometimes would get off my bike and just sit there, look around. And always I had this thought in my head which said, this will always be here. This will always be here.

And I was only 10, 11, 12 years old, that this will always be here. This will always be here. Somehow, and I didn't even fully understand what this meant.

I could feel, but I realized later, this is nature and this is the man. And the human-made world is not actually going to last. The natural world is relative to the human-made world, is almost eternal.

And the planet has unbelievable ability for regeneration, which we may talk about some other time. So the humans will not destroy. They should do all they can to refrain from causing harm to the planet, obviously.

But even if they go totally insane and they don't manage, they will not be able to destroy. I will talk about it some other time. You don't need to believe me now.

So the practice then is another, tomorrow I will talk about relating to other humans here, which is another kind of practice, a bit more difficult than relating to nature. Because humans are difficult. And especially don't, as you go to sleep, make sure that the last thing that you are aware of before entering sleep, make sure that the last thing is not your device.

Or the TV is still running. A good practice is you lie in bed on your back and place attention into the body, the inner energy field of your body. So you feel the body, many times written, spoken about it as an important practice, inner body awareness.

What you're aware of is not the physical body, it's that which animates the physical body. And so it takes your attention away from thinking. It's a very easy, quick way of stopping your mind without exerting some willpower and saying, stop, stop, stop, that won't work anyway.

But there's attention into your body, abdomen, hands, feet, feel them from within. We'll do some practice tomorrow, perhaps, or you might do it with Kim also. Feel the liveness that pervades the physical body.

And from there, you gradually go to sleep. And it's a beautiful, completely different way of entering sleep. And if you wake at night with certain thoughts, fearful thoughts, or many people, I say, waking at night, oh, what's going to happen?

Nothing, this is the present moment and there's nothing happening. Yeah, but what's going, when I get back home, it's my life is just, it's all shambles, where am I, oh my God, where am I going to, there's nothing, there is no crisis now, this is the present moment, the present moment, and you're in bed, it's warm and comfortable. So go into the body, take attention away from that, and you can feel.

If you feel the inner body, there's no attention left for thinking, and it's usual, so whenever you have a sleepless night, you begin to be plagued by thoughts, direct your energy first, you start with the abdomen, breathe into it, for example, it rises, and you feel that as you breathe in, follow the attention with your breath, and the abdomen rises and falls, rises and falls, and then you feel the energy spreading out from there, or you can start with your hands until you get a sense of global aliveness pervading the body. Beautiful. And when you wake up, just one last thing, when you wake up and these thoughts begin to tell you how critical your life is, and fear, and then you say, okay, I'm going to go into the body, and then the thought that will arise most likely is no, I can't do it now.

No, this is not the time, I can't do it, I can't, I can't. Are you going to believe that thought or not? Because don't believe every thought that comes into your head.

So, and if the thought is I can't, yes, I can, look, I'm doing it. So don't get persuaded by a thought that tells you, no, you can't do it now. It's such an extraordinary, an extraordinary adventure, the consciousness, the awakening of higher consciousness in you.

It's just so amazing. And to be, and to then to experience, to become free of the personality so that you no longer feel you're trapped in it. Of course, you still have a history, it's fine.

You have a personal history, you have a life situation, everybody has a life situation, which is to do with relationships, it's to do with your work situation, your financial situation, your home situation, your health situation, all these things make up your life situation. Now, it's very rare that all these things are going absolutely fine for you. My health, wonderful.

My relationships, absolutely perfect. My work, career, great. Finances, great.

Every possessions, home, wonderful home. Children, all healthy and intelligent and great. Everything is great.

But it doesn't happen very often. And if it does, it doesn't last that long. You just have to wait a little.

And then somewhere things could break down here and there. You get challenged. Something happens that doesn't, isn't supposed to happen, says the mind.

You get challenged by life all the time. And that's good. That's how it's meant to be.

And you realize the world can't make you happy. Occasionally, you might think, oh yes, it can because I've just fallen in love with the most amazing, amazing person who is going to make me happy for the rest of my life. Oh dear.

That's a big thing to put on the person. A huge expectation. He or she is going to make me happy.

I know it. Okay. So it gives you a high, say that's finally life.

I don't need all that spiritual stuff anymore. I found the ideal partner. And then you wait a little after the wedding.

And very soon, sooner or later, usually sooner, you discover there are aspects to your partner's personality that you didn't know existed. Something must have gone dreadfully wrong. Did I marry the wrong person?

My God. All that happens is, of course, you experience the egoic, the particularly unconscious aspects of that personality, which every person has. Of course, some to a much greater degree than others, but every person has certain aspects that you experience that you will find irritating or unpleasant or upsetting.

In that sense, you will always marry the wrong person. If you're expecting them to make you happy, you're definitely going to marry the wrong person. So the real thing is the realization that the world, whether it's people or situations or achievements, the world does not have the capacity to make you happy because happiness arises from a deeper place within you, which is inseparable from the essence of who you are.

And I don't even use the word happiness to describe it because it's deeper than that. Happiness sounds a little superficial to me. Happiness sounds like, ah, so happy.

And then the next day you go, oh, no, it's like, oh, something good happens. And then, but there's something deeper. Let's be, I call it in one of the books, beyond happiness and unhappiness, this piece.

Happiness and unhappiness exist in the polarities of this world. Something good happens, of course you, yes, you're happy. Something bad happens.

If you're not connected with who you are in the essence of your being, something bad, so-called bad happens, a challenge in relationships, in work situation, financial situation, health situation, wherever, something happens can make you really, can be devastating, make you really, totally miserable. When you're connected with who you are beyond the personality, you will still experience a certain down when something bad happens. You'll experience an oh, but it doesn't go very deep, that oh, there's a depth to who you are that is not touched by the fluctuations in this dimension, and that is the peace, as Jesus called it, the peace that passes all understanding.

There is a depth to an essence that is ultimately untouched, but it's not in the sense that you're cut off from anything, but a core, a space in you that is timeless, and from there arises what is sometimes called inner peace. And then you can still experience fluctuations on the surface of your being, but there's a depth that's not affected by it. So you can cry and weep if a loved one dies.

Of course you're not, you will cry and weep. It will be sad, and yet you can sense a depth to you, and in that depth, you realize that which is beyond death. It's the essence of who you are, which is consciousness, and the person who passed away, the essence of that person is consciousness.

So reading this is an invitation, really, to join him in that state of consciousness, of that alert stillness or presence. And not only as you read or listen, when I read it to you, it may also help you to, as you go about your life, to pay more attention to the seemingly insignificant, the little things. You may find this yourself when you, as you become present, and you walk around, there's an acknowledgement of that extraordinariness of life, even in its seemingly most insignificant manifestations.

And in fact, you become more interested in those things than in the big things. Often Krishnamurti would wake up in the night, early hours of the morning or night, like four o'clock, 4.30, and suddenly would go into intense presence, and he would perceive whatever was there to be perceived in the intense alertness. And he could be for an hour without any thought, just totally still.

Here's a description of what happens when he's woken up by the cry of a bird in the middle of the night. It was long before dawn when the sharp cry of a bird woke up the night for an instant, and the light of that cry faded away. The light of that cry.

Oh, by the way, he never uses the word I once in the whole notebook. He sometimes says one instead of I, one felt hot, or sometimes he says you, you felt hot when he means I. It was long before dawn when the sharp cry of a bird woke up the night for an instant, and the light of that cry faded away.

And the trees remained dark, motionless, melting into the air. It was a soft, quiet night, endlessly alive. It was awake.

There was movement. There was a deep stirring with utter silence. Even the village next door, with its many dogs always barking, was quiet.

It was a strange stillness, terribly potent, destructively alive. It was so alive and still that you were afraid to move, so your body froze into immobility, and the brain, which had awakened with that sharp cry of the bird, had become still with heightened sensitivity. It was a brilliant night with the stars in a cloudless sky.

They seemed so close, and the Southern Cross was just over the trees, sparkling in the warm air. That was obviously in India somewhere. So reading this is an invitation, really, to join him in that state of consciousness, of that alert stillness or presence.

And not only as you read or listen, when I read it to you, it may also help you to, as you go about your life, to pay more attention to the seemingly insignificant, the little things, the miracle that's hiding in everything. A brief description here of the inner state that is the prerequisite for perceiving things in that always fresh, new way. What was necessary was a very sensitive, alert brain, he called it brain, you could say mind, you could say consciousness.

What was necessary was a very sensitive, alert brain which had stopped entirely, willingly, and easily its chatter. It had become very quiet, the brain, the mind. It had become very quiet, seeing and listening without interpreting, without classifying.

It was quiet, and there was no entity or necessity to make it quiet. The brain was very still and very alive. That immensity filled the night, and there was bliss.

And sometimes he perceived, not only describes his state of consciousness, it is as if his state of consciousness, he also experienced it as being outside. And then he uses the term when he suddenly says, the room suddenly was filled with, or the entire landscape suddenly became filled with, and he sometimes calls it the immensity, or he calls it the otherness, or he calls it the sacredness. This brief description here is probably in Switzerland.

In the morning, walking in the woods above the stream, with the sun on every tree, again it was there, that immensity, so unexpected, so still, that one walked through it, marveling. A single leaf was dancing rhythmically, and the rest of the abundant leaves were still. It was there, that love that's not within the scope of man's longing and measure.

It was there, and thought could blow it away, and a feeling could push it away. It was there, never to be conquered, never to be caught. And then he has second thoughts, he talks about the word to feel.

The word to feel is misleading. It's more than emotion, it's more than a sentiment, than an experience, than touch or smell. Though that word is apt to be misleading, it must be used to communicate, and especially so when we are talking of essence.

So he is struggling to find the right words to communicate that experience, and the word comes to him to feel, and then says, well, it's not quite right, but we have to use it. And so, and now here in this, suddenly the word essence comes to him, which he doesn't pick up again. It's here a couple of times, and then never uses it again.

But I love that, and I use that myself occasionally. He talks of the feel of essence is not through the brain, nor through some fancy. It's not experienceable as a shock above all.

It's not the word. You cannot experience it. To experience, there must be an experiencer, the observer.

Experiencing without the experiencer is quite another matter. It is in this state, in quotation marks, in which there's no experiencer, no observer, that there is that feeling, quotation marks. It is not intuition, which the observer interprets or follows blindly or with reason.

It is not the desire, longing transformed into intuition or the voice of God evoked by politicians and religious social reformers. To feel demands the austerity of clarity in which there's no confusion and conflict. The feeling of essence is the negation of thought.

We are becoming comfortable with stillness. When there's nothing much happening, what's left is the stillness or the space that's always there underneath and around what's happening, but usually obscured by what's happening. And what's happening includes, of course, the stream of thinking, not just external events.

And the arising of feelings, emotions. What's happening then is things arising, sense perceptions, all kinds of thoughts. And then the sense perceptions are perceived through the screen of thoughts.

It's normal. And mostly, these two, the external arising of sense perceptions, visual, auditory, and so on, things happening out there and things happening within, the continuous arising and subsiding of the stream of thinking and the emotions that often go with it, that together is what's happening. And what is usually considered, what you may usually consider to be your life, my life, is what's happening in my life, good or bad.

And of course, the good or the bad is already part of the arising of thinking that judges the external event as good or bad. I like, I dislike. And then you perceive the external through your likes and dislikes.

I want, I fear. And then thought forms, and then you perceive the external through your wants and fears. And all that becomes your life.

People don't realize that mechanism, the underlying structure of what they call my life. And so that is what absorbs most people's attention completely. Their thinking, emotions, and external things happening, demanding attention, they come together.

So is that all there is? Or is there another dimension to your so-called your life, my life? Is there another dimension to my life that is transcendent to what's happening?

What's arising? Well, you could say there's God, but for most people, God is another thought form. I believe in God, another thought form arising.

So we are here to find not some belief, but to go deeper where we can actually realize at first hand a dimension that is deeper than what's happening, what you call your life, that frees you from the limitations of your life because, you may have noticed, your life is full of limitations. Even if you're rich and famous, it has its full of limitations. Doesn't matter young or old.

The older you get, the more you realize, yes, there is a limitation of my lifespan. When you're younger, there are other limitations. And no matter where you go and what you encounter, you encounter new limitations.

Doesn't mean you shouldn't go out and try things. That's fine. It's all part of this dimension of the physical realm.

But a life that consists only of forms that arise, things that are happening in my mind or outside, an identity that is built out of those forms that arise is always limited and limiting. You're trapped in a self, a little self, and even the biggest self of the big ego, those out there who look big and powerful, they are trapped in the limitations of their self. And sooner or later, they realize it.

Well, some people, very late, just a few moments before they die. Very limited, trapped in a self. And so there's no ultimate satisfaction, no matter what you add to the self.

Doesn't mean you shouldn't add anything. But what every human being really is looking for is something very deep, an essence. Everybody's ultimately looking for themselves, something that is not subject to decay, loss, death.

And that, of course, is already there in you at this moment. Where is it? If you pay attention to the spaces between the words as you listen here, rather than just be interested in the words, because the words are what's happening, the words that you hear become thoughts in your mind.

It's what's happening. If you're only listening to the words, you encounter the limitations again. And the limitation here of these words is, what's he talking about?

He's not saying enough. He's not giving the initial answer. He's giving you information.

That's right. So if you only listen to the words, then there's no real depth to you being here, listening. There's only a surface phenomenon of sounds that are being perceived, become decoded by the brain and become thoughts.

But if you can listen or be aware of the spaces between the words, then something opens up that is deeper than what is happening here. So you have the surface event of what's happening here. We call it our live meditation is happening.

That's interesting. No, it isn't. It's not about interesting.

Because interesting is about what's going to happen next. Or look, oh, that's, sorry, this is not interesting. It's deeper than interesting.

So if you can be aware of the spaces between the words, something arises there that has nothing to do with what's happening. And that cannot be named easily. What it is that arises when you listen, are aware of the space.

Here, it's the space between words. It could also be called the space in which these words are being perceived. There must be a consciousness in which these words are being perceived.

And that is a dimension deeper than the world of fluctuating forms. And that is deeper than what you call my life. And that's why I call this life itself.

And what you usually call your life is your life situation with its limitations. And there's only one way to transcend the limitations so that you are not trapped in a little self, mind-made self, with its fears and desires and likes and dislikes. For the rest of your life, know nothing else but interacting with the world through your fears, desires, likes, and dislikes.

That's a very limited way of being here. But although a new consciousness is arising, and this is why we're here, this is still the fate of most humans on the planet. They have not encountered yet the transcendent dimension to their lives, which is who they are in their essence.

Transcendent, we call it transcendent because it transcends the world of form, physical forms or thought forms. And at this moment, if your mind is trying to figure out what that means, you become frustrated. Or you make it into some philosophy.

That's not it. Becoming aware of the spaces in your life. And we start here and now by becoming aware of the spaces between the thoughts, the words.

What is that? Nothing. Okay, from the point of view of the sense-perceived world and the world of thought, it is nothing because that space has no form.

It's just between the words there is an emptiness, but it's more than that. Any word we attach to it is not going to be right. It limits it again.

It is what the ancient Chinese scripture, Tao Te Ching, talks about. The Tao that can be named is not it. If you can name it, you've already reduced it.

So we're here to experience what that is with a few little hints, just to, the mind likes to just understand a little bit. So we can, we're here to give pointers, to say, okay, what is this? How do we, how are we able to realize this, not just as we sit here, but in everyday life?

First, we need to see the extreme importance of encountering that dimension in yourself, to have it in your life, so that your life becomes deeper than the things of your life. There's something not right, something is missing. It is not complete.

I am not complete. And then it formulates further thoughts on the basis of that original erroneous assumption. First of all, you have nature here, magnificent nature.

So you will be walking, you will be looking, you will be breathing and smelling, and you will be listening to the sounds, perhaps even touching the sand. There's plenty of it, a tree. So you use your senses, all your senses are there, and you, as you go about in between sessions, you interact with nature.

And that's a great opportunity for allowing nature to help you to become still and present, rather than giving in to the hypnotism of the mind with every thought wanting to draw your attention to it and saying, this is so important, I must think about this. And then you've disappeared. There's all that nature around you, but you are no longer there.

The sacredness of nature suddenly is no longer there for you because your consciousness has been absorbed again by the mind stream, very easy to happen. And most likely it will happen many times in the next few days here until the moment comes when you say, oops, this is what's going on. And then you have a choice of bringing your attention back to sense perceptions, alertness returns.

And you can, when you become familiar with the falling back into identification with the mind, and you might find that it says something that it's not happy with something, or something isn't quite enough, or there's something missing. I have that feeling, there's something. And then very quickly the mind interprets that feeling as ah, yes, that's what's wrong here.

Now I know. If you are familiar with the human mind, you may be, then you know one of the underlying patterns is that it continuously seems to say something not right, something is missing, it is not complete. I am not complete.

Something is needed here, something needs to be added to this moment, to this situation. And then it formulates further thoughts on the basis of that original erroneous assumption. Once you recognize that pattern, then you can, it is easier not to get drawn into it, at least not for too long.

So watch your mind as it becomes active, and then you have a choice of either allowing yourself to be drawn into proliferating mind streams, or you might even want to get away from here. It's quite a common phenomenon on retreats. A certain percentage of people after the second day, or even the first day, get me out of here.

Or you start looking up the flight information. Or you call a friend, oh, there's something not right here. I'll tell you about it.

So the opportunity is here for you to allow nature to bring you into that still awareness so that you can contemplate, experience, all that wonderful nature around you without undue interference by thinking. What is there to think about when you go for a walk on the beach here? Nothing.

You can only fully experience it when you become still, and then you perceive through the stillness rather than through conceptualized thought, which interprets everything you see. Oh, this is that, and that's that, and that's that. And I like, I don't like.

Mm, mm, mm, mm, mm, mm, mm. So that's, you use nature and come to your senses as the expression goes. You come to your senses, but that implies that there is an awareness there that makes clear, unobstructed sensory perception possible.

And then you, you're amazed how, at the sacredness of that space through which you move here. And sacredness is not something that I could explain to you or to your mind, because the human mind says, just a second, sacredness, what does that mean? You haven't explained that term.

And that would be extremely hard, impossible to explain. It's a term that is no longer much in use these days. Sacredness, that's a, holiness, even as the Germanic-based word, sacredness, the Latin-based word, is the same meaning.

But you can sense it. The moment your attention rises and you go, and there you see the branch of the tree moving slightly. And there you see a bird flying across and the waves.

And suddenly there's a totality of that experience. The main thing for our meditation tonight is becoming still, or rather noticing that the stillness is already in you, waiting to be discovered. So our session today probably is going to be a kind of transmission of stillness.

For the transmission to be received, it requires you to have access to a little bit of stillness inside you. And that little bit of stillness can receive the transmission, recognize itself, in the transmission, and then know itself more fully. If you can hear the ticking of the clock, that's of course, that signifies time.

And underneath and in between the ticking of the clock is the stillness, which signifies the timeless, timeless consciousness. That timeless consciousness is the essence of who you are. So as we sit here together, if it works for you, it means that the person is receding and presence is arising.

And there's a shift suddenly in identity. Your sense of self is no longer derived from the silly person. Every person is more or less silly with his judgments and all the mind stuff and the expectations and the shoulds and the shouldn'ts and the complaints and the regrets and the constant focus on future or past.

And it's resentments and grievances and anxieties and problems. God. God.

And there is another dimension of consciousness in you. That's far deeper than the person. The person is a surface movement of that consciousness, fleeting, insubstantial.

The ripples on the surface. And as the presence arises in you, you feel suddenly your connectedness with enormous power, energy, intelligence. And you're rooted in that.

It is who you are ultimately. And that's always there. And that is where fear ends.

Fear can only exist on the surface where the person lives. And the natural condition of the surface entity is fear, often disguised as other things. And the absence of fear really means that for the first time you can actually feel the deep trust.

Absence of fear means trust. So you can feel a deep trust in life. You are connected with, you are one with something vast.

And through you, it emanates into this world. And either directly without your mind, like here, now, this is an emanation of presence, but also it can flow into your mind and use your mind and inspire your thoughts and words. And actions.

Presence is felt or sensed with your entire body. Every cell of the body is alive with that presence. Can you be in that state of alert presence continuously?

Well, probably not, but it can be there in the background of your life, even while you are active, doing things, speaking, thinking, and yet you sense that spacious stillness in the background, in between two thoughts, and perhaps even while you're thinking. Then thinking happens in the foreground and that spacious, aware presence is in the background. This, for example, is happening here now when I speak.

The mind is being used and that's the foreground and there is in the background this wonderful, vast, spacious stillness. Even though you may be able to enter the presence here, you may still find in certain situations you lose it completely, that's okay. Afterwards, you realize you had lost it while you lose the presence, you don't know you're losing the presence, it just happens.

A reaction takes over. The habitual mind pattern takes over. The habitual mental-emotional reaction.

And some people have very deeply entrenched patterns in their mental-emotional field. And those patterns are an aspect of what the East calls karma. And some people carry quite a heavy burden of karma.

Usually, karma is interpreted as the things that happen to you in your life, the situation you're born into, parents, things that happen to you, the country, the energy field in which you grow up, all the relationships and so on and so on. That is an aspect of karma, but more fundamentally, karma is not what happens to you, but more fundamentally, karma is how you react to what happens to you, how you deal with situations and people and challenges. You can magnify the difficulties and the challenges through reactivity, so you have heavy karma.

Or you may have so-called good karma, in which case the conditioning of your mind is relatively okay, it will have its limitations. There may be some presence already. But the only thing that really transmutes karma is the arising of presence and it will transmute even deeply entrenched karmic patterns, reactions that you don't seem to be able to get rid of.

It happened again and again. But it may take time for the timeless to burn up karma may take a little bit of time, not as much time as it took for karma for those patterns to form thousands and thousands of years. And there's no reason why.

Those dysfunctional patterns that make your life difficult cannot be transmuted or burned up through presence in this lifetime. But you have to want presence, you have to choose presence. You have to want to be free.

You have to want peace within yourself and not think something is more important out there than the inner peace within me. And so the Course in Miracles says, I quote now, I want the peace of God. To say these words means nothing.

But to mean these words means everything. Nobody can mean these words and not be healed. End of quote.

And those of you who have deeply entrenched heavy karmic patterns will be forced to go deeper into presence. Presence needs to be more acute to burn up those patterns. So you're forced to go deeper into greater alertness.

Otherwise the patterns will not become transmuted. Some harmless patterns may always remain. Every human has a certain form.

There may be certain habit patterns that do not cause any problems. And they may well survive in the light of presence. Destructive patterns, destructive of yourself and others, problem making patterns, deeply negative patterns cannot survive in the light of presence.

But you need to choose presence as much as possible. And I'm saying this to you because there is enough presence in you to be able to choose presence. Without any presence, you cannot choose it.

So ultimately it is presence that chooses presence. For some reason, it has just come into my mind, perhaps because somebody desperately needs the answer to this. And it's connected to what we've been saying.

You are now, compared to years ago, you are now definitely more conscious than you were before. And it could be that in the past, when you were not conscious, you did things that you now recognize as not right, or you inflicted suffering on another being or other beings, and you can now see it. At the time, you didn't know what you were doing because you are not conscious enough to act differently.

Now, the fact that a person feels guilty means he or she can see something now that he or she could not see then. If you were still in the same consciousness, then you wouldn't be able to see that that was wrong. You'd say, you did the right thing by whatever, killing that person.

I did the right thing. But now you see, you have awakened, and then you can see a lot of your past as dysfunctional, unconscious action, inflicting suffering on yourself and others. Virtually every unconscious human inflicts suffering, both on themselves, without knowing it, and others.

They create their own misery, and they make others miserable. That's what unconscious humans do. And some to a greater degree than others.

So guilt can come up as you awaken and suddenly see how unconscious you were. That can bring up guilt and say, because the guilt says, I did that. The guilt uses the word I, but what does that mean?

What does it mean when you say I? What is that I? Who is I?

Is I the conditioning of your mental emotional conditioning or does I have a deeper meaning? Is who is I? When you think that your mental emotional conditioning is I, then you are deluded.

Your mental contortional conditioning is not I. It is the mental emotional conditioning in you. It is a false identity.

There is no real I there. The only true I is the I am. It's you, the essence of who you are is consciousness.

That is the I. I am that I am. That's even how God describes himself in probably one of the most profoundest lines in the Bible.

Somebody asked God, who are you? Or what's your name? I am that I am.

Because your deepest I am is the I am of the universe. It's not personal. Your deepest identity is the identity of God and of the universe.

This is the I am. That's the only true I. So when you confuse the unconsciousness of your past, which was only conditioning, which was a reflection of where humanity is at its present evolutionary stage, you reflected where humanity is in its present evolutionary stage.

That's all. You were a reflection of the evolving, or the unevolved, as yet unevolved human consciousness. That's all.

There is no I in there. It's not that I did that. The unconsciousness, human unconsciousness did that.

If you construct an I out of a human unconsciousness that you represented, that is an ego attempt to manufacture another mind-made identity for yourself because the ego loves to have a conceptual identity. The ego is conceptual identity in the head. That's me, I.

So, and the ego doesn't mind even if it's a very unhappy conceptual identity. It prefers that to having no conceptual identity because that's its end. So the ego will cling to the guilt and associate unconscious action in the past with identity, my identity.

And that's how the ego can survive for years. And it can torture you for years saying, I did that. And it's a terrible feeling that you did, that you can now see it as so wrong.

That was so wrong, but it's ultimately a delusion. Find the true I and then that will free you of that. And then you will naturally forgive yourself without needing to take an action and say, I must forgive myself.

That doesn't really work. In the same way that it does, this can also be applied to other humans. You can also do that to other humans, what you do to yourself when you see what they did.

And you can manufacture an identity out of their unconscious action also, and then say, this is who they are. This is who he is, who she is. It's not, it's unconsciousness playing itself out, human unconsciousness.

There is no ultimate identity there, but the mind likes to manufacture a conceptual identity, not only for yourself, but also for others. So the mind loves to get in there and say, these are those evil ones. And sometimes you do it to a whole group of people.

Those millions of this particular group of people, no matter what they are, they are, this is what they are and this is what they did. And this, that is who they are. No, it's human unconsciousness, that's all.

So very careful, the same process. And then you cannot forgive them because you've made an identity for them out of their unconsciousness and say that's, they are their unconsciousness. And then forgiveness will be very hard.

Okay, I have to try to forgive because I'm supposed to do that. I have to forgive them for what they did. They did such terrible things, but I have to forgive them.

Okay, I forgive you. Ah, it's not easy. It's easy.

That's. The real forgiveness happens when it's just, you realize that ultimately there's nothing to forgive and that's true forgiveness. There's nothing to forgive.

And forgiveness happens naturally in this way. Not as a conscious thing that you do, but a thing that happens by itself. It falls away.

The false identity that you inflicted on yourself or another human being or a group of human beings, that false conceptual identity falls away. And that is an essential part of being here as a conscious human being. A conscious human being does not have resentments anymore because what could you resent?

It's only if you manufacture a pseudo-identity that there's resentment. So all those things just, they fall away. And there's the flowering of consciousness.

All guidance, all true guidance, and all true knowing comes from the one, the source, presence then guides you. And you don't need, on some people's spiritual journey, for example, certain substances, you mentioned plant-based, you took on your spiritual journey. If it's done respectfully with reverence, then that can be a helpful thing temporarily, but ultimately you have to transcend that also so that you go directly.

But it can help show people what is possible and bring about a little spaciousness in their minds and temporarily put them in touch with a deeper dimension. But ultimately that is something also to be transcended and it's not right for everybody at all. If you're drawn to it, then it's right for you.

If you get too attached to it, it's no longer right. If it's something that you use on your journey, it's fine. And then you transcend that and presence then becomes your guide.

You don't need any external guide anymore. You just go directly to presence because any guide that you go to, that again is connected to the previous question, any guide that you go to, where do they get? If the knowledge or the wisdom that they transmit to you, where do they get it from?

Is it because they are more knowledgeable or are they more deeply connected to the one consciousness than you are? So ultimately all guidance, all true guidance and all true knowing comes from the one, the source is emanation from the source of all life. Consciousness itself is an emanation from the one source of life that is transcendent, that does not exist in space or time.

Like the sun, the sun emanates the light. The light is still connected to the sun. It's whether the sun, the light is in some way is still part of the sun.

Consciousness is emanates from the one transcendent source of all life, which has no location in space or time. It is transcendent. If God means anything, then that is what God means.

It's the transcendent source of all life that shines into this world, into this dimension as consciousness. So the consciousness in you is a ray of coming from source, so to speak. Like, so the consciousness you can sense in yourself emanates from God.

I don't use that word very often, so I have to do it with my hands. It emanates from the source of all life, like light emanates from the sun. This is why in some traditions, people speak of God realization.

And in some traditions, they even say things like, when they connect with a deep eye, they make statements like the mystics of Sufism, for example, they make statements like, when they have that connection, they say, I am God, I am God. And Sufis dance and so on. Well, they dance, not necessarily because they've already realized, but they may dance in order to shut off their minds.

And sometimes it works. They say, I am God. Of course, that's not favorably received by others.

And usually you get stones thrown at you if you say you're God, particularly in Islam, but even in Christianity used to be the case. If you said, I'm God, I mean, you wouldn't survive for very long in the Middle Ages. And it's true and it's not true that you are God.

Yes, of course, you're an inseparable part of the one in that sense, of course, you are God. But in the same way that as could a ray of sunlight say, I am the sun, yes and no. Of course it is an emanation of the sun, but compared to the ray of sunlight, the sun is inconceivably vast.

And so God or the source, you cannot even speak of you. There's no statement that you can make of God because one transcends everything, all polarities, everything. So you can't really say anything about it, but you can sense its emanation in you as you.

And in that sense, you are part of God, the divine. You are the consciousness that emanates from the source. And consciousness really, that's the realization.

And you don't, then after a while, you don't need anything as an intermediary to go there directly. So that is again partly connected to the previous question, whether it's a spirit guide or plant-based substances or whatever it may be. There may be a time and a place for it on a person's spiritual journey, but ultimately you transcend that and find that deep connectedness within you with the source.

And that becomes your guide and that is the unconditioned intelligence. So when you, again, thank you for your question. I'll just add, to know yourself as consciousness is the most amazing liberation of, it's not the liberation of the person, it's the liberation from the person because the person was a misperception of who you are, a false identity, a misperception of who you are.

The universe, this is our dimension here. The universe wants to become conscious and it expands. The consciousness of the universe grows, expands.

So there's gradually, you could say the light of the source gradually comes into this dimension more. So there's a growth of consciousness throughout the entire universe. And I'm sure it's on millions of planets, billions of planets.

Consciousness is growing in different forms, incarnating. So the consciousness, the most amazing thing about the universe is not the fact that there are billions of suns, stars, suns, in our galaxy alone, but there are billions of galaxies. Each galaxy is an entire world consisting of billions of stars.

It's completely inconceivable. And the vast spaces in between, completely inconceivable to the human mind. You know the speed of light.

It's in kilometers. It's a 300,000 per second, 300,000 kilometers per second. So the light, the reflected light from the moon takes about one second to reach us.

The light from the sun takes eight minutes to reach us. From here to the center of our galaxy, if I remember correctly, where there's a black hole, from where we are to the center of our Milky Way galaxy, light takes about 30,000 years. And that's only in our galaxy.

I believe the next neighboring galaxy is about 2 million light years or something like that. It's unlikely that we will travel there in a physical body in the near future, but there's something even more mysterious than that. And more miraculous than that.

The greatest mystery is not the vastness of it all or the multiplicity of star systems, but the greatest miracle is something that the universe is conscious. The universe is conscious. Why, how do I know that?

I know that because I'm conscious. You know that because you are conscious. You are the universe.

You are an inseparable part of the universe. You are an expression of the consciousness of the universe, the consciousness that underlies the physical manifestations that arise as it become more and more complex, the life forms that arise. There's one consciousness underneath it all that expresses itself and that you are that.

You are the consciousness of the universe. And that's the amazing mystery. The greatest mystery of the universe is it's conscious because you are conscious.

That's how you know it. And you can't argue with that because you cannot argue. And everything could be an illusion, but what is absolutely certain and beyond any doubt is that you are conscious.

Obviously, because you're here and you're perceiving. You may be dreaming. Maybe you're dreaming up this room and this man sitting on a chair.

That's possible, but it still means there's a consciousness. Otherwise the dream would not appear. It appears in the space of this consciousness.

So the one thing that's beyond any doubt in you is that you are conscious. I mean, even that is not absolutely correctly expressed because when I use language, duality creeps in. If I say you are conscious, that already creates a duality of you and conscious.

You are as if conscious were an attribute to who you are. But to put it more accurately, you are consciousness. The essence of who you are is consciousness.

And that is beyond doubt. Now, consciousness is invisible. Even the mental manifestation of consciousness as thought is invisible.

In fact, you are almost completely invisible, you as a human being. What you see is only the surface appearance of the physical body. Every thought exists, even thinking, which is a manifestation of consciousness, exists in an invisible realm.

You can open up, the surgeon can open up your brain. Hopefully he won't. He could open up your brain and look for a thought, a memory.

Your brain is, you have countless memories. Go back to your childhood. See the teacher you had at 10 years of age, either the one you liked or the one you didn't like.

Go there. See the teacher and you're sitting in the classroom, and there's the teacher. And then you're walking home and you're arriving, you're opening the front door, you're 10 years old, and you're walking into your living room.

Now, when I say this now, your memory can go there. And actually, yeah, you remember many, many details. You didn't even know it.

But where, what is that memory? Where was it stored? Was it, were there atoms and molecules that contain the image of your living room and your teacher you had when you were 10 years old?

Can a, could a surgeon ever find the memory of the living room in your head when you were 10 years old by using a powerful microscope? There's that thought, and there's that. We don't even know what a thought is.

We don't know how it lives in you. And scientists say everything is matter, that entire consciousness is a byproduct of matter, is a byproduct of the chemistry of the brain. And yet, when they look at the chemistry of the brain, they can't find a single thought, let alone the memory of your teacher, plus a million other memories.

How do they live in you? As atoms and molecules, or as chemical substances in a kind of soup in the brain? It's all invisible.

It does not exist in the material realm. And although there is a connection between consciousness and the physical brain, there's a connection, but it is a connection in the same way there's a connection between a radio receiver and the music that it plays, or a television. And so it's a medium through which consciousness can express itself in this world, but it's not produced, matter does not produce consciousness as much as possible.

Have the main focus of your attention in your daily life in the present moment. The rest of your attention, so that's the main focus, here's this. The rest of your attention is where you want to go to.

Whatever task you're engaged in has a certain purpose. The purpose is you want to finish the task, and it has achieved its purpose. And that's here.

And that's in your peripheral, the peripheral vision of your consciousness. That's where you want to get to. And this is what you're doing in order to get there.

And your main attention is not where you want to get. And in the meantime, you're just doing it in order to get there. You can see how that's already creates an inner stress.

I'm here, but I want to be there. That's a normal way of living, is the main part of people's attention is there, but in the meantime, they are here, where they don't really want to be. They'd rather be there, as shown in famous stickers on bumper stickers on cars, which say something like, I'd rather be fishing.

And when I visited Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher who has now passed away, he lived on Maui, on his car I saw a bumper sticker which said, I'd rather be here now. That's a good teaching on a bumper sticker. And so your attention is, and this is a reversal almost of how humans normally usually live, it's the opposite.

And that is in itself already a shift in consciousness. And then of course, you're also aware of the past, the certain things that may have relevance in the present. That's fine.

So peripherally, past and future, usually future is more important because you're moving towards that. And here's the central vision of present moment. In the present moment, you're either actively doing something, or you are more passively perceiving something.

You're there as an observer, or you're just there, not actively doing, but simply perceiving. That could be when you travel back from here already, you might be sitting in a car. If you're driving, you're doing something.

That's particularly important to be present. Or you might be sitting on a plane, and that's a good opportunity for being the, you're going to the witnessing mode. There's nothing in particular to do unless you get out your laptop and start doing.

That's fine. And sometimes situations arise that are problematic. That's quite normal in life.

They are challenging rather than problematic. And then you face the challenge. You look at it, so to speak, not necessarily visually, but you give it attention that this is a challenge.

Instead of unconscious reactivity, the challenge is your flight is canceled. Oh, it's not one of the greatest challenges a human can have, but some people react as if it were. And when any challenge arises, is there anything I can do to respond to this situation?

Or is that something where I simply have to say, well, for the time being, I accept the way it is because right now there's nothing I can do. I heard, for example, at some airports, they're so busy, not sufficiently staffed people. When the plane lands, they're still trapped on the plane for two or three hours.

It has happened in Toronto and other places. That's a good opportunity to surrender. Some people can't do that.

They start screaming and shouting. Doesn't have no particular purpose, but they can't help it. It happens to them.

So always the question was, is this an opportunity for surrender or is action called for? That is some practice to get used to until it becomes second nature to have your attention in the present moment rather than elsewhere. And it usually implies you are aware of your surroundings.

That's inseparable from being in the present through your senses. A more alert human being than a normal human being, but an alertness in which there is no tension, often alertness in a human is associated with being tense, but there's an alertness without tension, but it's not enough to be just aware of your sense perceptions. That's a good thing.

It also can help you to avoid dangerous situations that otherwise you just stumble into and you don't know how you got there. You're more alert of your surroundings. You see how animals in that sense are very alert because if they are not, they get eaten by other animals.

So many animals have this incredible alertness, not the same as the human alertness, but it is an alert awareness of their surroundings that many humans don't have. They walk in the street. They're not really there in their minds thinking about all kinds of things except where they are.

And so they're not here. Whereas the bird sitting on a branch or the deer that's stepping out of the forest and there's a field and the deer stops for a moment and the ears, they're very huge ears, they go. And it can hear probably a hundred times better than the human.

Or a bird on a branch sitting and it goes like this. And then suddenly it goes. And of course there's no decision-making involved when a bird suddenly flies off.

It did not think, I'm now going to fly off this branch and I'm going to go over there. It just happens. There's a flow to life.

There's no mind. There is a consciousness there, but there's no conceptualization at all. But when an animal rests, an animal also rests completely.

It is completely at rest, not thinking about my life. I have to figure something out. What's the purpose of it all?

This is why it can be very healing to live with an animal. Yes, it can be quite a bit of work too, but it can be very healing to live with an animal and to have an animal presence in the house, dog, cat, usually. This unproblematic existence, except when the dog or cat are neurotic, which can happen, but there are reasons for that.

You're usually connected to their early life, just like human childhood, when things go wrong in childhood, it leaves traces. So if, but usually dogs and cats' normal status, unless they're hungry or want to go for a walk, they can be rooted in being and joyful. The cat purrs, the dog's tail wags, and it's a joy just to see it.

You're not denying what you feel, but you're adding a dimension to it, the external dimension. And then nature has a very healing effect. If you truly give attention to nature, what about your practice of giving attention to the present moment?

Now, if you give attention to the present moment, you first, you become aware of whatever it is that you feel within. And then you need to be aware of within and without, that's part of the present moment, so that your attention is not completely absorbed by whatever it is that you feel, because there's also the vastness of the outside world. And so presence, to be present means to be present within and without, in both worlds.

So you acknowledge whatever it is you feel inside you at this moment, be also very vigilant to see whether there are any associated thoughts with that feeling. Is there, are there certain thoughts that go through your head that reflect what it is that you feel? For example, if you feel depressed, do you have thoughts that are telling you that life is, after all, not worth living, or whatever the thoughts are saying, that people are, people suck, life sucks, I suck, we all suck, I don't want to be here, that kind of thought.

So you need to observe, be aware on both, as far as the inside is concerned, be aware both on the level of the emotions and feelings and on the level of mind activity, what kind of thoughts, and so it requires vigilance so that you don't indulge without knowing it in unconscious thinking, and you can't separate the unconscious thinking and the feelings, so only you can know. I don't even know whether you can answer this question now because you have to find out in the moment of it happening what kind of mind activity accompanies those unpleasant feelings, and to see whether this mind activity actually feeds the unpleasantness that you feel, or the suffering that you feel, that's a very important thing. What role does your mind play in all this?

Very important. Is your mind feeding it? Because this is, you have a big pain body there, which is not in itself a bad thing because the pain body becomes a strong motivating force for you to awaken.

I also had a very heavy pain body. That's why I had to awaken, couldn't stand it anymore, and you at this point too, can't stand it anymore. That's good.

So be very careful so that you examine your thinking. Am I feeding the feeling? And if you are, that means there's enough awareness for you to realize it.

Then you let go of the thoughts. And one way you can do it by, you remember I just mentioned, be present within and without. You can use, for example, your sense perceptions, directing attention to your sense perceptions that takes attention away from thinking.

And then you experience, the next step would be, you still feel the unpleasantness, but you're also observing sensory perception around you. There's the sky, there's the flower, my hand, the hand. And you don't have to, I'm labeling it now, but you don't have to label it.

It's better not to label it, just to perceive it fully. Come to your senses, look around. There's an entire world there.

And your suffering ends here, where your skin is. What you, the suffering that you experience is inside you. Just one step next to you, there's no suffering.

Isn't that strange? So the table isn't suffering, I'm suffering. And this inch on the chair here is not suffering.

It's just inside my, this bag of skin, I am the suffering entity, that's me. And then if you don't know that, then you identify with that feeling. And then you look at this, then you call, and you still have the conditioned thinking that reflects the suffering and say, oh, it's all pointless.

The trees are pointless, the sky is pointless. What's the point of it all? I don't see any beauty in this.

And this flower is going to die soon, of course. It all, everything dies soon. So what's the point in even living?

When there's a dog, he doesn't look that healthy. Whatever it is, then you would just look at the world around you through the feelings. So to be present, you have to not label and just look.

And take in auditory, visual perception, breathing. So, and then, of course, and then you, if you give more attention to your surroundings, especially when you're in nature, but nature is everywhere. Even if you're in the middle of Seattle, there's a sky.

Well, it's usually at this time of year, it'll be gray, but that's fine too. There's sunlight filtering through the sky and you have lots of trees. Lots of trees.

The evergreen state, Washington, as it says on your license plate. So that's good, you have that. And that takes your attention away from, you're not denying what you feel, but you're adding a dimension to it, the external dimension.

And then nature has a very healing effect if you truly give attention to nature. And you're no longer fueling the suffering that you feel inside you. It's, of course, it doesn't go away immediately or a miracle could happen and it does, but usually not.

It's just the beginning of it gradually dissolving or becoming transmuted. Now, looking back retrospectively, what, if you even know the answer to this, what kind of mind activity accompanies the suffering that you feel in your body? What are the typical thoughts that go with that?

[Speaker 3] (9:19:48 - 9:20:05)
I guess it kind of depends on the situation. Obviously, it comes in kind of phases, but a lot of it is just kind of generalized self-loathing, I guess. I don't know if that's the right term, but.

[Speaker 1] (9:20:05 - 9:20:55)
Watch out for what kind of thoughts. It might even be helpful to write them down if they're repetitive thoughts. See what kind of repetitive thoughts you can catch because they can obscure your awareness so quickly, especially old thoughts that come again and again and again, they become part of your fictitious identity of the self, the egoic self.

So you carry with you then the burden of an unhappy self. I remember that, I had that too, carrying the burden of an unhappy self. That is, and that is what motivates you to awaken.

But there's already been a diminishment of your depression.

[Speaker 3] (9:20:56 - 9:20:57)

Absolutely, yeah.

[Speaker 1] (9:20:57 - 9:24:03)
So that's a good sign. That means presence is arising and it is gradually dissolving this pain body in you. But your work is not to renew the pain body through unconscious thinking.

So you need to be really alert and watch your mind so that you don't create more suffering by unconscious mind activity. And if you no longer feed the pain body, because that's, now the pain body, of course, also feeds through drama in relationships. It has the two ways of feeding.

In your case, perhaps more through your mind, but I don't know, could be also enacting and reenacting drama, emotional drama in relationships with a partner, family members, or whoever it may be, usually people you're close to or work with. But the closer, the better. The intimate partners are the best ways for the pain body to renew itself through.

So don't add to the pain body. It wants to feed, it wants your unconsciousness, but don't give it to the pain body. You're not feeding it with your mind anymore and you're not feeding it by being drawn into insane drama in relationships.

So you're watching it. There it is. It may not be pleasant, but it's not that bad.

Your presence is infinitely more powerful and it doesn't even fight the pain body. It just, by shining the light of awareness on it, it gradually dissipates, or a better way of putting it, it gets transmuted because the energy is not lost. There is enormous life energy in it, but it's trapped.

It's trapped energy, so it's felt as negative. When that's freed, it becomes part of presence. It is fuel for presence.

The pain body is fuel for presence. That's amazing. So you have plenty of fuel for presence.

That's the good news. What you sense in yourself as consciousness, the presence, emanates from the source of all life, which we can call God. So you are an emanation of God.

[Speaker 2] (9:24:07 - 9:24:16)
Go back to the source, conscious connection with source.

[Speaker 1] (9:24:19 - 9:32:24)
So the consciousness that pervades this universe, that is this universe, it becomes focalized through this particular form. This consciousness that you can know in yourself consciously as a presence, and you are that presence. You don't have it.

You don't have consciousness. You are consciousness. And even to say, I am conscious is not quite correct.

I am consciousness is more correct. So you are consciousness. Now, if the brain just is a transformer of consciousness, a receiver of consciousness, a channel of consciousness, where does this consciousness come from?

Where does it emanate from? And the consciousness does not exist in this dimension. That's important, very important to realize.

This dimension is the physical dimension. The physical dimension is where your physical body is and the physical objects of the senses. Then underneath the physical begins already that which is not part of the physical dimension.

And that already begins with your thoughts. Even your thoughts are not part of this physical dimension anymore. They live in another, they exist in another dimension.

And this is, you're going below the surface of, this is the surface world of physical things, your end, your physical body. You go by being aware of your thoughts already not part of the physical dimension. They are already exist in a deeper dimension.

How do we know that? Because you cannot find a thought in the physical realm. A surgeon could open your brain looking for your thoughts.

He would not be able to find a single thought because nobody knows what a thought is and where thought lives. Where does it live in you? Does every atom represent a thought?

Do some molecules represent the memory of what happened to you on that day when you were 10 years old and millions of other memories? Where do they live? All languages, I know apart from English, I know two other languages.

Well, they're getting a little rusty, but somewhere those two languages that I know they live somewhere, but where? Where do they live? At the moment, I'm not conscious of them.

If somebody had to say something in German or Spanish, suddenly something would come. I could say it, but where? Does this whole thing live?

If thought is, and then it's come emotionally again. Emotion, you cannot find. Emotion has certain, it correlates with certain physical processes just as thought does.

You can imagine something and then the body reacts to it. You imagine you're drinking lemon juice right now. Immediately saliva will start accumulating in your mouth because your body thinks it's real.

And if you get angry, your stomach lining, the inside will become red and many other things will happen in your body as you become angry. So, but the anger itself does not exist in the physical realm. It affects the physical, but it's in itself.

And then you go further down and into the unseen. So in other words, consciousness is not of this dimension. Consciousness represents another dimension, the transcendent dimension.

So this, the consciousness that you are emanates from another dimension and comes then into this. And an awakening happens. My suggestion to you is to consider the possibility.

This is my intuitive. Realization, I don't want to convince you that it is correct, but it is my intuitive realization. The consciousness emanates from the source of all life, which of course does not exist here.

It is, but it doesn't exist. Consciousness is the emanation of God in the same way that light is the emanation of the sun. Consciousness is the emanation of God into this dimension.

And it seems that gradually the light of consciousness flows, increases in this dimension, gradually. You can see it in yourself, how gradually you grow in consciousness. You seem to grow in consciousness and you are only a microcosm of the macrocosm.

Whatever happens in you can tell you a lot about the universe. If you could understand yourself, you could, you understand the universe. So consciousness comes into this dimension more and more.

Consciousness itself is timeless. And then it enters this dimension where there's time and there you experience it as an intensification of consciousness. You become more conscious.

A human can become more conscious. The entire planet gradually is becoming more conscious. If you go back millions and millions and millions of years, the life on the planet was less conscious than it is now.

Even animal life and plant life was less developed, less differentiated, less complex. Gradually, the world is being created still. The creation of the world is still happening.

The entire process, we have no idea why this is happening, what the purpose of it is. You cannot understand it conceptually. It's such a vast, vast process.

But all you need to know is what you sense in yourself as consciousness, the presence, emanates from the source of all life, which we can call God. So you are an emanation of God. And this is why sometimes this realization is called God realization.

God in you, God as you. Then the question arises, does that mean that you are God?

[Speaker 2] (9:32:28 - 9:32:43)
Well, yes and no. I wouldn't go so far because the ray of sunlight is an intrinsic part of the sun, undoubtedly.

[Speaker 1] (9:32:44 - 9:33:43)
But if the ray of sunlight could speak and the ray of sunlight said, I am the sun. Well, in one sense, yes. In another sense, no.

The sun is, the power of the sun is so infinite. How can a ray of sunlight compare itself? And yet it is one with the sun.

So there's a little paradox here. The essence of who you are is eternally connected to the essence of all life. You are an emanation of the one appearing as many.

That's wonderful to realize that. See, who you truly are, your home is there.

[Speaker 2] (9:33:43 - 9:33:45)
You are that.

[Speaker 1] (9:33:50 - 9:35:07)
And the sense of being a disconnected fragment in this universe, in a hostile universe, that disappears, that is a delusion. The delusion of the ego is that you are a disconnected fragment in a hostile universe. That's how egos perceive themselves.

And that illusion dissolves. And when, as you become more rooted in that presence that you are, this, the peace, a very powerful sense of peace is there then always in the background of your life. Because you have that sense of connectedness to the transcendent, to God.

That sense of connectedness to God, then that is the end of living in a state of fear. Fear, anxiety, et cetera, et cetera. That is the state of connectedness.

[Speaker 2] (9:35:09 - 9:35:12)
Ah, that means you're already home.

[Speaker 1] (9:35:16 - 9:35:37)
I always think that the famous ohm sound and the English word home are related. It's not by accident that they are so similar. I am home.

Home. Home.

[Speaker 2] (9:35:42 - 9:35:53)
So that is through self-transcendence, you realize the one self that you are an expression of.

[Speaker 1] (9:35:57 - 9:37:26)
And for many people, self-transcendence does not come until the dream of a separate self becomes unbearably difficult and painful. For many people, I'll repeat it, self-transcendence does not come until your so-called life gets very unpleasant and very difficult, and you experience all kinds of loss and limitation. And then something can happen that suddenly when the self becomes very unsatisfying and limiting and painful, then something opens up.

Then the self gives way, and you transcend it, and you realize the essence of who you are beyond the person, the being. But you don't have to wait for that. And many of you have already been through the painful, the experience of suffering, which is inseparable from considering yourself to be a separate entity.

[Speaker 2] (9:37:28 - 9:37:29)
Suffering. Suffering.

[Speaker 1] (9:37:29 - 9:37:49)
Suffering is that which leads you to awakening. That's a miracle. Ultimately, suffering is transcended, but it is not transcended until the self is transcended, the limited egoic self.

[Speaker 2] (9:37:50 - 9:38:02)
But until that happens, suffering is the most important thing in your life, the most indispensable thing in your life is suffering.

[Speaker 1] (9:38:09 - 9:38:42)
It's the way. Suffering is the way until it's not needed anymore, but it leads potentially to self-transcendence. When the self becomes too unpleasant, you can't stand it anymore.

The pain is too much. So that's, these are the, in the ancient teachings, that's the importance of suffering.

[Speaker 2] (9:38:44 - 9:38:52)
So when it happens in your life, welcome it.

[Speaker 1] (9:38:54 - 9:50:00)
Suffering happens when loss happens on whatever level, loss of possessions, loss of status, loss of certain physical abilities, loss of loved ones, et cetera, et cetera. That brings about a lot of suffering. Many other forms of suffering are only created by the human mind, like many forms of anxiety and fear created almost exclusively, but just by the mind.

Suffering, I teach suffering, said the Buddha, I teach suffering and the end of suffering. And the same message, symbolic form in Jesus on the cross is the archetypal image of suffering. Jesus is the archetypal human, represents every human.

And this is the image of ultimate suffering. This is a death on the cross and resurrection, self-transcendence. That's a beautiful teaching contained in an image, so people can intuitively understand it without having the ability to understand it conceptually.

Even a very simple person could intuitively get this message. So Ramana Maharshi, the great Indian sage who lived in the first half of the 20th century in India, said that the most important, the most effective criterion to judge your progress on the spiritual path is the degree of absence of thinking. That's pretty simple.

So this is your practice beyond any meditation, formal meditation practice that you may do is very helpful. But the spaciousness needs to become part of your everyday life. Your daily life needs to be interspersed with spaces.

And in every hour, there need to be spaces until a time comes when the spaciousness never leaves you. So you will be able to use your mind without always in the background sensing your own presence. I call it your own, although it's not your own because nothing is your own.

In the background, you sense your own presence, your spaciousness while you listen to someone. And even while you speak, not 100% of your consciousness is drawn into the mind stream that through which words are formulated. Because then you're lost, you're lost in the conditioned mind.

And you go, roll, roll, and the stream is coming out of your mouth and strengthened by the emotions behind it, because your thinking activates the emotional body. And then the emotional body participates in that outflow of stuff. And it's not, there's no wisdom in it.

You're just contributing to the problem. You might be discussing how to solve all problems, but then you get angry about this because people just cannot see the truth, but you know it, but they can't. So accessing that in daily life, and I've already given you a few little hints as to what good portals are to enter that state.

One I just mentioned, detect in yourself when you have a dysfunctional relationship with the present moment. And that could be quite a lot of times. A dysfunctional present means you dislike what is.

You hate what is. You criticize what is. You complain what is.

You complain about other people. You complain about those people there. You complain about my life.

Complain about my ex-wife. Complain about what they did to me. Complain about the, whatever the mind can, it loves complaining, but the body doesn't like it because when you complain, what do you feel?

It feels good to the ego because the ego strengthened itself when you complain about another person. The ego has enhanced itself because I'm now superior to this person or group of people that I'm complaining about. That's how it operates.

The ego feels superior when it can judge another negatively. Therefore, it compulsively judges other people, situations, places negatively. It loves that.

But if you are vigilant, you will see that it, that actually is not, the body doesn't feel good in the body. It feels good in the fictitious psychological entity that we call the ego. But if you could examine the physiological function in the body, you would feel it's the energy flow through the body becomes interrupted, decreases.

When you get angry, they've observed that your stomach lining becomes red and all kinds of secretions happen in negative states. So detect dysfunctional relationship. And when you find it in yourself in the moment, you say, oh, there it is.

At that moment, you have a choice. You can say, okay, I want to continue to be in this dysfunctional state. And then you carry on, but that's unlikely because dysfunctional state ultimately only survive as long as you're unconscious of them.

You do not recognize them as dysfunctional states. Then they survive. The moment you recognize a state as dysfunctional, then you realize you actually would be better off without it.

When you feel upset about having to wait somewhere for too long, and you suddenly discover you're upset and then you're vigilant again. You say, why am I upset? Because of this situation?

No, I'm upset because of what your mind is saying about this situation. That's an amazing realization, but you have to do it in the moment it happens. At first, perhaps the realization will come just after it happens.

And you look back on it and say, oh, that's what happened. It's amazing. There's so many situations in life that are upsetting what people say to you, but shouldn't have said or failed to say or do.

All kinds of things. And when you look closely, you see, it's the mental commentary that judges the situation, that causes the emotion, that causes the upset, not the situation in itself. When you've realized that situations are neutral, then you no longer have, you no longer personalize things.

And then this is in the ease of accepting the is-ness. You accept that humans are often unconscious. They often say things that come out of their unconscious state, and that's fine.

That's why they're at. So becoming friendly with the is-ness of this moment, if action is required, it will be more powerful when it comes out of presence, not out of resistance. And there will be wisdom in it, as Buddhists call it, right action, or skillful means or skillful action.

So you discover dysfunctional states. That's vital. Then you can become friendly with the present moment when the present moment is no longer obscured by the dysfunctional state of consciousness.

And you suddenly go, oh, well, that's what is. So is there anything I need to do now? Is there anything I can do?

Then you take action. If there's nothing I can do, then just acceptance. Welcome to our live meditation.

If you're still thinking while you're looking, I suggest you stop thinking.[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 19:03) now just like that is that possible yes when I talk about it it sounds as if you were doing something stopping thinking but really the thinking is a doing and when you stop thinking there's a letting go which is the cessation of doing so that you become aware of being that's why we're here that may sound a little dualistic when I say become aware of being more accurately I could say what arises when you stop thinking or when thinking subsides is the being awareness so it's not so dualistic anymore when I put it like that because there is no duality there except in language it's helpful to be here together and it's an opportunity for those of you who are not yet able to let go of thinking in daily life from time to time not continuously then here you may be able to get a taste of what it means not to think without going to sleep without becoming sleepy staying alert and being aware that you are alert being aware of the alertness that's still there when thinking subsides at first it may seem like nothingness nothing at all but as you stay with it you begin to notice there is a great depth to that seeming nothingness there's a depth there and an aliveness a presence that depth and that presence really is the essence of who you are which is not the person the person is a temporary apparition or phenomenon that arises in the world of form but who you really are is deeper than that temporary apparition in the world of form you need to know that not conceptually you need to know yourself as that if you don't you get completely lost in the world of form in the world of apparitions in the world of gain and loss up and down good and bad and that's ultimately not a pleasant way to live when you don't know your own depths that depth that connects you with a totality and with the source of all life that depth where are one with the source of all life most humans on the planet don't know their own depths there's a growing number of humans who are beginning to discover it or have discovered it or are beginning to live in a state of connectedness with it but most humans don't know themselves they don't know who they are they only know themselves as the body and their mental emotional conditioning which produces the egoic entity that they identify with as themselves enormous power is suddenly arising in you which is the power of the present moment which is the power of unconditioned consciousness also the power of dealing with the situation if there's something that you need to do suddenly right action as the Buddha calls it right action happens so be aware of the conceptualizing your life and allowing an unhappy story in your head to make you unhappy people think they are unhappy because of the circumstances of their lives in cases they are unhappy because of what they're telling themselves so what the mind is saying about what's going on around you and has happened will happen so that's a it's a suffering the origin of suffering to a large extent is there and even in extreme situations having lost your home for example not knowing where to live you even there it applies you do not in the face of a challenge if you are present you don't convert the challenge into suffering you just be with is and you start experimenting with little things in your life that cause you irritation or a little bit of anger or some impatience that situations that are very common every day and you look at the situation you become aware suddenly that this irritation arising or anger arising and you become aware that it doesn't actually feel very good and the body knows it doesn't feel good the body doesn't like it there's irritation arising and you think it's because of what's going on but if you look more closely think now is this situation causing this or is what I'm saying about it causing this what my mind the commentary of my mind and in most cases you will find it's the mental commentary that you had been identified with that causes the unhappiness and then you say let's experiment with removing the commentary how would I experience this situation if I did not add the mental baggage to it so in other words you're just now with the isness of this moment without any thing mental stuff added being added to it that says this should not be happening I don't want to be here and many other things suddenly you're fine a minute ago you were extremely irritated and angry and you couldn't differentiate between the circumstances external circumstance of your life and the inner commentary about the circumstances and this is the essence of unconsciousness I'm able to differentiate between the circumstances and the commentary so the circumstances and the commentary become single is experienced as a single phenomenon and then when you suddenly you can separate this is the isness of this moment and it is as it is enormous power is suddenly arising in you which is the power of the present moment which is the power of unconditioned consciousness also the power of dealing with the situation if there's something that you need to do suddenly right action as the Buddha calls it right action happens or non-action if action is not possible then right surrender happens but you allow this moment to be as it is without but what does it mean means you don't add unnecessary mental baggage to it that argues with the isness of this moment there are millions of people billions who go through life in that dysfunctional state of consciousness creating suffering for themselves and anybody who creates suffering for themselves create suffering for others around them you so you're spreading unhappiness and it's called normal life and it spreads it spreads imagine a country of millions of people living like that what is a collective state of consciousness of that country and what do you expect them every human is trapped in their personal ego and then the collective of the country develops a huge collective ego that's even more insane than the personal one crazy but it's so easy to step out of that except it's not nobody has told people that it's possible one not on a big scale not at school what I'm talking about here and now should be the primary subject at school for children how to live not the useless stuff they have to learn well they can add this too but that's fine but what is primary primary is how to live in a sane way I mean you have to learn how to drive before you can get a license they wouldn't let you go on in a car without having learned the basic of because you could cause a lot of havoc be a danger to yourself and others but living is infinitely more than driving and that of course implies also if you learn how to live you spread it to your children because you you can infect your children in a good way with your consciousness and you bring up your children in a conscious environment because you know how to live you still make mistakes yes you're not perfect but you know the basics of how not to live in a way that is insane and then your children grow up in that and they don't have to go through the enormous learning process that you had to go through when I had to go through too and that was the originally the basic of the ancient Greek philosophers the philosophy at that time or something totally different from what it is now basically yes it was also an early form of science but it was more fundamentally we're teaching how to live life to be applied in everyday life it's a beautiful summer day on the clock in the afternoon perfect temperature blue sky sunshine but as the Zen master would say of course temperature is always perfect

[Speaker 2] (19:03 - 19:27)
perfect which means you're okay with what it is which means there's nobody

[Speaker 1] (19:28 - 19:50)
boys inside you complain it should be different we were in Denver a few days ago it was pretty

[Speaker 2] (19:50 - 20:18)
hot there probably still is so I didn't go out too much I tend to lose physical energy

[Speaker 1] (20:18 - 20:50)
so my preference is also not very hot conditions but if they happen to be hot and it's just what is there's no in addition to the perhaps some physical discomfort there's no additional layer

[Speaker 2] (20:50 - 21:39)
of psychological suffering and it's easier to be in this state of spaciousness when you're

[Speaker 1] (21:39 - 22:19)
okay with what is because a lot of the unnecessary thinking that humans engage in unconsciously is connected with arguing with the isness of things internally or externally or externally can be either speaking it say get on your computer or social media

[Speaker 2] (22:20 - 22:49)
and you can complain there and that's good for the ego it's not a moment state of consciousness

[Speaker 1] (22:50 - 23:54)
to the state of unconsciousness it's a totally different thing changing things taking action or speaking out and there's an opportunity for change to happen or useless complaining so all that unnecessary thinking that goes into useless arguing with complaining the isness of things when that falls away that there's less compulsive

[Speaker 2] (23:54 - 26:13)
thinking significant percentage of compulsive thinking concerns that state of dissatisfaction that fuels the dissatisfaction with so you can experience that spaciousness that's there in the absence of compulsive thinking and that's why we're here we're here to deepen or to put it differently to discover the depths within ourselves which begins underneath the thinking our life meditation is an invitation to step out of thinking become still or rather discover the stillness that's already there underneath the thinking so we are in a meditative

[Speaker 1] (26:13 - 26:34)
state now even the words that i speak come out of stillness there's a lot of stillness

[Speaker 2] (26:34 - 27:53)
in between the words spaciousness it's important to be aware of that so in the gaps between the words as i speak you can discover that when you pay attention you become aware of those gaps you suddenly realize you're not thinking you're just aware and so you develop the amazing

[Speaker 1] (27:54 - 28:09)
ability to engage in thinking when it's needed step out of thinking

[Speaker 2] (28:10 - 30:24)
it's not needed right now there's a little bit of thinking because you hear what i'm saying and that becomes a thought in your head that's relatively little there's more spaciousness here so you can step in and out of thinking and then something else happens and you may discover that even when you are thinking or even you engaged in conversation which involves thought words thoughts even then there's still a part of you rooted in not thinking so you can use your mind without losing the stillness underneath

[Speaker 1] (30:30 - 30:41)
and then the nature of your thinking changes you don't you don't need to actually do it it

[Speaker 2] (30:41 - 31:46)
happens by itself thinking no longer has you in its grasp thinking is then no longer an energy field by which you are possessed no longer like a

[Speaker 1] (31:48 - 32:43)
parasite that sucks up all your consciousness and manufactures one thought after another so to speak and thinking then is no longer the place you look to for knowing who you are

[Speaker 2] (32:51 - 34:49)
for your sense of self your identity because you realize that who you are transcends thinking is far deeper than thinking and ultimately has nothing to do with your personality so the personality still operates in this world it's fine but in a more sane way because it's no longer the ego personality it's just the personality

[Speaker 1] (34:52 - 35:37)
the difference is when your personality your historical person is all you know when you're unaware of the depths within you the spaciousness the stillness the unconditioned consciousness then that is the ego personality personality is when the ego

[Speaker 2] (35:39 - 36:30)
it's all you know you're identified with it then the ego disappears when you know yourself as the spaciousness the formless consciousness but the personality is still there

[Speaker 1] (36:30 - 36:59)
so that form identity as i call it you still are able to operate as this form identity in fact function much better as a personality when you're rooted

[Speaker 2] (37:00 - 37:40)
in transcendence because that flows that emanates into the personality also so although the

[Speaker 1] (37:40 - 59:54)
you the person or personality are now connected with the essence identity personality being form identity spaciousness stillness awareness is essence identity essence identity then shines through the form identity and you become a more peaceful human being through that you no longer create suffering for yourself and others just not to say that others may suffer because of something that you do but you don't create it they create it for themselves for example there are some patterns in the mind that everybody inherits that even for advanced presence practitioners like yourselves can still reassert themselves because they are so normal by the way my definition of normal is insane as you probably know and you may be able to catch yourself many times during the day when this normal one of these normal patterns reasserts itself and of course one of the most prevalent patterns is the is reducing the the present moment to a means to an end it could be a simple thing like you get up in the morning and you're getting ready to go to work what how what is the quality of your doing during that time of getting ready to go out or here you got up this morning getting ready to have go to breakfast and then come here how do you experience that time are you able to be present in what you're doing or is the doing no more than a means to an end and that's a huge difference whether you this you fold your pajama after and put it on your bed is that do you give it attention is it a pleasant thing to do do you acknowledge the being of this pajama and feel the texture and give it some loving attention and then you put it away or is it what's the next thing and the next and the next because i need to get i need to the next moment never comes does it no i don't think it does because when the next moment comes it's the present moment so the next moment doesn't come it can never arrive there's only this moment but if your habit is to treat this moment most of the time as a means of getting to the next moment so not being fully in it but mentally being somewhere else and then i just need so the basic attitude is i just need to get this moment out of the way then i will get to a better one and that is a very deep-seated pattern that prevents you from being present but it's only when i voice it like this that it becomes apparent to you because otherwise you won't even see it because it's so normal to live in such a way and it's not only people also treat entire life periods in that way then it's not only of course most fundamentally the present moment but they also treat entire chunks of their life in that way for example you're waiting for the weekend so it's only two more days of going having to go to work and then there comes or you're waiting for something else getting a better job finding the person who is going to make me happy it's only in the meantime i'm just ticking over it's just i'm just waiting for well what's the expression i'm waiting for the big break or whatever i'm waiting for the big thing to happen and finally i can start living when that happens whatever form that takes when that happens then i'll then my life will really start this somehow i don't know if anybody remembers it's probably not popular anymore there used to be a genre in theater that was called the theater of the absurd Samuel Beckett and other authors and often they showed there was a famous play called Waiting for Godot and there are two men waiting for this guy to arrive with a nobody knows who Godot is but they spent the entire play it's a theater play the entire play this they're waiting Godot who knows some critics say well Godot God Godot they're waiting for God but it's not said but this entire the entire period is spent waiting and i don't think Godot ever arrives and they're similar and this is just to show the absurdity of ultimately everyday life and of course sometimes life does get better of course it doesn't if you are now living in unpleasant surroundings perhaps it's noisy or it's cold too cold or too warm or cramped or whatever it is you have might have a job that's repetitive you're waiting to get out of that feel lonely one relationship has come to an end the other another one hasn't started yet i'm just waiting and so you're hoping that things will get better and sometimes they do get better but the habit pattern is deeply ingrained and even if situation gets better then you'll be waiting for something else because no situation can ever completely satisfy you no person no condition no situation waiting for retirement i can maybe take early retirement and then what play golf lie on the beach and many people are very disappointed when they retire and don't know what to do with themselves and they lose their sense of identity that they it was always a false sense of identity because it is derived from their function but at least they had a false sense of identity and now they don't i don't have any and then to happen they can't they don't know the possibilities of human life so be vigilant if you feel that an improvement is highly desirable in your life situation that's okay but it's much more likely to happen if you give more attention to the present moment rather than trying to get away from the present moment or denying it always making it into a means to an end if you give if you give more your fuller more fullest attention to this moment the so-called future is much more likely to improve the so-called future because there is no future when it comes it's the present moment a little strange paradox different it's when you fully acknowledge the present moment and the when you give it attention then you see the good you're aware of the good in the present moment it's an amazing realization that who you essentially are is you're invisible the moment you move to thoughts what nobody knows scientists don't really know what what a thought is what is a thought where does it live in you where does it live in you that's an interesting thing the does it have a much now mainstream science is still still largely totally materialistic which means it says that matter is all that exists and everything is matter and it says that consciousness is a by-product or they say epiphenomenon other words a by-product of the human brain in some way this is a long one could talk about this for a long time i don't want to go this way and entertain you in that direction it is more important experiential to have i want this to be an experiential gathering rather than intellectual gathering but ask yourself the question what is a thought where does it live all your memories i suggest for example the memory of please go ahead the memory of your deceased grandmother for example or the memory of you when you were a child when you were a child you lived in a particular place maybe you had your own room and you can suddenly recollect many details for the room that you had when you were a child even how the doorknob felt when you opened the door the carpet the furniture and you can remember your grand grandmother or the first teacher when you first started school the teacher you had then and you can remember okay now you you haven't perhaps thought of your that first great teacher in several years but now that i mention it suddenly the he or she pops up where and in what form did this first teacher of yours or your grandmother or the memory of the room that you lived in when you were six years old and of course there are hundreds of thousands of memories like that but where did this live in you in what form was it must if it's molecules and atoms in your brain that somehow certain atoms represent your grandmother and other things represent other molecules represent other things the weird thing is if a surgeon opens up your brain he will not find any of your memories he will not find you that's a strange thing he cannot he find things but not you he cannot find because you you can you do not exist on a physical level ultimately only as a physical body but the the depths of you as who you are even who you are as a person which is still limited even that just the human you don't exist as in the physical realm really i don't know where you exist perhaps in the cloud the cloud that you and then you download the memory from the cloud so every thought is invisible but if can of course it uses the brain in order to express itself emotion to the emotion itself is not visible but it can manifest of course with physical symptoms in the body but in itself it's an energy field a non-physical energy field so the entire structure of the psychic structure of you is essentially invisible so this is why in the famous little book the little prince i think it was famous classic it says what is essential is invisible to the eye this eye which means it that means all the other senses too what is essential is not visible to the senses so you are essentially invisible you are not and i the way i see it if thought is already does not even exist in this dimension that so you are multi-dimensional you exist as a thought made entity but it's not no longer it's associated with a physical realm but it is not confined to the physical realm your thoughts are invisible your whole sense of who you are is invisible nobody could find it but by looking for you in the physical realm you're not there and that's it's an amazing realization that the who you essentially are is your you are invisible all the all the thoughts that go through your head they are not visible to the senses interesting so and that's only the surface part of you even there let's go back to the analogy of the ocean you have the ocean on the surface of the ocean there are waves and ripples now let's in this analogy let's say every little ripple or wave believes itself to be an independent entity disconnected from other ripples it only knows itself as a ripple because it doesn't know its own depth and every wave only knows itself as a wave wave could be perhaps vips if you own a private jet you're a wave and if you don't then you're a ripple so but the wave and ripple are all short-lived their destiny is the same the body one day the body is here the you're somebody the next day you're nobody whether you're a wave or ripple doesn't matter so now this this ripple of course feels uneasy on the surface of the ocean because its sense of identity is very limited and it feels sometimes threatened by other ripples or it wants to use other ripples to associate with in order to become a bigger ripple and sometimes temporarily that works but not for very long and then you're looking for yourself on the horizontal realm where can i be a more complete ripple can you help me be a more complete ripple no or i need you if we come together we can be a big ripple and it's never nothing really works in one moment the ripple goes to a talk in the and it hears this weird analogy and then says but who are you beyond the body of you as the person the the invisible you can you become aware of the invisible you which is the first of all it's the person that consists of thoughts and emotions but that's already a little bit beyond beyond the surface of the ocean you go a little bit into the ocean and there you exist as a person and there's all your emotions and your thoughts and your identity as a human there you are in already you've gone up you become aware of that and that's still very limited and then and that is sustained by the incessant thinking machine the conditioned mind is this it sustains the personal selfhood self identity that's amazing and so the key is to realizing go deeper and sense your connectedness with the ocean ocean in this analogy means consciousness universal consciousness that pervades the entire universe the intelligence that underlies all phenomenal existence the intelligence behind it all the organizing principle behind the arising of forms all forms a vast intelligence that exists does not exist as such but it gives rise to existence the vast intelligence is it is being it is not it doesn't exist because everything that exists exists in this dimension

um my question is how does one remain centered in stillness when we might be surrounded by and asked to engage uh mentally and emotionally with others who are not

[Speaker 1] (1:00:37 - 1:06:40)
i assume that this situation happens to you quite often because you're asking the question and of course it's a very common thing for people to find themselves in such situations let's assume then it's these are human beings that you you cannot easily or you don't want to to separate yourself from like could be family members or it could be people you work with those two situations are often situations where you feel you you want to continue to interact with these people or you have to interact with these people but it's getting difficult because you can there is toxicity or there's a lot of unconsciousness egos fighting against other egos and so on um let's just for a moment put aside the more extreme manifestations of such situations there are situations whether it's family members or at work there's there's some extreme situations that are so destructive and toxic that you the only um healthy and sane cause of action would be to remove yourself so if it's an extreme situation let's say you're in a relationship the relationship is sometimes via this physical violence or this repeated emotional violence that such an extreme situation or you are at work at the company that you work for is the environment the energy is so toxic and negative they're just going into that office you feel the weight of it and the pull of that negativity and this it's full of ego battling each other so in certain extreme situations i would recommend to that you remove yourself from this because i mentioned that at first because i want to put that aside we need to know extreme situations involving emotional violence physical violence whatever it may be uh it would you have to take responsibility and remove yourself from that situation but many situations and assume in your case perhaps it's it's not that extreme so what remains is normal human unconsciousness not the extreme forms of unconsciousness so to deal with normal human unconsciousness again uh be aware when you are interacting with people realize that you may not always succeed in doing this but the most important thing your see if you can bring about a shift in the way in which you approach the situation and these people the most important thing in such situations is your state of consciousness rather than whatever it is that they are talking about they may be talking about this or that whether it's at work or there may be gossiping or there may be whatever they're engaged in emotional ego stuff uh use it as an opportunity to stay present and it's not easy and you can only you need to intensify your presence when you are with unconscious people by that i mean when you are sitting alone in a room or you're walking out in nature it's it's being present is not that difficult you can it's especially nature is conducive to to presence or being alone in a room if you discover that you actually like sitting alone in a room that's a great thing because that means you you become comfortable with yourself uh there are still the majority of humans still become very uncomfortable with sitting alone in a room and you may discover that you actually like being alone not continuously you still love people but you also love being alone because when you're alone you can sense the presence that you are the very simple but powerful presence and you've sensed there's a stillness there it's lovely and then of course then you leave your room and then you meet other people you lose yourself you could because the the there's a gravitational pull that the mind has and so people know that they so other people's minds will try to draw you in uh i don't is it may i ask you before i carry on is it predominantly is it more a family situation in your case or is it a work situation or which one is it predominantly

[Speaker 8] (1:06:42 - 1:07:20)
um i would say thank you for asking um it is both and um both family and work occasionally uh are are issues or not issues but present themselves as as a challenge um what is an ongoing daily challenge is the unconsciousness of the city i'm surrounded in so you know by wednesday i that starts to peak and and become much more difficult

[Speaker 1] (1:07:20 - 1:07:28)
for me to stay out of my head becomes very noisy oh you can sense the you can sense the energy field

[Speaker 8] (1:07:28 - 1:07:44)
of the safety ah yeah right yes yes sunday is very pleasant wednesday thursday friday or not right right so but it's it's really you know that plus the more intense situations of work and family

[Speaker 1] (1:07:44 - 1:08:32)
which occasionally come in yes yes i need to ask one more question do you find yourself drawn into how when other people are ego uh controlled do you find yourself that emotionally mentally you be you you become just like them or do you feel you're a little bit of an outsider now that's observing what's going on or do are you a full participant temporarily in the unconscious interactions that are taking place the drama whatever it may be are you a full participant or are you a reluctant sometimes a reluctant participant or you remain there as almost an

[Speaker 8] (1:08:32 - 1:09:02)
outsider observing what's going on how is it for you i it oscillates um most of the time i am an outsider uh who enjoys engaging um i i suspect that my sensitivity to to presence and stillness is becoming is increasing or the sensitivity to that lack of in myself is increasing

[Speaker 2] (1:09:02 - 1:09:12)
does that answer your question yes yes let's thank you it's good yeah yeah

[Speaker 1] (1:09:13 - 1:15:56)
um let's talk for a moment about this the energy field of the city before we go on to your personal the um i don't know if you whether you meditate or not whether you do some formal meditation and and often you say yes the often people and people meditate and um um then some something just disturbing things happen while they meditate suddenly there's disturbing noise this morning i was sitting i was sitting in in my living room and it's wednesday so they do the gardening on wednesday with extremely noisy leaf blowers the this is the time of year with of leaf blowers and so the the noise can and i was just so it was so peaceful as i was sitting there and um suddenly there was this and often i immediately knew how to completely transcend it because i've been it's second nature to me now but often i have to tell people how to deal with disturbing things like that especially when they're trying to meditate and then that happens i always say incorporate whatever arises during this time when you're trying to meditate everything that arises make it part of your meditation in other words resist nothing that arises don't demand that anything that arises should not arise in that case even a disturbing noise such as a leaf blower is incorporated into your meditation by deep acceptance of what is the you don't resist you could you may be able to practice the same in the city when you feel the energy field let's i mean you you may be walking there or driving or just being in an apartment or office to practice surrender to this energy that you feel then you may be able to transcend that particular energy if you don't if you react to it it still you have it has you in its grip in a way one could say when you react to toxic energy you become part of the toxic energy without knowing it so the only the only way you can become free other than removing yourself and live in the countryside the the only way you can get beyond it is through deep surrender so completely and this can be a spiritual practice as i said except in the most extreme cases when there's violence of some kind or extraordinary toxicity then obviously you remove yourself otherwise surrender to something that seems unacceptable and yet and yet you surrender you're totally okay with it suddenly the toxic energy of the city but you no longer even call it toxic you just you can sense it and allow yourself to sense that and say oh that's what is and you might also then recognize it as an expression of human unconsciousness to some extent but also yes it's still a manifestation of life at a particular stage evolutionary stage and that's what it is you can then i i had that realization many many years ago when i went through shift in consciousness at the time i lived in london and i had to travel every morning to work on the subway which is called tube or underground they call it it has different lines and one is called at that time it was decades ago i don't know how it is now one was the one the line that i had to catch is called the northern line the northern line was always considered the worst of all tube lines because had the longest delays and the most totally cramped uh carriages that always you can never find a seat you had to push yourself in and then there were long gaps no trains people called it the misery line and i had to catch that line every morning after my shift in consciousness i still was the same i went in there and i felt completely at peace on the northern line which before was a source of great unhappiness uh felt completely at peace i couldn't quite understand why for a long time and later i realized uh i'm actually not complaining about anything anymore i'm not complaining about it it's just it is my mind wasn't saying anything about it anymore i could still feel feel that energy but it it was i allowed myself to feel that and by allowing myself to feel it there was transcendence so i have what i think is the

[Speaker 4] (1:15:56 - 1:18:54)
coolest story to tell you about how your work is manifesting in australia oh yes and then i have a question okay so the story is in this crazy country of ours we have a sport called the national rugby league are there any fans here see two we're mutually exclusive for five ten yes and um the the teams are made up of of their whole bunch of teams with ferocious names so there's the tigers the eels um the bulldogs um warriors like they're ferocious right but the one team that i had the privilege of working with and introducing your work to this season is a team that has been on a losing streak for 43 years oh and they are the bunnies they're rabbits so they're called the rabidos and um by some series of coincidences you know how it works some something just happens this happens and this happens and this happens and you end up working with 35 110 kilo guys six foot two muscles on muscles tattoos piercings crazy like just loveliest loveliest big athletes and you've got them sitting there in a semi-circle starting to watch their thoughts and at the end of the first session one one of the guys comes up to me and says oh what is all this stuff i don't have any thoughts what are you talking about and i'm like okay just just keep keep showing up it's going to be fine we'll you know just see what happens end of session three the same guy comes up and goes i saw my thoughts i saw my thoughts i'm like woohoo and and over the course of this season what was very interesting was the um that we were teaching them everything it was like eckhart distilled for football players and it was about being present and it was about forget forget that you just um missed a tackle you just let a try in that that the ref has just done too bad too bad ref calls that's the sort of stuff that you just don't want in a game that's the stuff that you resist and you say that shouldn't have happened and you start beating yourself up and you've got you can lose 10 minutes out of an 80 minute game by by going into that narrative and and so that what they learned was i have to drop the story now and i have to get back and play the best game that i can and i know how to play this game if i stop thinking so that's what they did and these guys aren't renowned for um for for from a lot of these skills they're not renowned for reading a lot but one of them i i love them don't get me wrong i love them one of them was reading um nelson mandela's long road to freedom and then another guy came up to me at the end of the session and said this is sounding really familiar i'm reading a book by this guy called eckhart toller and i'm like what really so it it just is amazing me how it's how it's showing up in in the world and we're in australia and that they happened to win after 43 years a month ago very good wonderful thank you so i think you could personally take credit for the rabbitos breaking the 43 year drought

[Speaker 1] (1:18:54 - 1:18:59)

okay i'll have to find out more about them absolutely and then my question the phone

[Speaker 4] (1:18:59 - 1:20:12)
started ringing a little bit after after a little bit the word got out that we'd worked with the and and the question is uh we've now been approached by a company and my business partner said to me think of the company that you would never ever ever want to work for and i ran through okay maybe tiny abbott's office or um the nuclear industry and and then he said no uh it's a tobacco company i i could just see my narrative going over my dead body are we going to work with the tobacco industry they are peddling misery and then on the other hand i'm like well i've got a mortgage to pay and so i'm i pose the question to you a cut um this awakening it's am i just meant to go with the flow and say and just show up and see what happens or or am i actually needing to choose consciously so i don't enable dysfunctional systems on the planet what work are you supposed to do with them it's the same work it's about um helping them deal with stress and um we call it mind training because that's what what works in the corporate sector that's what gets us in the door and um it's about helping them perform better under pressure and under stress so they will probably sell more cigarettes if we do our job well

[Speaker 1] (1:20:13 - 1:22:25)
or they may leave the company exactly that yeah only you of course can know whether this is the right thing for you to do or not but helping human beings to become more conscious must be a good thing no matter where they are and even if the initial the reason why they want you is to become more efficient at what they do they may not realize that you will take them beyond that so sometimes people take up meditation companies might send their employees to to meditate so that they can perform better but often it changes the people and sometimes they don't want to perform better anymore and they leave the company so only you can i never actually or very rarely tell people what to do except our young man a while ago so only you can know whether that feels right but one consideration i'll just repeat what i said is that helping any humans to become more conscious cannot be bad and if they if they think that you are there to help them become more efficient at what they do that's at least that brings them to you so let me know what you decide and who knows what happens to that company when you have finished with them so it'll be interesting to see thank you thank you very much i just want to finish by saying

[Speaker 4] (1:22:25 - 1:22:40)
the two things i most love about you are your facial expressions and that you laugh at your own jokes like your jokes are funny but it's even funnier that you'd like your jokes it's just so beautiful thank you so much thank you thank you

[Speaker 1] (1:22:50 - 1:31:57)
so this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation when i meditate extreme fear often arises in my mind i feel like i would be destroyed or completely disappear so i stop meditation because of the fear i'm so afraid to keep going on although i intuitively know that bearing the fear would get me closer to enlightenment how can i conquer this fear this is yes of course the fear of the person the personalized sense of self or the ego which can feel threatened by the arising awareness and once you know that you can still meditate and allow the fear to be there it's only when you try to run away from the fear that really it becomes a great obstacle but if you can be with the fear allow the fear to be there as on a pure energy level feel the fear then you will find it begins to dissolve so rather than not wanting to feel it allow yourself to feel it then this is the beginning of change if you always run away from it then it'll linger there's no change there's a book called i think feel the fear and do it anyway or something like that but that is a quite good advice although i mean not applied necessarily to everything i'm going to jump off now but to allow yourself to feel whatever feeling comes is part of the present the what the isness of the present moment so if the fear arises but then you also realize what is is the fear created by a thought you will know that or is the fear arising just by itself in a particular situation when you become still do you have a fear of silence do you feel uncomfortable when you go into a room and there's there's no noise in it some people do feel some people are uncomfortable in nature it's not noisy enough so see it may be that the fear arises when you when you become still you meditate then it's not necessarily associated with a thought but with that arising of awareness and instead of stopping your meditation just what happens if i just carry on and make the fear into a meditation meditate on the fear so when if you do meditate nothing really can disturb you but the good meditator incorporates whatever arises in the present moment into the meditation including the most irritating noise that suddenly starts up outside and the mind says i can't meditate now i need stillness and then you realize no perhaps this is part of the meditation and how does it become part of the meditation by allowing the isness of this moment which is that by just letting go of resistance allow whatever it is to be and if it comes from within fear anxiety you allow that to be but you have to be careful that it doesn't become a thought because the moment you are drawn back into thinking that's the end of your meditation you can allow a thought to be there but to order to allow a thought to be there that implies that there is some awareness there behind the thought so you are still there if so to be able it's a wonderful thing do you allow the thought to be that's very different from being drawn into the thought and following it where it wants to take you of course that's the end of your meditation or your mindfulness or whatever you want to call it i don't use mindfulness as you know because it's not about a full mind that's why i avoid the word mindfulness but mindfulness is a lovely thing it's really presence so you can follow a thought it takes it grabs you it grabs all your attention and pulls you along that's one way or you can realize there's a thought arising about what my ex-spouse did five years ago to me while i'm meditating and you can allow the thought to arise and be aware and if you do that instead of being pulled into it then you will find that it quickly it arises and it subsides so then it becomes very much like you know the sky in this one let's say you have a blue sky and clouds occasionally come so the clouds are the thoughts that arise in the mind the blue sky the vastness of that space is your awareness so clouds are not a problem if within the larger context of the aware presence they come and go and there might be thoughts that say ridiculous things there might be a thought about i'd like to eat uh uh apple pie now i really need to eat apple pie the microsoft most absurd things to interrupt your meditation then you imagine an apple pie you're eating and then you know there's the thought of apple pie you allow that to be you don't get drawn into the apple pie thought or even suddenly you have to get up and run to the fridge to see if there's an apple pie and still in there the thought arises you are the sky that's the awareness and the thought is what comes into the awareness now if more and more thoughts come or if you follow one of the cloud thoughts that drift into the space of awareness one of the cloud thoughts and you suddenly go it it grabs hold of you and you follow it then the cloud gets bigger then it attracts other clouds that correspond to it they suddenly come from out of nowhere and then you are in a big cloud you're still sitting there trying to meditate but you're really in a big cloud of thought and before you know it the entire sky is cloudy oh totally overcast now of course there's still some light shining through the clouds but you no longer know where that comes from there's some light of course consciousness thought cannot exist without consciousness thought is a manifestation of consciousness but so there's the consciousness that is behind the thoughts but you don't no longer know that consciousness directly only through the filter of thoughts in the same way that you don't know the sunlight anymore except through the filter of the clouds this is sarah from california

sarah please please join us and share your question with eckhart hello mr eckhart toy

[Speaker 2] (1:32:05 - 1:32:58)
hello sarah hello my question for you today is how do i as an awakening soul keep faith in manifesting global and personal love peace and harmony at this time when there's so much chaos corruption fear and a lot of hate actually and anger among the global population and among those close to me in other words how do i not fall into the darkness of fear and separation from my source from my essence and from separating from others and remembering that as you say not it is not personal it is not who they are how do i use conscious manifestation to achieve that thank you thank you thank you very much thank you to use the term manifestation in a wider sense one could say that you manifest the way in which you experience what you might call reality or your life you could call it your life could call it reality how do you experience it and to what extent are you dependent upon external conditions as far as your state of consciousness is concerned how much freedom do you have um can you live peacefully in a world that is to a large extent not peaceful and if that is possible how how do you do that how do you not get drawn into the conflict and anger egoic dysfunction of the world egoic both individually egoic and collectively egoic let's start by looking at to some extent it might be helpful as a starting point to differentiate between what would conventionally be called your life this is whatever in your daily experience of people people that you interact with whatever you do in this world work situation family situations meeting people here and there going from here to all your your private sphere there's that so you meet all kinds of people some familiar people some people that you meet briefly have interactions with in then you have in this technologically advanced society you have another well not everybody but most people i have another level of interaction with other people it also becomes part of what they call my life and that is interaction through technology you interact through social media with more people than you actually know this is the case with many people these days they interact with more people than they actually know in their non-normal everyday existence you interact with all kinds of people that you've never met not everybody but most these days because people use facebook and they use twitter and they use all kinds of things that sending message messages and so on um and on social media you also interact with people in a different way that you haven't so look at then the third level so we have actual personal contact people and whatever that what whatever the nature of this interact these interactions is it could be is it conflict ridden is it conflict ridden in your or is there some conflict but also a certain amount of harmony in your daily life then you look at the other level of social interactions through the media through um social media what kind of interactions do you have there with people that you might never have met but nevertheless you are in contact with them you exchange um what is what is the quality of that kind of interaction that you have how much conflict is there how much negativity is there and how much is there that is a manifestation of of consciousness um you have to look at that many people are there are people as you sure you know there are many especially younger people but others too there are many people in this world for whom the human interactions that they have through technology are more much more important than the actual interactions they have with with human beings they interact through social media with countless people and and they the the virtual world becomes to them more important than their actual surroundings it's an amazing thing um a i don't believe that is a very helpful thing but that's how it is it's a huge challenge so you have that level then you have another level where you come in contact with the world through what we might call mainstream media you get the news and you get commentaries and mostly these days the news and commentaries are mixed up either they come in one you can't just get the news anymore you then you already have the news already embedded in a commentary and you get a there's a also that the third level becomes also for many people almost more important than their daily existence with the people that they actually know and interact with sometimes of course those levels can meet for example you're in the news about people going into stores and not wearing their masks and then there's a lot of upheaval about that and people get worked up about this and very angry and you can then you can see little clips of people shouting at each other because somebody's not wearing a mask and then the other person is shouting something back and to some extent there can be that level and the person level can meet because 10 minutes later you go into the store and you might witness something similar but so well your experience of reality or your world consists of these levels so you have to look at these I think I can try to perceive those three levels not it's first of all it's important not to lose touch with the fact that level one where you have actual human interactions with people in your daily life which is relationships that you have people you work with people you meet casually but actual human interactions that really is the main part or should be the main part of your life should be that the actual living experience and so what I'm recommending is that you separate for see if you can separate those levels and look at the primordial level of your actual experience with human beings leaving aside for a moment social media and leaving aside watching the news every day and all the other things connected with the news whatever leave that aside for a moment it's important to see the difference so when you talk about negativity and destructiveness and or anger and antagonism and conflict everywhere first of all look at your your life your actual life does that apply there or to what extent does that apply there because that's an important part of your reality is your the reality that you create that you manifest in your personal life that is that is that is primary I would say is that sometimes of course the the reality that you see in the mainstream the media when you watch the news sometimes the two meet as I said before they can meet but so first of all take responsibility for you take it is you you need to take responsibility for your life here in on the level of personal interactions that's where it starts and that's where you you can do a lot of good and you can do harm too do you contribute there to human unconsciousness do you could or or do you contribute there to the awakening of humanity every encounter with another human being whether it's a person you've known for a long time family member spouse whatever it may be or whoever it may be every interaction with a true interaction not talking about social media every interaction with another human being is important what is the quality of your consciousness as you interact with actual human beings not not ciphers on the screen if they expressed an opinion and then you attack this actual human beings what what's the quality of your life on that level what is most likely happening right now we need to be aware of that it is true that though there is an increase in the collective at the present time of what we might call dysfunction or disorder or even chaos disruption we are entering or we have already entered collectively a time period of collective disorder or disruption or chaos there are time periods that they fluctuate there's always there it's true that the media the media actually is part of it they don't just report it they they be they amplify the disruption and the chaos unfortunately i'm not blaming anybody there some people say there's there's all some evil plan behind it all maybe there is who knows some conspiracy theories maybe one out of 10 conspiracy theories but actually be true but we don't even need to go there the the fact is that the mainstream media is part of part of the the disorder that's that is increasing disorder in this world and there my feeling is there's more to come so be spiritually prepared very important be spiritually prepared so that you do not become part of the disorder that's happening and increasingly i believe going to happen even more in this world we are moving the world always moves between order and chaos there are two polarities you should always strive for order that's important in your life in the world but realize the world for its evolutionary progress also needs chaos periods of chaos and disorder and out of chaos and disorder a new order develops and so there's a gradual evolution of consciousness when there is disorder there is a regressive movement and which means most people become relatively more unconscious and in the present time anybody who is not awakening even to some extent spiritually will be drawn into deeper unconsciousness because they become part of the collective movement towards disorder or chaos when structures dissolve and that is a challenge for humans now especially for you everybody i'm talking to and many others of course it is your challenge to stay conscious while this is happening so that you do not become contaminated by the collective negativity and unconsciousness it doesn't mean that you necessarily need to completely withdraw from the world you can still attempt as to the best of your abilities to create a better world if you have whatever your sphere of influence may be see if you can bring in more consciousness into whatever you do whoever you are in contact with be a bringer of consciousness you bring consciousness into an unconscious world without creating some mental conceptual image i am the bringer of consciousness then you're lost in ego again so but be prepared for increasing challenges in the collective do not be drawn into reactivity and do not be hypnotized by these events when you watch what's happening in the media and so on stay present what you're watching is an evolutionary story humanity is displaying probably entering a regressive period as they sometimes happen before there's a further awakening of consciousness we perhaps i'm not for sure but there's a good chance we're entering a regressive period which is perfectly fine it's what you're watching is the evolutionary growth of the human species and so they are manifesting whatever behavior corresponds to the particular stage in the evolution of humanity and the evolution is towards more consciousness that's that's for sure so if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you are in a state of lack of insufficiency of not enough and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack in order to transcend to go beyond your state of lack of neediness of not enough spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary focus on the realization of being it's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack which is ego go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person so here we have then fundamental at the most fundamental level abundance is being in touch with a source of life within yourself and recognizing it as the essence of who you are of course so the secret of life is to to be in touch with that within yourself and from that we could say state of connectedness with being look out onto the world and the first thing you see is abundance all around you because you're surrounded by millions of different life forms everywhere unfolding continuously unbelievable profusion of life everywhere whether you're out in the country natural world or whether you're in new york city or any city walking along fifth avenue and there too profusion of manifestations of life you don't even need to differentiate between natural you can actually enjoy all manifestations of life from the tree to the store display at tiffany's if you want it's just life you don't necessarily need to you don't at that stage you don't need to have anything because you're already enjoying all that and that is a wonderful feeling of abundance already but you have to be in the background there needs to be the connectedness so there is a certain powerful field of stillness as you walk around fifth avenue looking at everything you need to have a strong a stronger connection on fifth avenue than you need in the middle of the forest but it's not that you can't be then that place on fifth avenue you can so if you're walking out in the middle of a big city of course you get all kinds of your attention is pulled this way and that and the staying rooted in that field so that you're not dependent on your environment to feel peaceful if you're dependent on your environment to feel peaceful and oh oh i can't be peaceful here i need to go out somewhere else yes i i'm often mentioned of course that nature is helpful it is wonderful to go out to nature but if you are dependent on nature to become still and peaceful then your life becomes restricted and there is a lack of depth still you're dependent on a certain environment fine you can nature is you love nature that's beautiful you love being in nature it's wonderful but you are then dependent on that and you cannot take that state of aliveness into the city so it requires greater depth and intensity aliveness so that you can enjoy the aliveness everywhere wherever you are in all manifestations of life see them as temporary play the temporary play of forms because that's what it is there's nothing permanent here nothing permanent if you take a movie picture of fifth avenue let's just stay with fifth avenue it's that stands for all cities in all streets if you took a movie camera to fifth avenue and film all the people running around the street and then a few years later let's say 50 years you watch the film then most of the people running around fifth avenue will have disappeared already not only from fifth avenue but from the planet so you watch ultimately insubstantial life forms going about their business or their play they call it business but it is play and to them it's serious but it's not it's the play of life includes wall street if you know it's play it's fine but you can only know it's play through being connected to that which is deeper than the forms in yourself then you recognize the forms as the play of form but if you are not connected with the depths of being in yourself you don't recognize the movement of form as the play of forms because to you then that's all there is and then there comes a neediness i need these forms to make me happy and there comes a concern and seriousness about forms because that's all you seem to have so you get unduly anxious about the forms of life and everything is very serious so most people in big cities are serious going about their business and there's fear underlying the seriousness they're serious because they are ultimately in a state of concealed to themselves fear and they're trying to get somewhere they never get there but they always on the way somewhere very important to get this done they never get it done because they do this and there's something else lack of that's not abundance there can be no true feeling of abundance if you don't recognize the playful nature of the world if you are dependent for your sense of fullness on the forms there's no abundance you're just seeking more forms to fill your life up with so here we have then fundamental at the most fundamental level abundance is being in touch with the source of life within yourself and recognizing it as the essence of who you are of course and then look around and experience the sensory world and then you can participate in the play without completely losing yourself in it and enjoy the play of form and then you experience as you do that you experience another level of abundance that is the abundance of experiences of experiencing life in various ways through where you go what you do relationships sensory experience even and even there you don't get lost in it you can even enjoy food tastes good without the addictive enjoyment that is very different that goes i need more of this and then there's come you want to you need to take it in to more more more more drink another one sex need more and it draws you out of yes you where's the next the next sex object and it of course it draws you out of out there you can enjoy sensory experience without becoming addicted to sensory experience and that is to being able to enjoy sensory experience and whatever you do it's also abundance it's the part of the fullness of life and then it's possible that also things come into your life and then you can enjoy things also for what they are without getting worked up about owning them or fear of loss enjoy something beautiful why not but not obsessively accumulating one thing after another pointlessly but to to honor the world of things also is part of being here so as things come to you so you're not really you don't need to seek abundance for the sake of abundance you have to go to the place of abundance from there different levels of abundance manifest in your life they may include the outermost level things coming to you how can we measure our spiritual progress well one thing i mentioned earlier when we gave the example of arriving here and being told that no we have no reservation for you similar such situations are interesting situations that can reflect back to you what your level of consciousness is how you react or respond in such a situation and life is full of situations like that when something happens and you are you're not being honored or somebody hasn't respected you or is not giving you enough attention and something goes drastically wrong and how what what does that do to you and how do you how does it affect you that you can through self-observation you can often sometimes the observation can call me can only come in retrospectively sometimes in the moment you get so taken over by some reaction that you don't even know what's going on you're just on automatic that's the ego having taken over and sometimes after it has subsided you look back on the situation and you observe your reaction say hmm what if even better if somebody could have videoed you that would be extremely helpful if you could arrange with a person close to you to pick up the iphone and and put it on the on on video and film you when you're being unconscious and then when you're more conscious ask you are you ready to look at yourself but for the deepest answer to how can we measure our progress on the spiritual path I would like to refer you to the answer given by Bhagwan Sri Ramana Maharshi when he was asked the same question sometime in the 1950s how can we measure progress our progress on the spiritual path and his answer and that is the answer at the deepest level is the degree of absence of thinking is the measure for progress on the spiritual path that's clear enough if that's too complicated an answer I can probably simplify it it's how little you think how little you think shows you how far you are progressing or progressed on the spiritual path or how much you think shows you how little progress you have made that's a little drastic perhaps but unfortunately it's true so it's just that's so simple isn't it now again many of you are already able to step out of thinking and the the thoughtless state which is presence which is awareness awareness arises in your life already here and there spontaneously when you look at something new there's a moment of before you call it anything a new person you meet a new person for the first five seconds the mind hasn't had time to formulate an opinion about that person there's a moment of spaciousness that sometimes in that moment when people can an intuitive perception of the other person in the first moment but then the mind comes in and very often what the mind says is just an expression of its conditioning and very often it's not the other person you're saying something about yourself rather than the other person you're projecting in other words so measure for progress on this road path in other words is the degree of stillness in your life your inner space in daily life not how long you can sit in meditation but more importantly the stillness in everyday life can your life be interspersed with stillness so that you no longer have the density of the mind and the emotions but something else shining through the density the light that is who you truly are shines through the density that's spiritual that's the spiritual dimension as i mentioned before at some point there was a time when i woke up one morning and i felt at peace after being a tortured individual and a strange thing at night i woke up the next morning completely at peace what's going on and i didn't have an answer why it took me about two years to realize why i was at peace and to realize that i had to actually i wasn't a kind of spiritual search i didn't know exactly what i was searching for i went to see monks and all kinds of strange teachers and teachings i just wanted to check them all out until one monk said to me that uh zen monk said well zen is all about not thinking oh and i realized i was at peace because on that day the first morning i wasn't thinking that much anymore but i didn't know i wasn't thinking it much i experienced the state of not thinking as peace so i hadn't been able to interpret it as that was not thinking so you experience no no thought as simply a very peaceful energy arising but it could only arise because the density of the mind wasn't there anymore there was some thinking of course but not the not the continuous density very much less thinking how much less i don't know a lot less much more than 50 more much more 80 probably so that's a spontaneous thing why that happened who knows and later the understanding of it came two years later and then gradually the teaching over the years developed now people asked me well to you it just happened what are you expecting us to do about it it's not happening to us spontaneously but i know that from enormous amount of feedback i get from people that the teaching actually works for many many people it their life gets renewed because the old mind patterns are subsiding and the new consciousness is arising so although it may not happen in one moment that's fairly rare it is for most of you or all of you it is a the process i call it the awakening process when presence awakens it's a new birth you are newborn if the so many words have been misused so much that i don't want to use them anymore don't say newborn fear dissolves when you start doing what you fear instead of thinking about it as long as it doesn't kill you i have the decade this is both gone actually bits i have the decade-long experience that fear arises when i talk or should talk in front of many people in similar situations i cannot deprogram myself to accept this and speak what can i do the easiest thing is to sit in front of a group of people and talk about what you feel at this moment so you would say as i sit here my hands are wet come i can feel trembling there's a panic i can i'm sweating because i'm talking to you and the more you talk about what's actually there the more quickly you actually transcend it and you connect with people so the simple truth i'm so nervous okay it's okay to be nervous you begin to accept the way things are this is what it's not that i should i should be not just speak from your heart completely honest and open and then you connect with people and after a few minutes if you have something to say it'll come out of you if you have nothing to say then you better have a script to read i remember when i had my i was very much ego trapped in my 20s even talking in a room where there are four or five people discussing something i found it difficult it was to me almost like public speaking so i should i say something and often i didn't fear dissolves when you start doing what you fear instead of thinking about it as long as it doesn't kill you often the doing is the answer rather than the thinking about do and then see me i had a friend who came to see me regularly well somebody would come for spiritual advice and so one day he met a woman on the internet and then every week he came he told me the relationship was getting deeper and deeper and i said what relationship well he said well we are talking to each other on the and then beginning to talk even on the phone after a while it's not really i'm falling in love with this woman and i think about her all the time and i said you know you're not thinking about this woman you're thinking about her there's a mental image in your head of who that woman is so when and then he said yes but i'm married should i see her it's all i said go in you must meet her i'm not even talking to you about it anymore i said go and meet her and he did and that was the end of the relationship it ended after one minute and then i stopped seeing people individually all problems are really this perhaps a more obvious kind of mind-created problem but all problems are actually created by unconscious thinking all problems when that goes and you step out of compulsive unconscious thinking all you're left with is whatever is right now the situation that you either take action or you refrain from taking action some situations you need to take action other situations there's nothing i can do like right now so it's either one or the other neither is a problem action or refraining from action there's no problem if it's an emergency obviously it's action that's required others where action is possible action happens and if it's not nothing nothing i can do surrender accept let go be just present and even if it seems unacceptable then you have to go even deeper because some situations seem unacceptable they are just if you accept the unacceptable you go very deep unacceptable meaning the death of a loved one your own approaching death the loss of your precious car unacceptable then you need to go very really deep because that's that takes you into awakening and often doing isn't possible anymore when death approaches to still think in terms of doing is absurd as they still do in hospitals where they they give you potent drugs just so that you can live another two or three months and suffer or even six months or a year because death is unacceptable to the western mind still to a large extent and it believes you do until the very end you have to do something but they yes doing is fine but there comes a time when doing needs to be relinquished and that's beautiful and that's where real realization happens i envisage whether it will come through this form or through some of the forms here places where people learn how to die beautifully how they where they learn about old age so that it's not just something that where people are put away and just waiting for the unacceptable to happen while they watch television but true places of spirituality where they use the great opportunity that's there in old age as the body begins to dissolve a great opportunity for awakening the flowering of life it could be parents are often hypocritical they demand certain things from their children but they themselves don't do it so the state of consciousness that you are predominantly in at home is the main teaching and there's just been a book published on educate on parenting by susan stifelman and the title is uh parenting with presence okay that may be helpful i believe it's a good book and i wrote the foreword for it um there may be uh in a year or two another book on on parenting but this may already help you i recommend it um i wrote i write a little bit about parenting in the in the new earth but one could say much more that many volumes could be written about it i am perhaps not the most qualified person because i've never been a parent but uh but we talked about that i mean

[Speaker 1] (1:32:58 - 2:23:54)

we talk about this being challenged every day and staying in the presence and so on it is i think it is a very much challenging with children yes huge challenge yeah but a great opportunity to

[Speaker 2] (2:24:03 - 2:24:14)

[Speaker 1] (2:24:14 - 2:32:20)
to you um presence the main often there have been quite a few questions here also on the class written questions about um bringing up children consciously and what is the how what do what's the main main thing to do to bring up children consciously what what do we do the main thing is your own state of consciousness in the at home that's always your main teaching uh there's often a discrepancy between what parents teach their children verbally and how they behave at home and their state of consciousness and the children know that they can feel that that basically parents are often hypocritical they demand certain things from their children but they themselves don't do it so the state of consciousness that you are predominantly in at home is the main teaching so to be able to i mentioned in a new earth to be able to for example give your fullest attention to your child when you're listening to the child and not always equate attention with some kind of thing that they either should be doing or should not be doing that's how many parents relate to their children whenever they give attention they say don't do this or you should do should be doing that the entire home environment seems to consist of either stopping to do something or doing something that they are not doing and that's the only way attention flows out to the child so and that is not there's a lack of presence a lack of the acknowledgement of the being of the child there's the entire household is dominated by doing and in the doing which includes the mental doing and and the physical doing in the doing the being is completely neglected it's never acknowledged the the presence of the child is never fully acknowledged the child is not seen really by the parent and deep down the child can feel can sense that something essential is missing and that what arises then in the child is a a discomfort a sense of lack and even some anger sometimes towards the parent which often comes out when they reach teenage years for some inexplicable seemingly inexplicable reason the teenager becomes angry with the parent and they say what happened to this house can you turn into this monster and it is often the case now don't blame yourself but it's it's often the case that the for years the child's being felt unacknowledged and basically that means the child felt not seen by the parent and then that is almost to be deprived to be deprived of real lovingness which is attention and not the conditional love that is usually attached to the doing or the not doing and and that is missing and that's a vital thing that really brings about a lot of conflict between the child and the parent especially as they grow go into their teenage years can you be total can you be fully yourself can you be in your essence as much as possible when you relate to the child that includes periods when you're not talking about what he or she should be doing or should not be doing but just giving your fullest attention you look or you listen to what they have to say or you look or you're asking questions and then you listen and sometimes it may just be wordless attention too for brief moments just just looking and that is all that changes that brings in a different a different energy field into the home environment and that's the main teaching everything else is secondary what you say to the child and so on is all secondary although there are things you can say that are helpful too i have spoken a few times about the pain body in children when it begins to manifest uh to bring some attention to the child's pain body after it's happened some children have temper tantrums or go sulking and with withdraw and these are so children already experience pain body attacks some more acutely than others and so i recommend that after it has subsided perhaps the next day or a few hours later you say what did you feel when that what what was that that came up when you started screaming what did it feel like even perhaps in ask a child to draw a picture of what this thing is that it's the anger

it felt he's 14 what he's 14 14 yes i asked him to draw it this is mostly for younger children and because painting a picture of it creates some awareness and creates some space around it and and then the next time it comes up you can just it you it will you won't be able to stop it but you can say oh that is again isn't it listen so you're not trying to stop the pain body you're trying to help the child to become aware of it and you can start with that already when they're four years old five years old um so that's that is very helpful it's an amazing talent bringing up children and every parent makes mistakes that's inevitable but at least your son is lucky to have you because you are endeavoring to bring him up consciously and so and that's a new thing that's coming into there are more humans now who are actually been they may not always succeed but they are becoming conscious parents and that is a wonderful thing in my generation when i was a child conscious parent was unheard of nobody had conscious parents well at least nobody i knew all the parents were very unconscious totally dominated by ego they just the same upbringing that they experienced they inflicted on their children there was no no no change whatsoever and so conscious parent is something relatively recent although there may have been exceptions of course in the past too they're always exceptions i just never met them and certainly my parents were not conscious they were just as unconscious as everybody else trapped in their own ego and there was constant dysfunction and uh it was not a pleasant environment and there's nobody to blame that's that was the way they brought me up corresponded to their state of consciousness that's all so thank you that and then i will start

[Speaker 12] (2:32:21 - 2:32:23)
to stand on one leg

[Speaker 1] (2:32:23 - 2:38:03)
that may help too but it started when i was writing the a new earth and then i couldn't focus on anything else while i was writing and then things started to accumulate and now i still get all these manuscripts and books sent and some of them are taking up more and more space at my place so let's not go there well the anxiety about not taking care of the future is of course losing the present moment that's the real loss of the present moment but taking care of the future by doing some planning constructive planning even constructive thinking not useless thinking and worrying and uh toxic thinking in the middle of the night things what i should be doing or haven't done or if i do it might go wrong not that kind of totally useless thinking which is losing the present moment then there is the applied thinking which is oh i need to work out what i'm going to do whatever schedule for the next thing i'm going to do a plan for the next year when i will have to do this or that whatever and you may find that if you do focused thinking and apply it to whatever it is that you need to work out is not losing the present moment it's only useless thinking about the present moment that mentally projects you away from now and doesn't get you anywhere it detracts from the quality of life and detracts from your sense of aliveness so planning you can do in the present moment let's say i plan where am i going to go i'm going on a tour somewhere i was on a europe tour last late last year and that had to be planned almost a year in advance so already at the beginning of last year and before then we were already talking about the europe tour and so what then you look at the calendar cities geography of places where they connect all the other factors that you need to look at you're not really losing the present moment because you're not projecting yourself mentally over there and imagining how it's going to go or imagining that when you finally give that talk in london then you're really going to feel really fulfilled or projecting yourself to that talk in london when nobody's going to like what you're going to say and half the audience are going to leave am i going to be inspired when i reach london and to give a talk it's just losing the present these this kind of thinking happens it pretends to be useful and constructive but it's not at all and it's not taking responsibility for anything but applied thinking and for applied thinking it's good to give yourself a time limit a space you sit down for an hour or you talk to people and say what do we need to do here to in order to do this that that that you're not losing the present moment some people often this is not uncommon for people to have this question thinking that i must never think about the future but when you apply that you're not really thinking about the future you're doing the planning is now there's just you're not projecting yourself away from the present moment so it's applied and constructive thinking the same with the past sometimes you need to think about something that happened in the past you need your memory for certain things and then you need to kind of go back there in your mind and then you talk about well but there's a reason why you bring it into the present because you need that kind of memory or the knowledge you perhaps you learned something there at the past europe tour those and those things went very wrong the people had to line up for an hour and i was an hour late starting it was disorganized what did we do wrong that's fine you can you have to go there but but if you in the middle of the day you think you think how dreadful that was or you're blaming yourself or others about what went wrong then you lose yourself in the past so you can use past and future without losing yourself in them and then really you remain present even while you refer back to the past or while you make plans for the future

so that's really how it works is there a way that you can if you're happy you can trust the universe

[Speaker 1] (2:38:11 - 2:44:23)
that you're on the right path oh yes well that's that is an underlying thing is of course the sense of connectedness with the deeper level the deeper levels of your being the awareness the presence the stillness whatever you want to call it and that gives you a certain rootedness you're rooted in being and then what happens on the the outcome of things that you do is no longer the the factor that determines your state of consciousness so when you when things go wrong sometimes they do you're not devastated you don't oh you don't feel you're going to die because it went wrong and you did you didn't get there you tried so hard in the end it didn't work and it's it's so awful you beat yourself up mentally no that's a very dysfunctional and stuff creates a lot of suffering so you are less dependent on the you you welcome a good outcome of course but you're not dependent on a good outcome for feeling peaceful and really complete in yourself and that sense of completeness in yourself because there are two levels as you as you know that one could say the two dimensions you are the person but you are also the vast consciousness so there's the ripple there's the ocean the person lives in time and there's a development the person learns things gets better at certain things and so on that at the deepest level there is already that sense of completion you don't need to become anything when you are connected with the depths of who you are in that depth you don't need to become you are already complete on the level of the person you're never really complete and there are always things that are could be called imperfections not once when you're connected not huge things that create a lot of dysfunction in your life and make your life and other people's lives unhappy not that kind of thing but there are things that are certain personal things that are limitations on you can't be i have my place at the moment is untidy i'm not perfect there so there was a time when my place was tidy so i'm not an untidy person continuously but it started when i was writing the a new earth and then i couldn't focus on anything else while i was writing and then things started to accumulate and now i still get all these manuscripts and books sent and some of them are taking up more and more space at my place so let's not go there that's an imperfection on my part if somebody had an idea of somebody who's fully awake he must live in certain way and then he comes says how can you this is not tidy how do you live occasionally i have a cup of coffee one a day and occasionally people see me having a cup of coffee somewhere and say why do you need coffee you've written you've written all these spiritual books and now you still need coffee i don't know if i need it i just enjoy a cup of coffee and i drink a glass of wine or two occasionally with dinner you drink alcohol well if my state of conscience is so fragile that a glass of wine would upset it then what this can't be worth very much so the the addictiveness does not come in because the addictiveness would be something else if i were addicted to coffee and couldn't live without six cups of coffee a day some or if i were addicted to alcohol and couldn't know wouldn't know when to stop drinking there would be something else but you can enjoy things but people might interpret it as an imperfection and perhaps it is but become allow yourself to have your imperfections as long as they don't create suffering for others or yourself become comfortable with things where you are not perfect some people are habitually it's not a nice thing it's not my problem but they're habitually late some people just have that it's almost in their genes i had a filipino friend and i recently met her again after many years in london at university in cambridge and it must be in the filipino genes to be late all the time and apparently when i talked to her she said yes everybody's late nobody expects people to be on time and so and that maybe she may not be able to get rid of that because it's in her genes it says be late or you don't need to be on time or that and that's fine that's how they live it's not a problem in the philippines it might become a problem in the west but not to them to other people who might say there's something wrong with you no if some things can change and that's good and as consciousness awakens in you more the awareness arises it does tend to dissolve those patterns as i said that really f up your life

okay thank you

[Speaker 1] (2:44:55 - 2:57:22)
and that change in consciousness must there's only one place where it can happen and that's in you and that implies that you practice self-observation that is an essential part of the change in consciousness to practice self-observation is implies that there is enough presence or awareness in you from where you can self-observe and in almost all of you there is maybe not all the time but there is there is enough to have brought you here and that is quite a bit so is there enough presence in you so that you can self-observe your own motivations your own thought structures what are the habitual thoughts that i think so that you are not drawn continuously into every thought that comes and follow it where it wants to take you one little thought comes in about your life oh and then another thought and you follow it oh oh no and then before you know it your more thoughts come and then other conflicting thoughts and no no that's not how it is yes it is no no i can't take anymore and you believe in that thought too that you can't take anymore so the ability to to observe non-judgmentally what goes on inside you there is awareness there needs to be awareness so that is self knowledge self-knowledge means it's really not so much on knowing on a conceptual level what happened to you in the past and trying to understand the past the story of me i need to investigate the story of me there is a place for that in certain cases you may want to understand what happened how why you acted or your what your parents did to you and come to an understanding your limited understanding of that but ultimately the arising of the new consciousness is not is not a better conceptual understanding of anything it's not a better conceptual understanding of who you are it goes beyond any concept awareness in itself does not necessarily imply immediately that you understand more about yourself in fact as you become more aware in yourself you the need to understand my life and work it out diminishes and so the compulsion to also to understand every other human being that you meet immediately formulate certain judgments and conclusions about that other human being and the urge to immediately form judgment inclusion about any situation that you encounter and then this is how it is and then you have a narrative that develops in the mind and then you're telling yourself the narrative about who you are who they are and how it all is you've all met people like that and once you were like that yourself and just perhaps still occasionally that that comes back and you go it's good to act it out a bit because then you can recognize it that's not presence that's absence it's it's it's called absence the opposite of presence of course is absence that means you are not there you are not there all that's there pretending to be you is the egoic mind the conceptual mind and the mind says it's me and my life so what arises then is the awareness which means since as it arises it seems at first that you know less than before because you no longer compulsively immediately interpret everything conceptually every human being you encounter and your own life you don't compulsively that compulsion the compulsion to judge continuously isn't there and so it seems at first and the the egoic mind will may come in and say oh wait a minute you don't know what's going on anymore if you don't if you don't judge it you don't you who knows who that person is if you don't judge it he he could be your enemy he could be or to deceive you you better be careful you need to judge but then no you don't and so I understood when I was reading Plato the Plato's works as you may know I don't know how many people these days read Plato but uh he reports in his works the what Socrates taught how faithfully he recorded what Socrates taught we don't know but one certain things seem to be because Socrates never wrote anything certain things however seem genuine and there's especially one statement that Socrates made that's often repeated by Plato and that is this when somebody went to the oracle at Delphi in ancient Greece and the oracle said who is the wisest man on the planet or in the world the oracle said Socrates is the wisest okay they heard this then they they went to Athens where Socrates was and that oh oh listen the uh the um oracle at Delphi said you are the wisest all men why is that and Socrates said I am the wisest because I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing on another occasion he said uh I'm wise because I know that I know nothing and then people later they read it over the centuries and most people interpret it as kind of a feigned modesty and they say of course he knows what does it he knows a lot but he just says it it's it's a feigned modesty it's a in other words it's ego but that's not how it is it describes a state of consciousness out of which his enormously creative teaching his deep insights arose it is it describes the very foundation of the state of of what of what ultimately is the state of spacious awareness or presence and that state is one of actually cessation of mind activity without loss of consciousness so every of the so-called dialogues of Socrates and the way it's reported by Plato is not absolutely correct because I know exactly maybe I was there I don't know but I know how Socrates always started the he started the his blood his Socratic dialogues with just not knowing and then he begins to ask questions and through questions the knowing gradually arises he does not start with already accumulated knowledge so it starts from the he was comfortable with the state of not knowing in other words he was rooted in the state of pure awareness pure awareness in your pure awareness conceptually of course you don't know anything when when your mind stops for example now if I I stop speaking now and use and you can you're still here too we can do it together I stopped speaking for a few seconds and as I stopped speaking do you need to fill that space between me stopping to speak and starting to speak again do you need to fill that space with thought or are you able to simply be present in that space in other words are you able to just simply be don't suppress thought it doesn't work you can't you can't hold your breath and say I must not think that might work but but then thinking will come even up up even more strongly once you start breathing again so it's not that you cannot you can't hold down thought it's a pure shift into a more alert state of consciousness alert alert means okay now acting out alertness now I'm not just acting it out when I look at you in this weird way I'm not thinking and when you look at me looking at you in this weird way you also could experiment with that and see whether as I stop speaking now for 10 seconds you can just be in that space of pure awareness where you take in sense perceptions against the background of awareness and you might notice that in that space you don't know anything you don't even know your name because your name is a thought you don't know anything in that space and yet you are there conscious present without any movement in the mind

[Speaker 3] (2:57:41 - 2:57:51)
we have Celia joining us from Portugal. Celia welcome and please go ahead and share your question with Eckhart.

[Speaker 9] (2:57:52 - 2:58:01)
Hello thank you for having me it's an honor Eckhart you have shined such a light on my path thank you so much.

[Speaker 1] (2:58:02 - 2:58:03)
Thank you thank you very much

[Speaker 9] (2:58:04 - 2:58:49)
uh so my question is if I'm honest what I really want to manifest is a of a spiritual nature and I find this is the same for many on this path but these spiritual intentions are not so easy to simulate in terms of feeling like we have already received or to visualize can you address how manifestation can be applied to spiritual yearnings or is manifestation only to be applied to practical purposes while we work on our spiritual practice?

[Speaker 1] (2:58:50 - 3:31:38)
Thank you thank you good question one important thing to be aware of is that you don't make the mistake of regarding spiritual realization or being enlightened or being egoless or being in permanent conscious connectedness with source whatever you want to call it not to regard that as a state to be achieved it's very easy to fall into that error of wanting to become fully awakened for example and then you might say this is part of the question uh is there something I can do perhaps to manifest this awakened version of myself so if you have this intention or this image in your mind you want to arrive at a fully awakened state whatever else you want to call it that will become a great obstacle because spiritual awakening or the ego state or whatever it is cannot be achieved in the future you would be creating an image that you then pursue wanting to reach or achieve and you won't achieve it as long as you have an image of yourself that you want to achieve you're striving towards that in other words you make it into a goal like everything else things that you want to achieve in this world but the one thing that you will not achieve by making it into a goal is this state of awakening or being fully yourself is another way of putting it being realizing the essence of who you are so you would be striving away from the only place where it is accessible to you and that's in the vertical dimension of the present moment so for everything else manifestation practices can be helpful but not for realizing who you are because there's no you don't achieve anything you don't attain anything by spiritual awakening that's it's not an achievement it's not an attainment it's a realization that means it's already here so if you look to the future for it you miss the fact that it's already here and you don't realize that that's the place where you haven't been looking because there is if you're looking to the future and this is why i'm saying it becomes a great obstacle if you look to the future for enlightenment fulfillment whatever it may be that becomes the obstacle and you won't get your phone you won't find it and you will be striving even you might be engaged in arduous spiritual practices very determined to awaken but you have in your mind a future goal that you want to achieve without you might not call it that but underlying it underlying your practice is this assumption of arriving at a at a future goal and that is because is the greatest obstacle to that realization because what is future future is basically inseparable from thought because the future exists only in your mind as a thought form if any i'll be very happy to listen to anybody who wants to prove me wrong because then he would probably would come to me and say here's a future i have discovered it so far nobody has come to me and said here's the future you are wrong the future is more than just a thought form and i don't think anybody will come so now that means if you're looking to the future you have a thought form that you are pursuing of yourself as the fully awakened one or whatever term you use so you are pursuing a thought form in the future which the inseparable future and thought and then you reach the end of this incarnation and you become frustrated because you haven't found it why not because the thought form or the future the future self prevented you from discovering what's already here discovering who or what you already are so it's a complete it's a reversal of normal practice is yes you need time for everything in this world in order to do this any action unfolds in time for anything you pursue you want to acquire something achieve something become good at something all these things require time yes but the one thing that does not only not require time but the one thing to which time is the obstacle is that self-realization for everything else you need time and that's fine but to find yourself you don't need time that is a an amazing realization the buddha also had to learn that he didn't know that when he started off when the buddha started off he realized the unsatisfactory nature of normal human existence he saw there's so much suffering and then you die so he saw the unsatisfactory and said there must be a transcendent dimension there must be something beyond so for many years he practiced seeking to find enlightenment transcendence and he practiced the most arduous disciplines with great teachers he almost killed himself with the physical spiritual practice and after several years of spiritual practice he still hadn't wasn't any further to his goal of enlightenment and then he said well i've had enough of that that by the way is not a literal literal quote from the scriptures this is my free translation he said i've had enough and he stopped his spiritual practice and he sat under a tree and then that was the big moment he sat under a tree and suddenly the realization happened enlightenment what does that mean all doing came to a stop he realized through the doing he cannot achieve being being needs to be discovered but not achieved so no matter what he did he didn't achieve it because you cannot achieve it you cannot achieve enlightenment you can discover it it's already here and when he sat under the tree all doing came to a stop all future came to a halt there was no more future all seeking stopped seeking for an enlightened version of myself basically that stopped and and then it happened the the realization came to him and that was the moment of enlightenment so there's a deep lesson in that now of course some people say that the buddha's search through spiritual practice was unnecessary you could say that if he had realized before he started his arduous spiritual practice if he had realized that that was unnecessary not only unnecessary that it was ultimately misleading then he could have sat under the tree immediately okay that's an interesting uh perspective on it but one could also say that he needed to go through that in order to realize the futility of it um and then give up the the surrender only happened as a result of the being frustrated with spiritual practice so who knows whether one could say it wasn't necessary at all or he had to go through it i have a way of putting this and that is the question is my answer to the question do you need time for spiritual realization do you need time to wake up spiritually and my answer is you need time until you realize that you don't need time so you come to a point of but the vertical dimension suddenly opens up so one cannot really start some spiritual teachers do that they tell people there's nothing you can do there's nothing you need to do about waking up you either wake up or not or discover who you are very often it's not very helpful uh it doesn't leave people and so i i think the the doing it's helpful to to do to want to achieve this or that you every human being needs to arrive at a point where the doing is realized as ultimately not leading to the ultimate goal or realization but you may have to become frustrated several times quite a few times before you realize that no amount of doing will ultimately lead to the realization of who you are in fact the doing is is the obstacle but sometimes you need to go through that state of doing to fully realize that so the to project a to pursue a state that you want to achieve um is not to be encouraged but to realize that there's nothing to achieve and who you are in your essence is already complete full perfect in your essence there's nothing that you could add to who you are you're already one with god to use that term one with source the source of all life you're already one with that on the level of manifestation there are many things that where you could improve your life as this manifested being that you are temporarily you can learn new things explore new things achieve get obtain and then of course it leaves you again nothing stays with you in the world of manifestation it comes and then it goes so there's nothing wrong with doing and achieving and obtaining but for realization it's not helpful it's a hindrance so we come to the point of where doing and being are reconciled in yourself to reconcile in yourself the dimension of being with the dimension of doing so if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you are in a state of lack of insufficiency of not enough and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack in order to transcend to go beyond your state of lack of neediness of not enough spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary focus on the realization of being it's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack which is ego go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person it can be a more playful thing where you simply look around and acknowledge the presence of what's around you and feel your own presence in the background it's not a serious business now i have to practice presence no just don't even call it anything just be at ease in the present moment there's only this moment don't try to be present just be at ease in the now and then look around and sense and it's fine and then thoughts come don't have to stay there no and then thoughts come and thoughts go around your mind for a few minutes and then again you take some steps into your presence again walking from here to there making a cup of tea looking out of the window and then thoughts come again so you intersperse your the day or your life with presence and also when you're traveling either no matter when you go to work wherever you go whether you go whether you walk or drive or use a bicycle or use a train or use a bus it's a wonderful opportunity for just go within and be be present as you travel whenever you're waiting just be it's not there's no effort involved at all the effort is not being present is more effortful that's where all effort arises you don't use willpower to be present just an arising alertness don't demand that it should be there for long periods of time that's frustrating and then you say oh it's gone i can't do it anyway screw it i'm i'm quoting quoting you and that's the mind talking not the presence talking it's the mind saying it's useless to be present it's too hard work i can't do it i can't stay there anyway these are thoughts that arise in your mind and you believe them but they are thoughts that are designed to take you out of presence and to prevent you from returning to presence they're not the truth they are they are created by your mind to take you out of presence that's all so the mistake you made is you believed in those thoughts so even the thoughts through it is not the true thought as Byron Katie would say how do you know that's true it's not a true thought it's a thought that's there to take you out of presence and to make sure that you don't go back to it and then another thought comes and says what's the point it's not working for me maybe it's working for others but it's not working for me all kinds of you may be familiar with that kinds of self-talk in the head be very aware of what kind of self-talk happens in your head very interesting because you can learn so much about your the conditioning of your mind by listening to the way in which you talk to yourself and everybody talks to themselves and some people use the first person singular and talk as I and many people use this use the you they talk to themselves addressing themselves as you you are useless aren't you why can other people do it but you can't who is talking to whom so you're you're creating a split in your mind and one part of your mind talks the other part of your mind and calls it you and it's amazing so recognize that the self-talk rarely speaks the truth it's a form of conditioning that goes on in your mind and it is associated with the ego which does not want to go away it wants to stay in charge stick around it knows what to say to take you out but if you don't believe in every thought that arises especially thoughts concerning presence then you're free the thoughts may still come but you can say oh there goes his thought you don't actually you no longer comment on the thought and this is interesting you you become the from the awareness you can see and recognize the thought as a thought that your mind throws up without calling it anything it's a bit like holding a mirror up to something that arises that's the awareness the mirror doesn't judge what arises because if you criticize the thought that you just had it's just more self-talk and even if you say why are you always having this self-talk you should stop you should by now you should be beyond that self-talk you've been doing spiritual work for years and you still can't get out of your self-talk what's wrong with you more of it so when you did when you become aware of your self-talk don't formulate judgments around the self-talk you get just more of it don't criticize yourself be hold up a mirror to it and from there there's a knowing there in that awareness you know that this is self-talk and you know that it's not true without having to tell yourself through words that this is not true and this is self-talk you just know in this so this is a in the same way that you can know you can look at a you can look at a plant or a flower you know it's a flower but you don't have to tell yourself this is a flower you know it without formulating any words in your mind any concepts you can look at the sky beautiful vast blue you don't have to say to yourself this is a vast blue sky and i'm looking at it you that's that's knowing through concepts and words but there's another kind of knowing does not require words you just know and because you do not limit what you are perceiving through concepts you can actually sense a greater depth in that which you are perceiving whether it's the flower or the sky you can sense a depth in it that goes beyond what you see on the surface of your sense perceptions the depths becomes obscure to you when you look at everything through continental concepts when you say this is a beautiful vast sky you're still limiting yourself your the true perception does not happen until the words disappear and there's only the awareness and the perception and in that the sky is more than just the sky it's suddenly because every concept reduces it and you think the word sky is the sky you know the painting i think it's by margaret the painting of an apple and he writes underneath this is not an apple of course it isn't it's the painting of an apple in the same way that a word or concept is not it krishna murthy said when you teach a child the name of the bird from then on the child will never see that bird again because the child then begins to substitute the concept for the direct perception which and there's a depth to the direct perception in which the bird is more than a bird there's a depth to the bird and you realize that life form is more than a bird it just appears as a bird and there's what i'm trying to put into words comes from a perception that is beyond words that's why it's so difficult so you see it there's a depth to the flower and the sky and the bird that cannot be there when you look at it through concepts you can feel the aliveness of the bird you can sense its connectedness to the totality you can sense its sacredness you can sense it's it's beautiful you could never realize that through concepts so don't believe in the words that your mind throws up and that take you out of presence that's the main lesson for you here and it's a lesson for everybody because everybody is burdened and some people are plagued and tortured by their self-talk in a way that would be regarded as indefensible cruelty if somebody close to you did it to you all the time on a daily basis what are i don't know what terms they use the legal terms when you get a divorce uh cruelty or inhuman cruelty or whatever that would apply to your mind that you have to live with when you are not aware enough for perhaps not is perhaps not as bad for you it just takes you out of presence but for other many other people the self-talk can be extremely destructive and can make your life miserable absolutely miserable you don't know that's only the self talking that you think that's your life you think your life is miserable not realizing it's your self-talk that makes your life miserable is it a is i don't know whether to laugh or cry at this uh so absolutely vital lesson hold up a mirror the mirror of awareness to your self-talk so that you realize it's no more than self-talk in particular if you've had predominantly negative or even 50 and many people have 80 to 90 negative self-talk then realize this is stuff my mind produces and not not verbally you don't have to realize it verbally you it's the mirror of awareness and you look and you know wow and i've lived with that for so many years and i've survived miraculously even with that dreadful self-talk in the head and because when you no longer identify with it it begins to subside it's only when you only empower it again and again when it takes you over so completely that you identify it becomes you i haven't mentioned being in the body for a while so let's feel it now that you are actually you feel the energy field of your as you sit there and i sit here we feel a certain aliveness pervading the body it's very simple but some attention has to go there otherwise you can't feel anything which means you have to take some attention away from the thinking if you're fully in thought you can't feel your body at all you're not don't feel alive anymore just abstractions so the beautiful thing is it's not only that your body loves being acknowledged and getting your attention it's a very healing thing to do and most importantly it slows down your thinking considerably if it doesn't even stop it completely because you have to if you have your attention here you can't have it there and this be the embodied state it's quite nice what you're feeling is not ultimately the physical body it's already halfway beyond the physical body chi life energy and i call that it's halfway between form and formlessness it's a bridge chi is the bridge between the the formless dimension and the form so it's wonderful to be to sense that and it can be you can do it anywhere when you're there's enough room you don't need to focus on externals a hundred percent have some attention in the body so we sit here boredom disappears for example when you have attention in the body you're not bored you actually enjoy being feeling alive and that it can serve as an anchor for staying present and that can be one way of looking around at the world without unnecessary mental labeling this clarity of perception and looking at the situations that arise in that clarity of perception and from that clarity of perception you know what you need to do or what needs doing in that situation it's a higher intelligence that you contact via the body a higher intelligence than the acquired knowledge of the human mind and then you know what to do it it acts it tells you you have an inside or spontaneous doing or if there's nothing to do it being is enough it's you can enjoy just being sleepless nights are wonderful opportunity for going into the body oh i can't sleep i wish i could sleep why don't you do something useful go into the body um and then you lie there and feel the the aliveness oh i wish i i hope i won't go to sleep

[Speaker 12] (3:31:38 - 3:31:52)
too soon because it's so nice and before you know it you've gone to sleep perhaps

[Speaker 1] (3:31:54 - 3:51:43)
and then you wake up in the morning perhaps you still feel a lingering sensation there in the body and if you don't as you wake up put your attention into the body first before you start thinking about the day for just a couple of minutes three minutes two minutes it's a good start of the day to feel alive can't be a bad start of the day i'll tell you what a bad start of the day is listening to the news first thing it keeps it's it's a grounding but not a heavy grounding it's a rooted in being are there any thought processes connected with the fear in other words what are the thoughts that your mind is producing while you're feeling the fear well fear anxiety which is a form of fear very common for some people have it many have it in the background continuously and i would say there's some degree of fear even if you're not conscious of it if you're totally identified with the egoic mind you will have fear if only in the background and it may come out in other forms it can come express itself as anger if you look at anger closely you usually find hidden underneath the anger is a state of fear so if there's fear one important thing is to of course you need to direct your attention to it you acknowledge that there's fear the question the important question that arises is are there any thought processes connected with the fear in other words what are the thoughts that your mind is producing while you're feeling the fear is it possible that certain thoughts that you think frequently or habitually produce the fear is it possible you project yourself into the next moment into the future moment excessively trying to control something that you have no control over what's going to happen to me or project or creating an imaginary imaginary scenario of loss that you might yet you might suffer it's not happening now but it might happen and many things that the thought activity excessive thought activity often creates scenarios of things going wrong that are not happening now may never happen often probably will never happen and even if they did happen the actual situation would actually be easier to face than the imaginary situation in your mind because there's nothing you can do there's no action you can take to remedy an imaginary situation except to stop thinking it but if an actual situation arises you face it and you give it your attention and then you take the action that you need to take but an imaginary situation you're totally at the mercy of it so it only exists in your mind so you need to see whether your mind is creating the fear by thinking fearful thoughts by projecting itself into the future and if if that is the case then you can see oh so i'm creating those because my body cannot tell the difference between an actual event that's happening outside and what my mind is producing so when when i'm thinking thought my life situation is critical if if this is the basically what your thoughts are telling you then your body believes that this is the actual truth that you are being threatened at this very moment if the body doesn't know the difference that the tiger isn't in the room the threatening presence is your thoughts the body reacts in the same way whether there's a threat an actual threat in the room all your thoughts can create the same even palpitations you can be shortness of breath because you're thinking fearful thoughts at night i had that for years awful state it's insane it's a disease but nothing is happening absolutely nothing there's a quiet room nothing it's all happening in the mind so if that's the case see okay then you need to tackle the thoughts because they will cause the fear and how do you tackle thoughts is by using by realizing the futility and the destructive nature of these thoughts and choosing to step out and what do you do to step out first you don't believe your mind that tells you no you can't step out you have to continue thinking no you step out and take a conscious breath or put your attention into the inner energy field of the body a conscious choice to remove attention from thinking and you may have to be really alert to do it if you are immersed in a mind stream it could even be that it's so powerful that you just cannot get out it has such gravitational pull it pulls you but at least you know that this is what's happening so you there's a state where you cannot help yourself yet but at least there is the beginning of a beginning of a disidentification from it when you know that this is what is happening your health your relationships your work or lack of it finances living situation usually those things make up your life my life but i call that your life situation as opposed to life which is only ever now your life situation exists in the mind you have to keep it alive there it's important of course you have to deal with situations as they arise in your life but they only arise in the present moment and when you think about your life situation you can only think about it in the present moment it's important to have these two your life and your life situation and not allow your life situation to completely obscure your life your presence your sense of aliveness your spaciousness and that's helpful to bring attention to learn to bring attention to your senses the expression we could use is come to your senses those five senses so you become more aware of what surrounds you inhabit the body it's another one that brings you connects you with life takes you out of the conceptualizing mind be here now come to your senses inhabit the body be here now they all one and then you don't carry continuously with you like a heavy burden your life situation of course you address whatever challenges arrive you deal with them as they arise in the present moment occasionally you might have to make do some planning or some strategy occasionally but also that happens in the present moment for the rest of the time don't allow your life situation to completely obscure completely stifle your sense of aliveness your presence in the moment because then you walk around with the burden of a very heavy personality and you don't see what's around you anymore you can't truly relate to other humans because you have the heaviness of your problematic life situation and whose life situation is not problematic it's in the nature of life situations to be problematic of course you arrange your life as best you can your life situation as best you can yes you you may acquire new skills so you can get a better job or or in whatever way you improve or attempt to improve your life situation find a nicer place to live why not that's all fine but the expectation that at some point life should leave you alone and not challenge you anymore and that there's something wrong when life challenges you that's a delusion that itself the unconscious assumption that there's something wrong when life presents so-called problems to you better word is challenges there's an unconscious assumption and an unconscious resentment and negative reaction the moment you're faced with a new challenge because of the underlying assumption that these things these things should not be happening but no matter how carefully you arrange your life situation and no matter how much positive thinking you do which is a nice thing you will still be challenged by life you will still experience the polarities of life you will experience for example that every situation every new situation has its new set of challenges so to cut to sever the link between the emotion that you feel and your thought processes what you do is and this is not pleasant but it's possible you place your attention on the emotion you feel it it's unpleasant but it's not going to kill you a child will probably not be able to do that if it's intense it might have to escape into some through dissociation or whatever possibly but an adult fear it's not going to kill you it might kill you if you allow it to rise into your mind because if you might even commit suicide if you can't stand this anymore but it will not kill you in itself so feel it and then you shine the light of awareness on it and you may have to do that a lot and at first it's not pleasant but it's a burning up of the old emotion and the only way to get rid of it is to accept it as it is right now if you want to get rid of it you can't but that complete acceptance of what is is actually the doorway through it it's a transformation of it and if it's extreme that can become your main meditation in life and that will become your main teacher and that will bring about your transformation there in some people's lives there is one huge disability one huge source of suffering or pain that they it could be a physical disability it could be a situation like being in prison it could be an emotion like that that you carry inside that does that doesn't need to go doesn't want to go away so one in certain people's lives there is one one major thing that seems to color your entire life and and and make make your effect your entire life and seemingly makes it impossible for you to ever be free or happy or joyful but if that that one thing if you surrender to it allow it to be and make it as a continuous spiritual practice you need nothing else that one thing will transform you if you surrender to it and there will come a point when you are grateful that that you had to go through that because it will have taken you it will be the greatest spiritual teacher so there was i believe if i remember correctly even a picture to us that philosopher always said it's not the situation that makes you unhappy it's the thought to make you unhappy i if i remember correctly he was also crippled he couldn't walk properly and he was a slave until he became freed so it's often humans who have one major disability or some huge huge difficulty in life and that becomes their catalyst for spiritual transformation if they can surrender to it allow it to be acceptance i call it acceptance of the seemingly unacceptable stephen hawking's case for example i don't know to what extent he awakened spiritually but he accepted the unacceptable and so certain miracles happened he survived just nobody would have thought it possible and he put his life became fruitful on one level at least acceptance of the unacceptable is a great source of grace in this world it's just a miracle but it's an arduous it can be an arduous process for especially for this questioner here who is here it may take a while you have to endure it and be with it and surrender to it a lot of the time and that's your meditation you don't need transcendental meditation your pain your fear is enough be with it the strange thing is only by encountering these challenges do we grow in consciousness and generate energy it awakens us eventually now if you overdo physical exercise you put too much strain on the body you could kill the body you could kill yourself and this has happened people who were so obsessed with physical exercise that they overdid it i've read for example whenever it was one or two years ago a man who wrote about the incredible benefits of jogging died of a heart attack while he was jogging he wasn't that old so you can overdo it and then instead of the body getting stronger it dies and you could also say when you look at life and humans life on this planet probably many other planets you would say well it's all very well sometimes it seems to work that through facing challenges and problems we grow we grow out of identification with mind we grow out of the ego we transcend our conditioned state of consciousness and a new consciousness arises and if i know not actually speaking for myself without facing difficulties and challenges there would not have been any growth in consciousness and no awakening if i had had a what's the word for example a trust fund where you know from a very early age your parents have already looked after your security and you know from an early age you if you don't want to work or anything you don't have to you can have a comfortable life without ever doing anything so there are people like that there may even be one or two here but if you are here and you are a trust fund baby then other things must have happened to you that created difficulties it wasn't financial but there were other things

[Speaker 11] (3:52:06 - 3:52:42)
my north star is the monk the story you shared about the monk who lived saying is that so for everything that came i am trying my best to get there in my journey to accepting the isness of things and accepting the moment what i'm struggling with is when am i being a doormat how do i determine it's clear in the example you just shared being homeless in the gray areas of life how do i determine when i need to take action

[Speaker 1] (3:52:43 - 3:58:41)
right thank you thank you good i don't know if you that story i wrote about it in the new earth i think the monk who is accused of having seduced a young girl who became pregnant because the girl told her parents that this monk did it and then the parents went to the monk and said the terrible thing you did now she told us what you did and all the monk ever said was is that so and then they told everybody else he lost his reputation and that was before that happened before the arrival of twitter and facebook and so on so but basically he was cancelled in modern terminology and then the girl gave birth to the baby and the parents said we don't want that baby we'll take it to the monk he can look after it's his baby so they brought the baby to the monk and here's your baby you look after the baby and the monk said is that so and then the monk looked after the baby for a year or so uh just looked after it very well and then the girl grew up a little bit more who had given birth and then finally she confessed to her parents that he was not the father but it was some young guy from next door bad so the parents ran back to the monk said we are terribly sorry we now know that you're not the father of the baby and again the monk said is that so and he handed the baby back to the parents that is an extreme example of non-resistance um jesus has another extreme example of non-resistance you and somebody slaps you on the one cheek and you offer your other cheek that's another extreme example of non-resistance but all it points to is not so much what you do on an outer level but it points to an inner state of non-resistance um you could still if you had were that monk you could still have said this is not true i'm not i did not father this baby this is not even then you could still be in an inner state of non-resistance you could still you could they could state simply this is how it is probably nobody would have believed him but he could have stated it and so the important thing is non-resistance is not so much to do what externally what you do but it's an it's an inner state of consciousness of non-resistance acceptance of what is of the present moment in this this moment um it doesn't if it's misunderstood then it could lead as you say it could lead you to become a doormat because then you would go along with with what everybody said anybody says to you uh and you would can you do this can you do this for me yeah okay i can do it and then you could be used by people but a state of non of non-resistance sometimes um may require you to say no to a let's say somebody requests something but you feel you don't want to do it or you cannot do it uh for some reason and you say no i i don't i think i wrote about this i had this expression a high quality no as opposed to a low quality no a low quality no is you make the other person into a kind of enemies and why you always ask me this like you're you should argue and shout you accuse the other you're just trying to use me i can see it you've used me before and now you're doing it again now you're asking me for money again i've already lent you five times here have you given it back to me no you haven't so no i'm not going to do it just don't leave me alone that's one no and then there's another no which is non-reactive it's not all right does not arise from reactivity but is a response to the situation that says uh no i don't want to let's say whatever the request is or the demand no i i can't do it anymore i don't want to do it anymore no i'm not going to give you money again because i've already given you five times so i'm just i'm i won't give you uh that's just how it is i know i can't uh no no i cannot whatever it may be you're saying no without creating an enemy without treating or a situation without making a situation into an enemy so it's a conscious no and you're still in an inner state of non-resistance the state of resistance strengthens the ego and this is a way of not operating through not operating through ego so you don't have to become a doormat

but this this non-reactive no requires you to be alert and present

[Speaker 1] (3:58:54 - 3:59:16)
um and then you start also part of that is um you stop complaining to people about what they do as i gave in the example i gave just a minute ago when you give a low quality no you say you make the other wrong

[Speaker 2] (3:59:17 - 3:59:23)
and you complain about them all that drops away

[Speaker 1] (3:59:24 - 4:00:04)
uh i often as you might know i often remember an important aspect of the egoic mind the unconscious patterns of the egoic mind is the complaining function complaining about other humans their deficiencies what the many ways in which they are wrong and lacking in whatever it may be and for many humans it's a very important part of their life

[Speaker 2] (4:00:05 - 4:00:18)
is complaining about others uh either you can complain to them directly or very frequently to

[Speaker 1] (4:00:18 - 4:34:08)
other people when you're talking you know what he said and then you tell the story that's and again another favorite occupation of the egoist telling a story of what he or she did and then he said this and that and i said how dare you do this again and then he said and then i said it's a very frequent thing that unconscious people do and you're always the winner of course you're always the one who is right in that story the complaining disappears from your life and that's a very important shift because it has no purpose i'm not talking about complaining to say i want to exchange this thing i bought this yesterday but it's not working i that's that's not complaining you could make it into complaining because you could personalize it and regarding as a personal insult to you that they sold you something that's not working and then it becomes an unpleasant drama again but to to rectify something that is wrong is not complaining unless you make it into complaining you seem to i need to i want to return this uh because it's not working but you don't go in the soup is cold can you please heat it up but you don't how dare you serve me this cold soup do you bring in the the me that put the offended person or offended is a big thing these days as you know everybody's offended continuously on social media and everywhere i'm offended yes no i'm more offended than you another the ego has in certain time periods the ego manifests in different ways and now of course the ego uses the opportunity of the digital age social media facebook twitter whatever else it's called i don't know uh it uses that to amplify itself in certain ways that were not possible before so it's a great opportunity for the ego to proliferate and amplify itself you're just trying to use me and i'm not going to do that anymore i'm not going to be used anymore by you this is it that's it or no more that that's another kind of no but it's a low quality no so i often say say yes to the present moment or i say make the present moment your friend not your enemy so it's to say yes to the present moment is a powerful teaching but it can be misunderstood and has been misunderstood sometimes and it needs to be explained what that actually means it means oh by the way um there's a funny movie made a few some years ago with jim carrey it's called the yes man and this is a person in the movie a character the character he plays he works at a bank i think to in the

mortgage department and he's very he's very bitter and he likes to say no to people who apply for mortgages every no you can't have it he loves and it's very negative about everything now his life is uneventful boring everything is negative then he goes to a new age a friend invites him to a strange new age event with a new age teacher and the teacher says you have to say yes yes to everything say yes to everything and um he kind of becomes convinced well i might as well try that i've got nothing to lose and from then on whatever people ask him every mortgage he approves and whatever people ask him can you lend me money sure yes can you do this yes yes yes and then his life becomes very interesting but also very chaotic he he gets into most chaotic situations and he kind of all gets out of hand and i in the end he kind of seems to realize that this wasn't quite working it that that was that is not the true meaning so to say yes to the present moment does not mean that you accept everything that people ask of you in some cases you have to use the now the no but in the um don't but not in an angry way that denies the present moment i call that a high quality no uh so it's let's say um in the orchestra can you look after my children or let's be can because i i need you you're so so good with children to feel flatter you you feel obliged you're such a wonderful person i so love you can you do it again please and at some point safety i'm sorry i can't do it anymore um but without any negativity a simple statement it is not a reactive statement you don't make her into a bad person who i know she you want to take advantage of me i'm not doing it anymore that is a low quality no even if perhaps you she did try to perhaps she was trying to take advantage of you but that is not that may be then a dysfunction in her egoic self many humans do that the world is full of people who perhaps are trying to take advantage of you that's what the egos do and so it is not who she truly is but you speak to you do not speak to the ego in her you simply say i love your children they're just wonderful and i enjoyed my time but i can't do it anymore i'm sorry about that high quality no no no i can't do that a person says can you lend me another thousand dollars um and he's well i've already lent you two thousand three months ago and last year i lent you five thousand i haven't got anything back yet and then he's i'm sorry i have to say no but you don't say you're just you're just trying to use me you and i'm not going to do that anymore i'm not going to be used anymore by you this is it that's it or no more that that's another kind of no but it's a low quality no and the high quality no no i'm sorry that's it i can't do that anymore this it it implies there's a presence behind what you say it's not reactive and with the same the person who asked you to write something you say i've seen the background i'm not in agreement with that therefore i'm sorry i need need to say no to this i can't do this thank you high quality no it's beautiful and it works quite often you may have to use that make sure that it's not reactive and then becomes low quality you have to be vigilant to see if your actions any given moment whether they are no more than a means to an end another question when we lose a form that represented abundance do we resign ourselves to the loss or should we take action to bring new forms of abundance into being again the question may refer to you so i cannot question you directly here maybe you lost possessions money whatever and the question is do we resign ourselves to the loss or should we take action to bring new forms of abundance into being well you can do you can resign yourself it's not a question of either or whether or not you create more of the same whatever it is if you lost a house whether you work to have another house or if you lost investments whether you work hard to create the same again or whether you no longer are interested in doing that in any case resigning yourself to the loss applies in any case if you don't do that then you suffer and then you build up negativity and then you all your the action you take is then based on negative reaction and you can work very hard and perhaps you'll recreate the same abundance but it's not pleasant so acceptance of what is always comes first and then you're free to go on from there acceptance of loss that's what is nothing is permanent in this world it consists of gain and loss sooner or later you have to let go acceptance comes first and then there's a choice if you enjoy the creation of abundant forms whatever you do why not carry on doing it and very quickly you will probably create the same abundance if you don't enjoy the doing if the doing is only a means to an end because you need the money you want to have the psychological security of money you still haven't learned that it doesn't really work then you just go through the same cycle again and you won't be happy you'll be compulsively working hard trying to get your money back so it's the question of step one is acceptance of what is because it is step two is you listen within and see what it is that wants to be done perhaps you worked for 20 years built up something lost it do you want to work on another 20 years or even 10 years or 10 years if you enjoyed yes why not the important question whatever you do is what I'm doing primarily a means to an end or is it primarily an end in itself if it's an end in itself means as I do what I do there is an enjoyment there there is an aliveness there yes I know what I want to achieve so that's why I'm saying primarily primarily a means to an end or primarily an end in itself if your doing is not primarily an end in itself then there's lack of enjoyment and lack of harmonious doing and that's unconscious and it it makes you unhappy basically even if you don't know it many unconscious people are unhappy and they don't they are so unconscious they don't even know that they're unhappy but because it's their normal state isn't everybody else the same so that applies to whatever you do not just going going beyond this this particular question you have to be vigilant to see if your actions any given moment even simple things running errands things you do every day you need to be vigilant to see whether they are no more than a means to an end in which case you are not present in what you do you're probably impatient or stressed or complaining would rather be somewhere else as the car sticker says the bumper sticker stickers you have say things like I'd rather be fishing and if your mindset is I'd rather be even when you're fishing you won't be happy for very long and then very quickly you'd rather be sitting in your car driving somewhere exciting so taking responsibility for your life is taking responsibility for how you perform your actions what you do and if most of your actions are means to an end your whole life is of low quality it lacks presence and you're always looking out for the next moment which you think is going to be better when it comes is unfortunately only the present moment which is never good enough that's low quality life you know the quality of your life the way in which I use the term is deeper than the conventional use of the term or it's good to have the term at all quality of life because it implies that what determines the the value of your life is not quantity it's not how much you consume how many things you own or whatever how many people you control in your job or your whatever it's not quantity that determines the the value of your life it's quality so in the conventional term I'm glad that this term exists it means how you enjoy whether you enjoy whether you can go to to have quality time with another human being which means attention quality activities where you're not just working all the time but doing other things they have the quality of life or cities every year they have a list I don't remember who publishes it or how they exactly they determine it but it's an attempt to determine how pleasant it is to live or how unpleasant it is to live in a particular city many factors contribute to that so that's a good thing but the way in which I use quality goes even beyond that or it's it is connected somehow but it goes it goes deeper you can live in a city that's very low on the life quality list and lead a life of the highest quality which means as you do what you do you are giving it full attention knowing that yes I'm doing this because that I need to get there and there you know what the end is that you want to achieve but your primary concern is the doing the smallest thing and then your life is of high quality every action has a certain aliveness and presence it is not stressed it's not done with reluctance it's not done with impatience it's not done with irritation all this can't you see how that lowers the quality of your life all those things but it's so normal but you can do the same thing why bring all that to the action the irritation the stress the dislike the impatience the complaining why what purpose does it has no real purpose except it strengthens your false sense of self uh oh so you can see you have a choice you can do the same even if you do nothing to change your life on the external level let's say everything that you've been doing so far you carry on doing it but you bring a completely different you take you take out all the resistance patterns from what you've been doing you take out all the complaining and the wanting to be somewhere else and the irritation and the impatience and the stress so you're still doing exactly the same and yet your life is completely transformed on the inside an amazing thing on the outside at first nothing has changed you still do exactly the same i am you know that without adding any qualifiers to it without adding anything to the i am it's the pure sense of being which is i am some people hate themselves i don't like my body i don't like who i am i don't like this how awful way to live i hate myself it's much better to love yourself so in new age teachings you learn to let go of this dysfunctional relationship with yourself and then this is a good thing it's much better to love yourself than to hate yourself so but you have to achieve that transition not easy if the hating yourself has been deeply ingrained you may have to put little stickers on your bathroom mirror i love myself oh yes and and everywhere you are lovable oh thank you thank you yes and again this is fine it's a transitional stage it's not the final stage sometimes in new age things it's a final stage it's a it's a lovely transitional stage but really it's the stage of awakening is that you begin to let go of having a relationship with yourself so that you can just be yourself and you have to be in the present moment in order to be yourself and that is you can sometimes learn by looking at an animal with the animal is at a pre-egoic stage what we are moving towards or into is a post-egoic stage now the animal like your dog is pre-egoic the dog has consciousness but not conceptual consciousness that it not the dog does not operate through mental concepts in other words the dog does not have an opinion about you isn't that that's why you love the dog so much and also the dog does not have a relationship with himself or herself humans have but i have not met a single dog that has a problem with self-esteem for example i have not met a single dog that has a problem with body image even the the ugliest dog is okay because the split hasn't happened yet the split into me and myself so that the dog this is why the dog often is often joyful and the slightest thing you sometimes you go you if you have a dog you go away for 10 minutes and you come back home the dog acts if you have been away for 10 years he's so happy and the the hat is contagious a little bit the happiness of a dog the wagging tail of the dog why is the dog so happy because the dog does not have a self the dog is him her itself the dog is and then the tail goes life is good if the dog could say something it would say life is good in the present moment just give me my food and it's even better so the humans they love to be with their animals because it gives them a little bit of a little glimpse of self-transcendence because when they look into the eyes of the dog they are not being judged and that feels good and you can sense by looking at the eyes you can sense the being of the dog wow now the dog what you really love in just an example dog cat what you really love in the dog is not the outer surface of the dog although it's lovely to the touch and all that yes but you know there is something that you cannot see that you relate to when you look into the eyes of a dog that is the the essence of the dog what you love is actually the consciousness of the dog which has no ego in it it exists at a pre-egoic state you love the consciousness of the dog and when you look in the eyes of you feel a little bit you connect a little bit to that in yourself for a few seconds when you're not you don't need any defense mechanism or anything like that when you relate to a dog although there are some humans with huge egos i have observed a few who relate to their pet through their ego but that's another story and that's a sad story they have an ego relationship i knew a woman who would in the evenings he would put food out for her cat would go out the cat would be in the garden and she had the window open that was a neighbor of mine years ago and she would put the food out and this woman had a very accomplished person but a gigantic ego she would she put the cat food of her cat out and then if the cat didn't come because cats have many things to do out in the garden and it was dinner time for the cat and she put the plate there and she was sitting there waiting for the cat to come and 15 minutes passed and then she said okay then she would close the window said if she doesn't want to see me i don't want to see her oh my god she has an ego relationship with her cat i so a relationship with yourself that eventually is transcended so that you can simply be in the present moment not and let's go deeper now so that in the present moment uh which is a portal into the awakened state in this present moment let's see who or what are you in the present moment without reference to any thought without reference to any thought about who you are that's an interesting pointer in other words what does it feel like to be yourself without remembering your past or thinking about the future just in this moment you don't need to remember your email address or anything it's not necessary now or what you ate yesterday without reference to past and future um what does it do you disappear or what is left of you without the memory the narrative that usually do you describe as my life without that memory of that you need to revive continuously without that what does it feel like to be you and i cannot answer that i can only give it to you as a pointer and slow down a little bit as i talk so that you can perhaps inquire investigate internally what what it feels like what is the most essential thing about your identity is are you still there when you don't think about your life like now are you still there and what what is that i'm not going to answer it and i don't expect a conceptual answer um so the that's me there was a ancient spiritual teacher in india whose favorite meditation was asking his disciples to ask themselves who am i you can also ask yourself what am i who or what what am i what am i but don't answer it verbally but feel or sense what it means to be alive or to be you what am i what am i there's a there's a gap in the stream of thinking then what what is there when there's a gap in the stream of thinking like now and in the gap there's a there's a stillness yes um there's also a sense of there's something there but it's hard to describe there's a sense of presence of beingness and in that sense of presence of beingness you know that you are you know you can say i am you know that without adding any qualifiers to it without adding anything to the i am it's the pure sense of being which is i am it's very peaceful you need an alertness to sustain it just for a little bit without the alertness you will immediately fall back into the stream of thinking but it's not you don't use willpower to to stop your thinking mind that doesn't really work so you don't hold your breath in order to stop thinking that does it might work for a little while but then you think even more it's like a boiling kettle hold the lid on the boiling kettle just alertness and so jesus said as i said at the beginning and what i say to you i say to all stay awake in some translations it's in it's translated as stay alert what i say to you i say to all stay alert that alertness is consciousness without thought it seems at first just to be an absence it seems at first like okay stillness one could say is the absence of noise in a stillness in absence it might seem at first as a kind of nothingness and yet if you if you stay with it for a little bit just a few more seconds stay alert then you can sense it's not just the absence of something it's also the presence of something but not so much the presence of something but the sense of presence itself not of something the greater part of human suffering is caused by you humans do it to each other it's that is this and this is why it's so important this shift in consciousness because we would undoubtedly destroy ourselves if there is no shift in consciousness

how does one keep faith and stay on a path of awakening and having a peaceful meaningful meaningful light existence amongst all the sadness war and suffering i feel best when not taking political sides and not engaging much in current political financial economical affairs however i've been called a pacifist and been told that the problem with this world is people such as myself who don't take a stance how does one take a stance without being too attached to an ideology or group and without being brought down by the mass consciousness

[Speaker 13] (4:34:48 - 4:34:52)
thank you thank you

[Speaker 1] (4:35:02 - 4:47:39)
well the what you said just the mass consciousness that's a good term that's certainly the case and the unconsciousness of the collective is amplified by our technology of course um it's uh it does not mean that you cannot the expression is used i think you said take a stance which is means to participate in some way in the discourse that happens on the in the world of the internet and all that there's a disc people are continuously talking to each other and there's also the secondary thing is because action is there any desirability of taking action what kind of action taking a stance most important thing is there's nothing wrong with expressing your viewpoint or opinion because i'm sure you have viewpoints and opinions the important thing is not to confuse opinion and identity that's that's when you lose yourself when an opinion which is your mental position your viewpoint your opinion if if that if you unconsciously you equate that with your identity then you begin you begin begin to fight against other humans who have different opinions or identities that clash with yours uh so and again the key to becoming free of this uh delusion of equating opinion and identity is to to have an identity that transcends to find your true identity that transcends thought that is beyond thought and beyond the personality again that's what we started with today and what which continuously in the background of what we are talking about here in the background is that to be to to be rooted in the awareness even while you express an opinion you can you might it might be a political opinion on the left on the right whatever it may be and you express your opinion and somebody else may attack your opinion um you ask at first you'd ask yourself what is the point am i am i making a useful contribution to the world by expressing this opinion that's an interesting question is this helping anybody or are you just talking to are you trying to convince people of that you are right and they are wrong you're not probably not going to succeed in that the other person will become more deeply entrenched in their opinions if you try to prove them wrong uh is it are you engaged in an egoic endeavor which is simply make others wrong and make yourself right and the world of the internet is full of people who are engaged in that practice of making themselves right and others wrong and by doing that the ego feels an enhanced sense of identity in other words you become more deluded ever more deluded of who you are is there any point in participating in some discussions there may be some point perhaps you can present put forward information that people did not have perhaps you have it and you can show instead of engaging in some kind of fight which is always egoic put forward some information and see that's how it is that that those are the facts and even then people may dislike your facts and and not want to see them but whatever it is you can participate in the discourse with wisdom uh with awareness so that you don't create enemies nobody nobody is your enemy um another question is action what action can i take the first your first responsibility is always in the same way that uh on aeroplanes when they announce what to do when the airbag comes down from this from the ceiling when the air pressure in case they always say in case there's a loss of air pressure these oxygen bags will come down from the ceiling and you're supposed to put them on your mouth and they always say if you're with a child put put it on yours first and then on the child so the uh because if you put it on the child first you may lose consciousness a second after that you can't help the child anymore to be but your state of consciousness is the foundation for your experience of this world your state of form of consciousness is a foundation for whatever you do or say so you give primary importance to your state of consciousness and then which means be aware be present don't be just trapped in the conditioned mind be present be aware and one once you know that your primary responsibility is your state of consciousness because that's the foundation for everything that affects the world in many ways even not only in ways that people you come into contact with could be affected in a good way by your state of consciousness even people you are not in contact with can be affected by your state of consciousness because everything is connected underneath the surface of the phenomenal world everything is connected and every human is connected to every other human ultimately there's a collective of humanity that is one consciousness of there's the consciousness of humanity which is an aspect of the greater consciousness of the universe so one could say there's ultimately only one human being on this earth and this one human being one human there's one human consciousness which is only an aspect of the universal consciousness this one human consciousness expresses itself in billions of short-lived forms they come and go every human form is on a cosmic scale every human form appears on this planet like a like a just a flash of light appearing that was you that was me lights continuously lights flashing one consciousness there's only one light but many it appears in many forms so once you stake responsibility for your state of consciousness and continue to realize that that is primary then you can take some action and you will know what is right the wisp because you can use wisdom then with the wisdom you will know you will know whether there's anything you can do because there are multiple huge many problems in this world which ones do you want to where do you want to take some action which is the most important one to you so there's a huge choice if you want to take action but never lose yourself in the action because all the things that are dysfunctional in this world the suffering in this world to a greater extent is created by human dysfunction the dysfunction that is inherent in the collective human mind which is the personal ego and the collective ego so there is a deep dysfunction in the human mind it's a kind of mental illness and that that mental illness in the collective human mind manifests itself in many different forms warfare is one of them and there are many many other forms the greater part of human suffering if you want to it might be easier to have a little bit of perspective look at the history of the 20th century and you can see the countless millions that were killed humans killing each other by the millions the incredible suffering that took place there most of it was not caused by natural catastrophes some was but not most of it was caused by other humans humans doing it to other humans that were the greater part of human suffering is caused by you humans do it to each other it's that is this the and this is why it's so important this shift in consciousness because we would undoubtedly destroy ourselves if there is no shift in consciousness so the dysfunction was already there even before we created the technology that we now have the dysfunction was already there but it was never life-threatening because humans did not have the power to destroy themselves but now the dysfunction is still there but now humans have the power to destroy themselves and the planet if nothing changes this is right now for the first time in human history a change in consciousness is no longer an option or a luxury one could almost say but a necessity for humanity to survive the change in consciousness is necessary and you need to embody that before you take any action or while you take action you need to embody that changed consciousness so that you don't get drawn into the unconsciousness of the world so you can acknowledge all the beauty that is in others even though in the external form of you that beauty

[Speaker 4] (4:47:39 - 4:48:04)
may no longer be manifested i often find myself comparing myself to other people particularly my my physical appearance compared to other women and it gets very tiresome as you can imagine um and i was wondering if you had any practical advice for for helping dissolve this

[Speaker 1] (4:48:23 - 4:48:36)
and i assume sometimes you come out as better than and at other times as not as good as is that right

[Speaker 12] (4:48:38 - 4:48:40)
yes yes

[Speaker 1] (4:48:44 - 5:08:26)
and better than feels good and not as good as doesn't it all feels tiresome to be honest that's a good point to reach to get tired of an old pattern like that then you're ready to let go so as the cause in miracles puts it uh comparison is one of the favorite ego devices to keep the ego going or it keeps itself going especially by comparing whether the comparing is to do with external appearance or comparing other things uh evaluating others in comparison to how in your own mind you evaluate yourself it could be to do with knowledge education class social class strengths physical strengths how many possessions worth he's worth so such and such amount of dollars and i'm worth so much more than he or so much less than he all kinds of things implied in that is a sense of a desire on the part of the ego to enhance its sense of worthiness uh and if anybody has less than you or appears less than you or can do less than you in some somewhat nonsensical way it seems to add something to your sense of self of course it doesn't make sense it's a it's a little bit absurd but that's how the ego functions and in reverse if somebody it feels to the ego as if somebody has just achieved something or that you haven't achieved it feels to the ego as if some something of its sense of self had been taken away so it gets deflated and and he's not happy the if you're really trapped in ego you are not happy when somebody good something good happens to somebody close to you because it feels to the ego as if it had become diminished because something somebody else has become enhanced their identity in the eyes of the ego it's all you can see when you explain it in this way so that you can actually see how it operates then you actually realize that that it is absurd to feel there is now less you have become less because somebody else has received more of something or can do something that you can't do and so you can see how unreal that sense of identity is you feel diminished because something good has happened to somebody close to you and in some cases if the ego is very strong in you without any trace of awareness you cannot even admit to yourself that you feel bad when when something good has happened to somebody close to you it's it's there as an unreal an unwitnessed emotion and then it might come out in your and you speak to that person with a desire to diminish what they now have that you don't have and it's totally unconscious with you you are not totally unconscious there's already an awareness in you that is aware of that pattern if there were no awareness in you you wouldn't be asking that question you wouldn't be sitting here you would be acting out that pattern and next time somebody in your vicinity has a just bought a new dress that looks absolutely stunning you would look at it if you were totally trapped in ego you would look at it and something inside you would contract but you wouldn't know that because there wouldn't be enough awareness for that but that contraction as an energy field would then flow into your mind and then words will come out of your mouth again unconscious to diminish the worthiness of that dress and you might say oh that dress that would look good on your sister and the other person who perhaps is also identified with the completely with suddenly feels hurt deeply and in in both cases the the famous saying applies they don't they know not what they do which of course points to complete lack of awareness so in that sense people hurt each other and try to take away in order to feel and the moment the ego said that would look good on somebody else it feels a little bit better already because you've taken away a bit from that the the value the perceived value of that thing it's an insane it's a delusional system but many people are still totally trapped in that not in not with you of course it's not the case with you you're not totally trapped it still operates in you to some extent but not totally trapped so it is there's some connection with value my my your own sense of worth or worthiness which is connected to your external appearance it could be connected to other things it may also be connected to other things so you are in there's a an image in you of who you are it's a surface image of the surface appearance your body and the solution of course is very simple it's to take your attention beyond the surface where it usually is the surface of your body the surface of that which is on top of your body the clothes take your attention deeper to the inherent energy field or aliveness or conscious presence that pervades who you are the entire being nothing to do with the external nothing to do with the shape of the body or what's on top of the body and if that if you begin to go there into that dimension take your attention into that dimension where you are not the external form but you sense the very essence of who you are you sense the life that you are beyond the form then you no longer need to identify with form you're no longer than threatened when somebody else's form is seemingly better than yours it no longer does anything to your sense of identity or your sense of worthiness and then you're free and you're free to admire somebody else's good looks and you're free to be happy with the way you look for the time being until years pass and then perhaps the body doesn't look that great anymore after a few more decades you have a few decades to go but they pass fairly quickly too and the further you go the more quickly they seem to pass that's strange and and so the time comes when you notice a deterioration in the appearance and then you begin to notice that most women around you actually look better than you for the simple fact that they're younger and you can appreciate the way they look because they are a manifestation of life an external manifestation they are life forms beautiful life forms without feeling threatened in any way in your own sense of self because the life of which those lovely women around you are manifestations you can sense that very life in its essence in you so you can acknowledge all the beauty that is in others even though in the external form of you that beauty may no longer be manifested as such so and that's wonderful freedom to appreciate the beauty that you see around you even if your own body is no longer part of that because there is a beauty in you that has nothing to do with form and that one could call that the essence of all beauty that's the very essence of life itself so when you have the essence you appreciate the external manifestation of it in its so-called one could say diluted form in the flower now most egos are not threatened by flowers but in a in another human being you can appreciate the beauty in another human being with and the comparison the compulsive need to compare disappears there isn't or what about me do I look as that that thought pattern dissolved long ago by the time you reach the point where most women will externally look better than you by the time then it's disappearing already so you don't need to wait a few more decades to get there or the ego can say okay I have another 30 years of I can identify with my good looks so the answer of course is then find the essence of who you are which is what all this teaching is always about find the essence of who you are so that you get in touch with the inherent sense of beingness or aliveness or presence within you which pervades the entire so-called physical body but is not the physical body and as I speak about it now you should be able to feel that within you the the the fact that there is an aliveness that pervades your entire being can you feel that that is more essentially who you are than the external appearance of who you are and that is going to be exactly the same in 30 years time as it is now so you then you become free of form you are essentially the consciousness behind it all so know yourself as that life or consciousness there's the same no thing know yourself as that and you're free of the ego the ego is there as a substitute it's to seek yourself in some form it's a that's the delusion and that's great creates an unhappy life so it's a wonderful thing it's it's also liberating to see the absurdity of the ego once you see how the patterns that I just just described just now you can see how mad it is to feel diminished when something good happens to somebody else to feel enhanced when something bad happens to somebody else and not even know it so let's see what happens next time you can admire a beautiful female form without any comparison in fact feel more intensely the beauty that is within you when you see it out there that's a wonderful thing there's only now it's when you're when the your mind is taking you to all kinds of unpleasant places you can always you come back so there's only this moment there's only this that's a and the now of course is the opening into the vertical dimension so you become aware of the present whenever suffering arises you don't want to manifest suffering but millions of people on a daily basis continuously manifest suffering but you don't want to so when you the beginning of an awakening is the realization that that you are manifesting suffering of course that's already an awakening there because if you're very unconscious the blame for all your suffering is always elsewhere it's never in your own mind when you're very unconscious other people the world situation fate god destiny your karma your parents the unjust system whatever all kinds of things they're all to blame they are cause your suffering and you haven't realized that you are manifesting your mind ultimately is manifesting and in fact if you if you tell this to a person who is not ready to hear that they will get very angry very angry so but the that realization your mind the unconscious mind manifests suffering and to when you discover that that ultimately the suffering arises in your mind because your mind reacts to things your mind creates a narrative that makes you unhappy not the situation but the narrative that your mind creates around the situation makes you unhappy when you discover that that's the first stage of the way one the wakening is oh and at that moment that's an amazing discovery that virtually all your suffering is created by your mind amazing and then you realize you don't want to manifest that anymore and then you want to manifest something else but first before you manifest something else you need to stop manifesting suffering and a good way is bringing your attention into the present moment this what what is my problem now what nothing what's wrong with this moment this moment is as it is what's the problem so bring your attention to now whenever you feel unhappiness arising look at your mind and bring attention to the present moment which always means the externals of the present moment that's a manifested dimension of the present moment and then the essence of the now which is consciousness awareness presence and so that's the how you stop manifesting suffering and then you can if you want to manifest other things from once you have the foundation which is the being then you begin to work on the two levels so you you reconcile the two the being and the doing in your life and that's that's your purpose and you will not always succeed it's you fall back into usually you fall back into losing yourself in doing and then you suffer and this unhappiness that arises can you can then use as a very helpful way of telling you you've lost yourself you've lost the present moment and once you know that you can come back so let's leave it at that

[Speaker 7] (5:08:37 - 5:09:21)
thank you hello um i live in las vegas nevada which is very mind dominated and uh it's tough there um there seems to be two forces in my mind that's build up energy and it's very strong and it keeps me from uh getting in touch with my true self into creating more space and cultivating that space um one of them is that it's not that interesting i'd rather go along with interesting thoughts and do interesting activities and also i have this fear that if i don't analyze and constantly think about like solutions and things in my life that everything's going to fall apart so it's hard those two forces that build especially where i live it makes it

[Speaker 1] (5:09:21 - 6:05:43)
even more increases it more so the energy field there is a kind of nervous yes actually i work in a casino too well that's a wonderful challenge to stay conscious there yes it is lots of discipline yes that's your spiritual practice right i've been there i've walked through some of the casinos in amazement and the it's it's a quite a place that seems to come out of some kind of dream when you walk around las vegas it's uh but it's actually quite interesting when the mind doesn't label it it's actually quite amazing oh all these all these strange life forms and what they have created it's quite amazing it's there's an intense aliveness there would i want to live there i don't know there have been some spiritual teachers who moved there i know of at least two i think it was andrew harvey a spiritual teacher moved to las vegas and there was a spiritual teacher called vernon howard who lived near las vegas and there may be one or two others why they moved there i'm not sure perhaps they maybe they loved it or perhaps to pay less tax perhaps who knows the well the challenge of course is uh to stay present and have stillness inside you that what you mentioned now you need to think about your your life problems or your life this is a very very common uh assumption unconscious assumption in humans that if i don't think about my problems though my life is going to fall apart i need i have to think about my life and what's going to happen and transfer of course nothing is going to fall apart if you stop thinking things will get better if you stop thinking with the exception of focused thinking in case there's a specific problem that needs to be addressed then focus thinking and then step even there stepping back into stillness so it's a wonderful thing if you're able to be present and still in las vegas then of course you're a master it's many people are be able to be present and still out in nature be a beautiful forest or the seashore or on top of a mountain and you watch the sunrise wow very still so still let's move here says the mind let's move here where it's so still and then wherever it is and if you do move there for a while it'll be wonderful oh it's so still and then of course the mind is becomes restless after a while there's nothing happening and you're not challenged by anything anymore if you have a meditation practice then you can of course convince yourself that you have finally achieved in your meditate five hours a day and let's say somehow food is brought to you as i remember a monk i knew buddhist monk telling me that story that he meditated in a hut up a mountain in thailand for half a year and he attained complete peacefulness peace nirvana he thought and every day somebody would bring him a bowl of food nothing to worry about nothing to do just be present and still the only challenge were mosquitoes he said but he learned to deal with that in other words to just completely accept and not mentally label it and just being used by them for food so he was came with that that was one challenge then he had to go back into the city to renew his visa because he was in thailand and he was a westerner and at the visa office they kept him waiting for one hour two hours and then he was in the wrong lineup for two hours and then he had to start lining up somewhere else and when he finally got to the window the man said oh no you haven't filled this out you do that again and he started so that was he then suddenly realized he had not attained nirvana so you're much better off in las vegas the thing is to use whatever environment you are in as part of their spiritual practice does not mean that you have to be stuck it may be that a deep sense of the need to remove yourself suddenly comes to you and then you go somewhere else that could happen because it seems like it's more of a challenge there yes yes so that's it's it's probably in many ways a better place to practice than a monastery right i never thought of that way and worrying about your life or your problems is a very common belief that that is necessary to hold things together but it's not you have to recognize the futility of of borrowing and realize your life is already together you're breathing you're eating when you need food you sleep when you sleep you go to work you do what you do you look around contemplate look at the sky uh look away nasir gas is a very much a man-made or human-made environment everything is kind of artificial not to say fake so everything is fake that's fine it's it's not everybody that much but there are trees there may there are some trees in there beautiful desert there is the sky there's a light there's the desert you can easily get out and you're out in the in the stillness so you can take advantage of that when you need to and so be happy with where you are and accept where you are and then while you do what you do in the casino what do you do there i'm a dealer at nighttime with the drunks yeah yeah place your bets and then yeah and then you can observe human nature there around you most definitely yes every facet you observe human nature in its unconscious state mostly yeah but that's fine that's where they're at you can be the the presence for them yeah it's hard not to judge them oh yes that's your practice not to judge because they are expressions of life of aliveness right in their form they're beautiful too yeah okay thank you so much is there a difference between daytime and versus nighttime awareness how does one work with a mind that is racing at night and does not allow any deep sleep i can control the mind during the day and not get caught up but how about the sleep time during the day yes you deal with other things your mind is busy dealing with things and at night time the mind is left to itself and then this is a typical example of useless not only useless but self-destructive and harmful overthinking or mind activity uh and this is the many people have that problem in their lives the the night time is particularly hard i remember that vaguely from my distant past when i would wake up in the night sometimes in a state of panic and the mind just would not stop so first thing there needs to be a minimum of awareness but i believe you have that otherwise you wouldn't be here there needs to be a minimum of awareness from where you can know that this mind activity is futile it leads nowhere it just creates suffering misery so you know that you know that you don't want it and don't need it there are still many people who don't have that minimum of awareness where they they are so identified with their mind activity which tells them i must think about this i need to solve this problem now nobody has ever solved a problem but by worrying at night but the mind says don't stop thinking don't stop thinking it'll all collapse if you stop thinking so you already know it's futile you already know that you would rather be free of that okay that's good you have that minimum of awareness from there you can choose you realize the power you have you can choose to direct your attention somewhere else now you may have to do that many times you you will there will be a perhaps a tug of war between your mind and where you want it to go so first thing you do take a conscious breath you're in at night thinking thinking suddenly i don't want to think anymore it's futile and it's it hurts okay how do i get out of this can i take a conscious breath if you ask yourself a question you might hear the answer in your mind saying no i can't do it now and that's a lie that's a lie by the ego invented by the egoic mind to stop you from doing it or you can ask okay i want to stop can i feel the the feeling of energy in my hands no i can't do it now i have to stop can't possibly do it now that's a lie there's nobody who cannot do it now you can do it now if you don't believe in the thought that tells you you cannot do it now and then you do it anyway either take a conscious breath or feel the energy that's the beginning of body awareness which is a powerful anchor for presence it takes your attention away from thinking into your body your consciousness moves so there isn't enough left for thinking a lot your mind and then you have to hold it in your body not through effort not not through forcing your attention into the body if you if your body becomes tense that's not it you can't go like i have to hold my attention in the body okay and now i'm forcing it down by breathing into i'm forcing attention into the body now you might even succeed for a little while but then no just take in a relaxed way attention moves into the body and you breathe into the body so the breast awareness and body awareness can become a single practice and then you feel the rest of the body coming alive there you can feel this there's life in your feet in your legs it's very subtle at first and then you feel the entire body pervaded by this sense of aliveness right now as i'm talking about it i can feel it zzzz i'm just making an audible sound for to uh because it's hard to talk about it so it goes almost like electricity and that is an anchor for presence now and then your mind will try to bring up thoughts critical thoughts that pull your attention back into thinking so it'll come up with this is really critical to think about it and then it you might you can feel your attention moving out of the body and back into your mind and then perhaps five minutes later you say oh it's gone and then you just gently go back into the body you choose where you where you want to place your conscious attention and you do it again and again and the moment will come when you actually enjoy being awake at night in your bed whereas before it was agony and so you lived that was when i started doing that it was so beautiful i always i didn't even i loved waking up in the middle of the night and would immediately go ah and sometimes already as i would often naturally just go there there was sometimes a feeling as i moved from sleep into wakefulness it was understood as if i was plugged into an electric outlet that wonderful intensely alive no thinking so it's your you have the power to choose where to direct your attention and don't believe the mind when it tells you you can't do it this is similar during the daytime some people have problems during the day too being present i can't do it now i've got so much on my mind maybe when i've dealt with that then i'll be present but it's just so much on my plate right now don't talk to me about presents it's just or as somebody i know who had done a lot of spiritual practice uh for 20 or 30 years and then suddenly she found he and she and her husband had invested money in the mad scheme or their savings with a man named madoff and he's in prison now but he had this wonderful scheme where you would get every year your investments would yield like 10 more 10 15 percent just wonder nowhere else would you get that so they had been highly recommended by friends everybody invested with mr made of totally reliable and then it turned out that mr made of had a gigantic ego and everybody was deceived and everybody lost their money when the crunch came and one day she got a call from her advisor and said sorry to tell you that the made of financial empire just collapsed and with it all your savings and she when she recovered from her panic she called a friend i think it was a friend or was it her husband go you know what happened it's all gone and her friend with whom she had been on retreat said well just take a few breaths and just come into the present moment and then she said she found herself saying this is not the time to be spiritual of course later she realized and she actually grew enormously thread and deepened her consciousness later she realized this is precisely the best time to be spirit there's no better time than this to be spiritual so she did learn that lesson but it took a while and then she wrote a book about it that did so well that most of her money returns through the book true story this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation so in some other translations he says i want you to have to have abundant life now abundant does not mean lots of things because that would mean that shopping malls are the kingdom of heaven let's say your goal is to to be widely known and to impact people's lives with your music fine perhaps you'll achieve it you can visualize it oh by the way when you visualize a goal that you want to achieve it's not in the future if if if you this is to do with manifesting when you want to manifest something it doesn't work very well when you think i i i will be famous i need to be famous i want to be famous not good good for manifestation if you want to manifest something you have to start with the foundation for manifestation is always the present moment it's never it's not the future what it works very simply jesus explained it in one sentence just one sentence whenever you pray for something believe that you have received it and it will be given to you now the key is that he did not say believe that you will receive it because that puts it into the future he said when you pray for something in other words when you want something believe that you have received it now what does that mean you have to feel in this moment the fullness of life that is there when you go deep enough into the being of you then you feel there's the fullness of life and you feel there is a sense of joyful aliveness that is a sense of power in you that you sense that that is the presence in you is there is a power in that presence and that power is there's a something that you could show almost there's a fullness in it already you can't really once you contact you when you're in touch with the the presence everything else that you could achieve in this life i compared i have this comparison analogy or whatever it is that which you realize within you this the power is the cream and everything else that you could achieve in this world is the skimmed milk so the the fullness of life this is an expression that jesus used he said and these are all put together he said i want you to have the fullness of life in some other translations he says i want you to have to have abundant life now abundant does not mean lots of things because that would mean that shopping malls are the kingdom of heaven so abundant life does not mean abundance as many things that abundance is the deeper place of a sense of intense aliveness the fullness of life that you feel within you that is abundant life presence to feel the life that you are the consciousness that you are out of that everything comes that's the fullness of life or abundant life you feel it in this moment and then if you then want to achieve something you bring a vision what you want and let it merge with that feeling let's say you want you're a great musician that's reaching who's reaching millions of people and you see yourself as this great musician reaching millions of people but not in the future how does this great musician feel once he has reached or she has reached millions of people this is exactly how it feels the fullness of life you feel it right here now you merge the vision with the feeling of fullness of life which is presence and then that's manifestation that also means however when you if and when you get what you wanted to manifest you're no you're not any happier than you are already you're not more joyful or fulfilled than you are already the fulfillment can only be arrived at in the present moment because that is the fulfillment is not dependent on external conditions the fallacy is to believe that something in the external world that you you could arrive at or you could achieve will it has the capability at some point in future of fulfilling you of in whatever way of making you happy making you complete making you peaceful making you said feel your sense of self more strongly whatever it may be so the belief that something out there can give that to you in other words to put in the most general terms the feeling that the world can make you happy the world could be anything in the world could be past another person an achievement a place whatever it is the world can make me happy it cannot the world can briefly give you a sense of ah i have arrived but then you see oh no that wasn't it this is the case with relationships it's the case with anything you achieve even great worldly success i've met many worldly successful people who told me they became very miserable soon after the worldly success so that's not it so the it's the present moment is the key to all achievement if you feel the intensity of presence then everything else is an added onto you that's all manifestation jesus used that expression seek only the kingdom of heaven all the other things that you think you need will be added onto you they are additions but they are no longer the things that they totally dominate your consciousness and determine whether you turn out to be a happy unhappy person so the joy is found already if the thing is added to you you say oh that's great but it doesn't change how you feel already so you need to find the place of fulfillment in the present moment first and then you can manifest so the foundation for manifestation is becoming intensely present and realizing your essence identity and live from and through your essence identity that then the essence and through the essence identity you can manifest things but these are not the things that will make you happy they are they are icing on the cake they're not they're not the cake so whatever you whatever you can achieve is the icing on the cake it's not the cake the cake is here and now that's the that's the key and that also means your inner state is no longer dependent upon external conditions and is no longer dependent upon whether you achieve so-called worldly success or not because it's very much secondary it's nice if you have it it's not a big deal if you don't that's so and you can still be you can still be determined and feel very strongly that you have it already let's say okay let's say i want to live in a great place where there's no longer cold and uh let's say it's hawaii okay i'm i want to go i want to move to hawaii this is i want to i'll be happy there when i move to hawaii or maybe it's bali i'll be when i move to bali i'll be happy there because it's paradise it's wonderful okay i want to move to then you can manifest i want to move to but you can even paint bali on a vision board bali and so i want to move to bali but you have to be in bali in this present moment how will you feel if you're in bali if you can't feel that now then it's not going to work very well in the the tropical island that you think will make you happy no you have to experience it as this is the essence of who you are will make you happy fulfilled and joyful and then if it manifests as a tropical island that's fine but but if you when you arrive in bali when you're already feeling pleasant it's again it's an adding on to because when you arrive at bali you may find not everything is paradise even there i had i haven't been there but i had somebody who who rented a house there and then yes it was lovely lovely but there's always something when you're at night time the rats were jumping up and wanting to get into the pantry and get the food so it's not no no if it doesn't if the fulfillment does not come from within in the in the now whatever you achieve will be marred by something there's always be yes it'll be nice but something will go wrong with it but something that seems to spoil your enjoyment of it is always something that's in the nature of the external world or it doesn't last long enough because then it's taken away again or you get tired of it she's like oh this is so great okay what now it's not great anymore so the foundation is there are many ways in which you can we can talk about it realize your essence identity and there's no greater fulfillment than to realize the presence that you are the being that you are beyond the person beyond the human so that you and then you become a full human being being is the foundation that's again you remember i uh you probably knew it already the story of mary and martha i taught the other day it's in the new mary represents the being dimension martha represents the doing dimension mary is deeply immersed in being martha is active doing things ultimately they're not meant to be two different people they need to become one human who is does not not lose connectedness with being when he or she is engaged in doing and so any kind of manifestation is also a kind of doing when you want to manifest something so you the wonderful thing is you can't really fail anymore because failure means you're terribly disappointed because you didn't get to that goal that's all your life has just become you've reworked for years and you tried and then you didn't arrive at your goal and then you develop the mental concept of i have failed and whenever you give too much power to the outside world and to external conditions and to future you will fail many people who are very successful temporarily in this world are also very miserable so they fail but they fail within their success they fail there are many wealthy famous people who are miserably unhappy there are also a few wealthy famous people who are okay because they have discovered the deeper dimension within themselves there are a few but but they had to go through unhappiness first and realize that's not it i'm on the cover of all these magazines and um everybody talks about me and not me i'm just giving example no there's not enough drama in my life for people to talk much much to talk about so remember the foundation for manifestation is here and now and then enjoy the doing if you're writing a book some of you may be writing a book or have written book already or let's say you are writing uh enjoy the process of writing and always connect with the stillness within when the next when the flow is not there go within connect with the stillness within become present and it's so powerful that there are many stories of people who were stranded in the snow they knew if i go to sleep now i'm not going to wake up i'm going to die and freeze to death and then finally a moment comes when the pull of sleep becomes so irresistible that they would rather go into sleep than stay alive if you are jet lagged you might feel a wave of tiredness pulling at you tired it's a strange thing we think we know what we're talking about because we are so familiar with it everybody gets tired and everybody sleeps but if you were not familiar with it you just arrived here from some other place that i mentioned where people don't sleep or where there are no people but other beings it would be quite amazing that everyone every night goes into sleep which has both the dream state and of course it has the dreamless state and in the dreamless state you just disappear completely and of course the dream state is recognized when you look at somebody who is asleep or when you look at your dog or your cat you can recognize immediately that they are dreaming because of the movement of their eyelids if you have a dog or cat it's just fascinating to watch them asleep and then suddenly they go or their face twitches with cats the whiskers go and with dogs sometimes they can be even little barks our dog used to image little noises that were dream barks so it would go like oh and then the legs go twitching too so he must be running in his dream and we do the same well except the barking and then of course from there we go into dreamless sleep for certain periods of time there's no more twitching just complete and utter annihilation of you and the animal also does that the animal also experiences or there's nobody there to experience it the animal goes also into merges with something so periodically all beings i don't know if it applies to mosquitoes do they dream i don't know if anybody knows or flies or worms those life forms do they dream i don't know maybe some scientists might know or maybe at this very moment somebody's working on a phd about the dream life of worms which would be not surprising because phds become very specialized these days but when you feel tired something pulls you towards out of this world we call it tired and we think when we use the word tired we know what it is that we're talking about because the very familiar word kind of hides the fact that we have no idea what tired really is and we have no idea what going into dreamless sleep really is all we know is that the pull of tiredness is enormously powerful and eventually you can't resist it hopefully not while i'm talking but tonight and it's so powerful that there are many stories of people who were stranded in the snow or in the desert and they or whatever they knew if i go to sleep now i'm not going to wake up i'm going to die and freeze to death and then they resisted and then finally a moment comes when the pull of sleep becomes so irresistible that they would rather go into sleep than stay alive and it has i may have mentioned it once or twice before i suggest that in your own experience when you get sleepy and when you're in bed and you feel you're going into sleep now just be aware and feel what it's like what what what does it feel like and you then you'll notice that what is usually not looked at because it's so familiar has an enormous sweetness to it this when you're approaching sleep and you're in bed that is the attraction of sleep is so sweet and of course at that moment you forget all your troubles mind activity subsides and and then it goes and then that the last moments and it pulls you and then you enter the first probably the dream state and then you go and then you go disappear so everybody goes out of existence every night for certain periods of time although in that dimension there probably is no time and everybody needs to and wants to go out of existence every night and if you didn't you would go insane if you get if you're asleep deprived eventually you start to hallucinate you start to have hallucinations instead of dreams and then finally you would go insane so we come we are in existence during the daytime do things think do and then we go disappear and suddenly we are born again go out that seems to be really you could probably learn a lot understand a lot realize many things about the universe if you just observe yourself because all those things that patterns that occur to you as a human being are really microcosmic versions of macrocosmic reality so the universe and i believe there are certain similarities here with in the subatomic realm and we're going to have a conversation tomorrow with a scientist and also who has come to join us it'll be very interesting but here i just can only talk from my own experience which you can verify in your own life that you disappear periodically and you need to disappear and you couldn't survive if you didn't periodically disappear into what we call sleep but don't really know what it is and it is good it is it feels so good to disappear into that sleep realm so we have the dimension of dream and dreamless sleep and then when we wake up we experience the ordinary we experience ordinary existence which is a kind of dream too in many respects things come and go very quickly except you kind of share it with seem to share it with more people so there are groups of people who can share the same kind of dream here we share the mill valley dream and it's quite pleasant could be worse you might be in winnipeg right now in the middle of the winter but if you're in winnipeg that's fine it's just a different kind of dream and it has its attractions too especially next to a nice fireplace there is an equivalent of dreamless sleep in our ordinary existence but most people are not aware of that and that is a dimension of consciousness that is possible for human beings that has certain similarities with dreamless sleep and although spiritual teachers and so on have spoken about it and pointed to it for a long time thousands of years it still is not common knowledge that there's a potential in every human being for realizing within him or herself a state of consciousness that is deeper infinitely deeper than the ordinary state of thinking and doing normal life i sometimes call that state spaciousness inner spaciousness or sometimes call it presence or stillness in indian spirituality india i mean india the uh they have a word for they talk about they have been talking about it they have a term for this they call it the fourth state of consciousness which is i believe you have dreamless state dreamless sleep you have the dream state you have ordinary wakefulness and then you have the the fourth state which most humans don't know that it's there for them they don't know and that is the greatest one could almost say yes tragedy of a human life is to miss that the possibility that there is in a human life to realize that fourth state of consciousness there is a an assumption by spiritual seekers even in india and anybody who hasn't realized it for themselves or even had glimpses of it there is an assumption that that fourth state is extremely hard to attain and you need countless years of spiritual practice or countless lifetimes to finally achieve the fourth state of consciousness and that belief actually prevents you from realizing it within yourself because that state of spaciousness is already in you all the time so if you have the belief that it's something that you need to achieve at some future point that belief that thought would continuously prevent you from realizing it now because you mentally will always project and then you say i'm going to meditate because i want to achieve at some point the fourth state and then you that can be a great hindrance in your meditation because it prevents you from going deeper into the present moment where the fourth state is or one could almost say it's not just where the fourth state is the present moment is the fourth state of consciousness the space of now not what happens in the now but the deeper the space in which it happens the background to your life is continuously there and continuously also often seeps through one thought be in between two thoughts you go ah three seconds for three seconds you are free of yourself and you might look at something and ah or whatever it is or just experience a moment of peace and aliveness and then of course you get drawn back into your thinking and then at another time a little space comes in again when you're maybe all kinds when you're tasting something perhaps there's just the perception of the taste without any mental interference just an aware presence behind the sense perception and then you notice that the state is always there every thought exists in that in that space is only a wave movement in the space and so it's not something that you need to attain as if you didn't have it but because it's already here it is essentially who you are it is intrinsically one with the essence of your being and if you don't know that then your life is very limited to just a little person with no transcendent dimension to your life whatsoever and so here we are in order to deepen our realization of inner spaciousness that's all it's so you realize something that is already here rather than needing to look for it so why do you often not realize it because you overlook it just like the fish may overlook the fact that it's the fish is surrounded by water and starts looking for it where's the water people keep talking about the water and the more the fish looks the less likely that it will find the water so that spaciousness is something that at first may appear in your life as a glimpse and then and at first in many people's lives they don't know that that is spaciousness they experience it as a heightened aliveness or a deeper sense of peace or joy or an absence of problems for a little moment so they don't know that this is a different dimension of consciousness that is suddenly arisen they can still confuse it with something else as I did when the shift happened and that was a rare thing in my case it didn't it happened and then kind of stayed for most people it's a more gradual thing it comes gradually first in glimpses and then more suddenly it's there for a longer period of time or you go deeper into it and there's a gradual transformation of consciousness might be so gradual you don't even notice it and when it happened to me I didn't realize that there was spaciousness I didn't have the word spaciousness I didn't know anything about the fourth state of consciousness I knew nothing about presence or even mindfulness I didn't realize even that my mind had subsided and become spacious all I knew is suddenly life is very peaceful it feels so this moment is feels so good that's all I knew and where does this peace come from I asked didn't know I didn't know it was the depths of who I am realizing the depths of who I am was joy and peace but I didn't have a word for that I couldn't call it the depths of who I am I just why am I suddenly so peaceful and I started keeping a diary which and which said I don't know why I suddenly feel so peaceful I just want to write down my daily experience of peace in case it leaves me then at least I can remember it and I wrote it's still somewhere I don't know where it is locked away I don't need to look at it but it's interesting that there was no understanding of what where did this piece originate what is this piece how did it come about so we one could say you disappear as a person but you are there very powerfully as a presence you disappear as a person temporarily but in a very powerful way that there is a presence which you cannot define and this

[Speaker 2] (6:05:44 - 6:05:56)
you then access this dimension that is one way of putting it it's pure

[Speaker 1] (6:05:57 - 6:06:25)
pure power pure intelligence all anything created arises out of that and as you invite that into

[Speaker 2] (6:06:25 - 6:06:43)
your life it can and will transform even the way in which you live as a person and that happens

[Speaker 1] (6:06:44 - 6:07:31)
without you thinking that you need to transform yourself a transformation happens even to the person although the person obviously will always have certain limitations you're good at this but you're not good at that and so on the person obviously cannot be perfect there's always certain characteristics that define a person it has form that's understood but that dimension as you access that flows into the conditioned entity that we call the person

[Speaker 13] (6:07:34 - 6:07:47)
and can even can use the personal mind and express itself through that in other words

[Speaker 1] (6:07:49 - 6:11:22)
inspiration can happen will happen more easily intuition happens more easily a creative ability develops more easily obviously you need to have some mastery some expertise in some fields then it can the this creative energy from the trans the unconditioned realm of being or consciousness can flow into what you do and transform and empower it of course you need to already in the case of activity you need to have already developed something that it can flow into in my case it cannot flow into becoming a fantastic swimmer or tennis player it's not going to happen it's not going to empower me on that level and it's too late for that nor is it going to come up in me with the it's the creative realization finding the the unified field theory in physics at Einstein unsuccessfully looked for the unified field theory it's not going to come through this mind because the mind this is not it has not developed that particular avenue through which spirit or consciousness could express itself creatively but it is expressing itself creatively through these words so not through nuclear physics or sports it can impact in the case of this particular person or or whatever it may be where people develop the great new like Elon Musk great some great latest thing about electric cars or whatever I'm not going to be able to do that this this is not how the creative energy can express itself through me nor through nor I'm going to be a great dancer it's much too late for that too but you might or it might not be expressed itself in any of those ways too it is possible that the as as you access that dimension the power of now as you access that dimension within yourself it may not even express itself through some creative endeavor it could be something else it could be the way in which you relate to other humans changes affects everybody that you come in contact with perhaps you carry on with an ordinary activity and yet a new energy comes into that let's say let's say you have the simplest possible job

[Speaker 2] (6:11:23 - 6:11:28)
uh let's say you're at a

[Speaker 1] (6:11:30 - 6:14:40)
at a at a toll bridge where you have to pay I this came to mind just now because some time ago I was at a toll bridge where you have to you drive there you have to pay to use the road it's toll it's called so you have to stop the car there's a man and a little woman in a little booth and he or she says one dollar please or whatever and then you give and I there was one I don't remember where it was that person was everybody felt better after paying the one dollar because she was so present and there was an energy flowing through her that every time every person who went through I imagine must have felt better because of because that brief interaction there was a an outflow of loving kindness meta loving kindness that comes out of this another way in which presence then manifests itself in this dimension I've already mentioned creative things creative endeavor can empower many things that you do or it may just manifest itself as what we could call loving kindness that flows through you as you go about your normal business perhaps you haven't developed any particular avenue through which presence could express itself creatively whatever it may be sports dance science musical instrument all the various things maybe you haven't developed maybe you could still develop it or not it doesn't matter in some way presence will use you as a channel and then something will flow through you into this dimension and it could be just your presence itself can be a powerful tool of transformation in this dimension so that this loving kindness flows through you into this world that affects everybody you come into contact with so who knows how this will transform your work your the way in which you experience life but it will transform it so when you bring together the human and the being instead of just being a human it's not enough being a human it's a terrible fate if you only know yourself as a human you have in other words zero self-transcendence you are trapped

[Speaker 2] (6:14:40 - 6:14:59)

in this limited little self and even the big egos the little little selves if the egos

[Speaker 1] (6:15:00 - 6:15:33)
there are some people who seem to have achieved much in this world to only through having a huge ego that is possible but the achievements are really not achievements at all because they make countless people unhappy so there's no point in building up some huge enterprise and while you're doing it you're not only unhappy yourself you make everybody else unhappy too

[Speaker 6] (6:15:34 - 6:17:29)
that does not transform this world my question is about my kids i'm grateful that when i read a new earth that it resonated with me i've been looking for a spiritual path and it just it made sense to me it resonated with me and it took i read the power of now years ago and i kind of read it and got it up here and put it on a shelf and kind of moved on but this time it seems to have yes taken a little bit more yes so i'm working at it and i have four-year-old twins and an eight-year-old some my question is um how to teach them to expose them to this because um you know my wife and i have different views she considers herself to be catholic and i don't have an association with a standard religion so to speak this seems to resonate with me so i'm just trying to get a sense for how to interact with them and to share this with them yes so the twins are how old four four yeah and

[Speaker 1] (6:17:29 - 6:23:50)
the older one is he's eight eight that's a boy the oldest is a boy and the twins are boy girl oh yeah well the most important thing is yes and many even good parents don't know that first of all the the energy field at home the energy that you and your wife generate at home which is a reflection of both your states of consciousness it is one of the most important factors so what is the general energy field that on a daily basis you and your wife manifest generate in this home environment i do know that nowadays nowadays many home environments have a very nervous energy field because everybody is so busy getting things done the parents are busy getting things done the children are encouraged to continuously do this and do that or sometimes encouraged to stop doing this or stop doing that and then they have the this additional layer of electronic devices the pads ipads and whatever other devices samsung and so on uh the parents use them the phones children begin to use them but mainly the the constant field almost stressful environment to to visit some of these families there's always something next thing to do that seems to the the underlying in the underlying energy you're seeing what's the next thing that we need to do and have you done that yet come on let's do have you brushed your teeth no okay then do it many good meaning well-meaning parents interact with their children predominantly 90 or more even 100 on the level of doing either do this or stop doing that yeah i'm pretty good at being a human doing yes that's good to be a human being yes yeah and so the being of the child is never fully acknowledged in order to acknowledge the being of the child you have to spend moments when you you you give the child your fullest attention not not your fullest attention because because you're talking about something that needs to be done but your fullest attention to for example by just listening to the child when he has something to say to you or tell a story or giving your fullest attention occasionally by just observing them or him or her observing as they go about their life in the house it just needs to be a few minutes where your attention rests upon them even if they are sometimes not directly interacting with you because by by observing them at play for example without telling them to do this or that or don't do this or that but simply allow your attention to rest on them and watch them if possible in that state of relatively as much as possible thoughtless awareness where you're just the aware presence for the children and then occasionally when you come in when you they come close to you to look into their eyes doesn't have to be long they don't even have to you don't don't say let's look into each other's eyes you look into their eyes when when you talk to them when they talk to you and in that moment of looking you connect with their being so that part of your interaction with the child is not based on doing but on a flow of being towards the child so that you connect on the level of being that means you acknowledge the deeper reality of that child you truly acknowledge their being i would suggest that in modern families in most modern families children very often get read in states of anxiety or great restlessness later becoming in teenage years becoming states of antagonism and anger and i would suggest that often the child doesn't know why there is this anger and restlessness it often goes back to the parents inability or they they've done everything for the child on the level of the on the doing level but the children feel unseen by the parent they feel unseen in their being they are not acknowledged in their being and if they are unseen that vital dimension of their being feels starved it is not encouraged by the child and and the deepest connection with the child is missing the parent doesn't know that they think i'm really a good i'm doing all i can make it makes sense because with the four-year-olds in particular i get what you're saying i get with all of them but in particular with them they're not getting that i can see that they're they're angry about not getting the attention that they want they throw really big tantrums yes and my my four-year-old son actually gets physically angry yes so yes yes yes now you

[Speaker 6] (6:23:50 - 6:24:18)

[Speaker 1] (6:24:18 - 6:27:50)
don't give them the attention when they demand it through throwing a tantrum that's not the moment to give them although when the tantrum does happen it's good if you can be spacious and allow it to be while it happens instead of reacting so that they don't pull you into a similar state of consciousness when you get angry because they are in a tantrum so if you can then take that as a signal to be really alert and present and observe and so the that is not the moment though to connect because the child at that moment isn't there's the pain body is there covering up the essence of their being so the moment they demand attention is not the best moment to give them attention because the demand for attention can also be an egoic thing so it's not necessarily that they want the ego doesn't want attention on the deepest level it doesn't know what the deepest level is the ego wants a different kind of attention it wants to it wants you to to strengthen the ego in the child and so it's often is also a desire of the ego to control the environment because there's no other ways so very young children cry very loud it's an attempt of the developing ego to exert some control over their environment and that's good not to give them what they need what they demand there but give them attention in other moments and the real attention is let your awareness rest upon them look at them see them they want to be seen that's their being acknowledge their being so that that's don't again i have to repeat it because it's so important don't always interact only through doing or don't do this don't do that which tends to be the case with families and with your wife the same make sure that there is some spaciousness in your relationship no busy how the no matter how busy the household is make sure there is some spaciousness in the relationship between you so that there's some spaciousness emanating from both of you some peace even though you may be busy but there's some peace emanation into the energy field in your home that comes from you and that's children respond very much to the energy field that they grow up in that affects them very deeply so there's and the interaction between you and your wife is what generates that energy field and then give them attention doesn't have to be long periods of time but often at night before bedtime and during the day watch them listen to them occasionally fully and don't interfere with some kind of advice necessarily just listen just look acknowledge their beautiful being which is there and that's the greatest thing you can do for the child

[Speaker 3] (6:31:33 - 6:34:13)
hello friends welcome welcome everyone welcome everyone to this live teaching session with Eckhart Tolle it's on how presence can transform our lives this session is presented by Eckhart Teachings and Sounds True and my name is Tammy Simon I'm the founder of Sounds True and it's an absolute delight and honor to be able to host this live teaching session we'll be exploring presence and its power and this session occurs as we are opening up registration to an online program with Eckhart called Doorways Into Presence you can learn more about the program at Eckhart's website EckhartTolle.com it's a program that explores 14 different gateways into presence delivered over the course of seven weeks two gateways a week in the experience as a community practicing entering and moving through these portals together to give you a sense the gateways include meditating with a candle contemplating the question who am I meditating with the sky everyday activities like drinking a refreshing cup of apple juice and more one of the practices one of the gateways that Eckhart introduces in Doorways Into Presence has us enter what he calls inner body awareness and Eckhart here in this special teaching session I was wondering if you could start by sharing with everyone who's joined us how the inner body is a gateway to presence what the link is and then actually take us into the guided experience of attuning to the inner body as a doorway into presence how does that sound as a way to begin?

[Speaker 1] (6:34:18 - 6:57:12)
Thank you Tammy hello everybody that sounds like a wonderful idea presence we could say is the dimension of consciousness most humans are only occasionally present for brief moments and some humans are almost never present at all and those that are present for brief moments usually don't recognize the significance of that their mind interprets it in a different way for example as a moment when they felt particularly alive or deeply at peace or full of life energy but usually they attribute that to some external cause so presence as a dimension of consciousness we could call that a higher intelligence that humans can access and recognize within themselves and that higher intelligence can bring about can manifest in many different ways in a person's life for example as a heightened creativity so that you're able to become more creative in whatever endeavor you're engaged in you have a creative flow suddenly happens and flows into your mind brings about new ideas that nobody has had before can improve the quality of whatever it is that you're doing whatever activity you may be engaged in it improves the way in which you perform that activity because when presence flows into what you do you do it without ego the fact that presence has arisen within you means the ego has subsided when presence diminishes usually the ego returns so for many humans for quite a long period of time they fluctuate those if you are if you have entered the awakening process as many of you have you will fluctuate from being present to being drawn back into mind identification identification with thinking which is the ego so you access presence as a dimension of consciousness and in what way it then manifests in your life in what way it changes your life varies from person to person you may not even create anything new because it presence may not necessarily manifest as a heightened ability to to become creative it could just be that it greatly improves the quality of your relationships with other humans or your ability to enjoy life the present moment deeply it enables you to have empathy with other human beings and other life forms that before perhaps only happened rarely because the ego cannot really have true empathy with other humans or life forms empathy compassion loving kindness benevolence that flows out from you towards the world all life forms other human beings all these are manifestations of presence so it is the ultimately the only absolutely worthwhile thing to realize in your lifetime i don't call it achieve i call it realize because achieve implies that presence isn't here yet and you need to work hard make efforts in order to bring presence into your life but that's not how it is because presence is already there within you waiting to be realized it is waiting to be realized so presence is the it is a realization of presence it is not to become present is not an achievement because that would be an egoic thing or i i am present now i have achieved it who has achieved it no presence has arisen the ego has subsided so it's the realization of presence is already there underneath the incessant stream of thinking that most humans are identified with and underneath that there is this vast realm of unconditioned consciousness which we could also call stillness so to find that to this to realize that is the most important thing in your life it is a as i see it is the purpose of human existence is to embody the flowering of presence the arising of presence which on a collective level is the next stage in the evolution of humanity and is the only thing that can save us from the madness of the human ego both in its individual and collective aspect presence you cannot understand conceptually what it is you have to experience it realize it so there are doorways into presence into that realization and they these doorways they direct your attention away from where it normally is which is your attention or your consciousness is trapped in the stream of conceptualization and thinking for most humans almost a hundred percent of their conscience is trapped in that continuous stream of conceptualization which is involuntary incessant thinking and so we need to reclaim consciousness from the stream of thinking and then discover what is there beyond the stream of thinking not anything that is separate from the stream of thinking but is related this vastness of presence is related to the stream of thinking in the same way that the waves or ripples on the surface of the ocean are related to the totality of the ocean so most humans only know themselves as the waves and ripples on the surface they are surface phenomena that is the horizontal dimension of human existence that's all they know they know themselves as surface phenomena but there is a vertical dimension the intersection of course expressed in this symbol of the cross horizontal dimension vertical dimension presence is the vertical dimension so we have doorways that enable us to reclaim attention from the stream of thinking one of these doorways a very powerful one is the inner body another one that is closely related to the inner bodies and i often combine the two into one another one is awareness of your breathing sounds very simple awareness of your breathing so here for our practice i'm going to combine the two into one because they are very closely related awareness of your breath of course goes back thousands of years it's a very ancient spiritual practice very powerful spiritual practice why is it so powerful because it's a simple way of reclaiming consciousness withdrawing it from the stream of thinking by placing awareness on the inflow and outflow of your breath which means and i'm not not just talking about it but as i speak you can verify it experience it here now being aware of your breathing begins with the simple fact that you notice that breathing is happening that's simple enough mostly of course you wouldn't notice it it's usually unconscious but something in you makes it happen you cannot stop it something if you wants to live and the breathing happens now you suddenly become aware that you're breathing some of your attention is moved away from thinking and is now accompanying the inflow of the breath into the body the attention is linked to the breast now so you could say you observe the inflow of the breath into the body and you observe the outflow you feel it you sense it observe is a visual thing and we're just using the term but you sense it you feel it the inflow and the outflow and while you sense that if you're really present with your breath you will notice you're not thinking you cannot be aware of your breathing and think at the same time so it's a very simple wonderful way of taking attention away from thinking most of which is useless anyway i'm not talking about constructive thinking creative thinking but all the useless thinking that humans are tortured by you breathe in and as you breathe in you can feel the air going or the energy of it flowing all the way into your abdomen and as you read as you breathe in the abdomen rises slightly and as the abdomen rises slightly you can sense an energy field within there there's an energy that is that is the beginning of sensing the inner body the the animating presence within the body so your the the breath awareness and body awareness can go together breath awareness takes you into body awareness and you can continue to to experience both at the same time as a single experience so let's continue with that practice inhalation into the abdomen and as you reach the end of the inhalation for a brief moment two or three seconds you pause you hold it there before you breathe out again at the end of the out breath you also pause for two or three seconds and there's a deep stillness there in that pause you breathe in again abdomen you feel the energy that is the inner body there and breathe out and a moment of cessation deep stillness and then start again you breathe in abdomen hold that feel the energy and breathe out and the next time as you breathe in feel the energy in the abdomen and now you can feel the energy in the abdomen actually spreading out into the rest of your body like this is a place from where the energy spreads out you can feel the that your legs are alive your chest is alive your arms are alive you can feel the animating presence that gives life to the body the invisible vast intelligence that sustains every moment that sustains the incredibly complicated functions of the various organs of your body and coordinates them all unbelievably complex thing there is the body and there's a vast intelligence that is there it is invisible it is part of the consciousness that you are of which the thinking mind is only a tiny fragment and so this vast intelligence the animating principle that gives life to the body the invisible you before and not you become conscious of it or it becomes conscious of itself when you feel the inner body but let's continue breathing in abdomen energy spreading out throughout the body and breathe out and now we can shift our attention this is a relatively short practice we shift our attention mainly from your breathing to the feeling of the inner body energy the animating presence within the body feel that you're still conscious of your breathing but at the same time you're conscious of every cell in your body is alive you can sense in your hands you can sense there is this very subtle sense of aliveness in your hands in your feet in your legs your arms your chest and now slowly you can feel the totality of the body inner body as a single field of energy intensely alive and your attention remains there and you continue to be aware of your breathing but at the same time you feel this wonderful energy that pervades the entire body it is not the physical body it it makes the life of it is the life behind the physical body because the physical body is not life life is the invisible presence of consciousness itself and as you feel the inner body there's little or no thinking and you're very alert you may even want to close your eyes for a moment in order to feel the energy of the inner body even more every cell of the body is alive this by the way is a very healing thing to do there's enormous healing power in that inhabit the body the body loves to be noticed to be known so you feel that and you continue to be aware of your breathing also and it may be possible for you as your eyes are closed to perhaps even let go of a physical image you may still have in your mental image you may still have of your of your body so that all that remain and remains in your awareness is no longer the body but that energy itself that no longer has any form and now you have reached a level of presence which we could also call awareness in which you realize that this vastly intelligent energy field is consciousness itself before it becomes a person and you are that presence you are that presence that is your true identity so the person is a passing phenomenon and ultimately you are not a person you are that vast energy that

[Speaker 2] (6:57:12 - 6:57:33)

[Speaker 1] (6:57:35 - 7:05:09)
briefly takes on the disguise of a person on the horizontal level of your life and then you hold that it is so once you connect with that realize that that is that your essence it's a wonderful realization and then you hold your attention there remain there and enjoy yourself in a deeper sense of the words enjoy yourself enjoy the being of you the enjoyment of being the enjoyment that you are of being i am this is why in india this realization is called it is the sat chit ananda sat is the being chit is consciousness ananda is the joy that that you feel that is the conscious being is joy conscious being realizing that you are i am without adding anything to it the primordial beingness of life itself that is a very deep realization that liberates you from the person when you realize that the person becomes a something you can play with enjoy for a while never take it too seriously it's like a role you play but you are not the role it's just something that unfolds but you are you can be rooted in the in the being of you that's why in the old testament moses asked the story goes moses meets god on a mountaintop and he asks who are you god says i am the i am one of the most profound statements in the bible then moses says what shall i tell my people when i come down from the mountain what shall i say who spoke to me what what shall i tell them god says it's a story god says tell them that i am spoke to you did moses understand what he was saying i don't know um and then we make a jump into jesus gospel of john before abraham was i am said jesus before that is the timeless dimension of consciousness itself that is the essence of who you are it manifests as on this horizontal dimension it manifests as a physical body but that's not what it is it is a disguise so this is presence the realization of presence the most important thing in your life and even as i speak now perhaps as you're listening some of your attention will be on the words you take in the words but you can continue to feel the inner energy field of the body even as you listen and that that is a very important part it's not just here i'm aware of the inner body and then the rest of my life i lose myself again in everything no you can be you can stay conscious and at the same time perceive and even act and speak still feel the connectedness with being connectedness with being so that frees you from the ego because now you no longer need to derive your sense of who you are from the whatever your mind is telling you about who you are your memories your narratives your stories which you call my life that no longer yes you remember the stories what happened but they do not give you your sense of identity anymore they your sense of identity comes from a deeper place and so it liberates you from the narrow troublemaking ego identity that's true liberation ah and then you look at another human deeply and you can sense that they too are that divine presence even if they can't if they may not know it but if you can sense it in yourself you can sense it in the other so then your relationships change because you then you you should yes you still relate to a person whatever the person is but but but not only to a person you also relate to the transcendent dimension of that person which you recognize as one with your identity and that recognition is love true love recognition of oneness so this is we just encapsulated the entire spiritual life that is the essence that that is the essence of all spirituality and it's simple but tammy may have another question for us we have received a question

[Speaker 3] (7:05:09 - 7:05:52)
specifically eckhart about this gateway of inner body awareness because you describe it as so enjoyable and we have some participants in the doorways into presence program who have said yes sometimes it's very enjoyable but sometimes when tuning into the inner body it can actually feel like rough waters disturbing a lot of intensity anxious feelings like that and we're wondering how to work with that in this gateway yes thank you tammy that's a good point

[Speaker 1] (7:05:53 - 7:21:23)
often people ask that question so as you direct your attention into the inner body you may feel more strongly something that was already there in your emotional field which may not be pleasant a disturbance in many cases this emotion it is an emotional energy in many cases this emotion is anxiety or fear very common in other cases that emotion may also be residual anger those are those two are perhaps the most common forms of disturbance that people feel and many humans continuously in the background have an emotion that is either that is anxiety that is the most common or anger which is also fairly common there's also possible there's a deep sadness that is also sometimes occurred a gloomy energy a dark gloomy energy so whatever it is it is emotion that lives in you and perhaps has lived in you for a long time sometimes it's some it's caused by something that happened only yesterday and it's still the emotion still lingers in you but in many cases it is almost always been there sometimes very much in the background at other times a bit more in the foreground and suddenly you feel it more strongly because your attention goes there and there it is let's say it's anxiety it lives here somewhere and you feel that disturbance as you go within now the important thing is you've taken attention away from thinking by directing your attention into the inner body and that is a good thing because then the emotion that you feel as you direct your attention the focus of your attention of on the emotion emotion then cannot rise up into your mind and use your thinking which is what it often does so when you feel anxiety the anxiety can cause you to think anxious thoughts and every anxious thought adds more energy to the anxiety that you feel and some humans live like that some humans continuously live like that they worry they're anxious they're fearful and the emotion and the thought processes are linked unconsciously thought feeds the emotion the emotion generates even more thought it's a vicious circle but if you direct your attention to the emotion itself then the emotion cannot use your mind anymore you you just observe because you are the there's an awareness there now the awareness that this is a disturbance within you and what you do is first of all you recognize it for what it is it's an energy field that is there you can feel it now that is a big difference from what normally happens in the unconscious state of humans because in the unconscious state the emotion becomes you you become a fearful person an anxious person it takes you over and when you direct your attention to it then it is still there but is it can no longer pretend to be you in other words by placing the your attention on the emotion emotion cannot become a person it remains as an emotion it's recognized as an emotion and you are aware of it and then first thing you do is you accept that it is there because it's the present moment and whatever arises in the present moment you better accept it because it already is it is so you can't argue with what is so you better accept that this is there you acknowledge it it is a disturbance within you an energy that does not feel pleasant but yes it may even be quite acute maybe perhaps it's intense fear then use your breath as described before breathe into the abdomen and then feel that the fear you decide that as much as possible you would like to release this fear and allow it to flow out with your breath and so you breathe out the fear as much as possible or the anger because you decide that you don't really want it or need it but the ego likes to identify with it the ego loves those things it says i want no i want it but it does want it so you it breathe you breathe it out and then some of it may still be there when you've done it a few times that's fine and then you feel the rest of your body where the where this energy is not present not the fearful the anxious or angry energy may not be in your hands or your arms or your legs your hands arms legs are fine they are perhaps not affected by this thing that you feel in your chest or belly area so you feel the rest of your body is alive you feel the energy in your hands and your legs and your arms and your breathing and there's still some of that emotion is still there but there's been a very significant shift from being the emotion to being the presence behind the emotion to being the space in which the emotion exists so the shift of identity you are the space for the emotion you're that you are the awareness behind the emotion as you know this i call this old emotion that lives in a human being some for many years we i call it the pain body the pain body is accumulated old emotion and that pain body as you become present gradually it becomes released sometimes in exceptional cases it can suddenly really be released in an instant but in most cases it takes a while it can take you you experience it again and again sometimes it takes you over again but more and more you become aware of it and don't mistake it for what who or what you are you are not the emotion the emotion lives in you you are the awareness behind the emotion you are the presence that witnesses the emotion so one could say almost that here's the here's the unpleasant emotion and then there's the space around it and that space around it so to speak which starts with the inner space of your body that space around it becomes bigger and then you notice that who you essentially are is the space around the emotion but not the emotion itself one could say that the emotion is like a block of ice frozen energy and then gradually it dissolves as you bring the light of consciousness to it but can use that analogy painful emotions the pain body cannot survive for too long in the light of consciousness so just being aware of it is important or that it may not feel pleasant at first but it's worth it won't kill you it's not that bad but it may kill you if you're so unconscious that you totally identify with it but recognizing it it won't kill you you can have a little bit of unpleasantness that you can have a child it's more difficult if a child experiences very because of environment whatever happening in the child's life if a child experiences painful emotion the only thing that the child often can do is cut themselves off from it because it's too they cannot tolerate the pain so they have to push it out of awareness that's the only thing a child can often do and then so it's pushed out of awareness because the child would not be able to live with it then as you become an adult you can tolerate it but many adults are still so trapped in that child pattern of not wanting not thinking it is so threatening i cannot allow myself to feel it but if you do allow yourself to feel it that is the beginning of the transmutation transmutation is the correct word transmutation because that painful emotion can become transmuted it's actually it's trapped consciousness on a lower vibrational frequency so it can be transmuted into a higher frequency then it becomes freed it becomes liberated so it's sometimes the case that people who have a lot of negative emotion in other words a heavy pain body those people often are much more motivated to awaken because they can't stand the pain anymore and they become more motivated to become present and then all that trapped emotion which is low vibrational frequency consciousness at a low vibrational frequency is suddenly freed and becomes transmuted into the higher frequency of presence ah and that's and that you see perhaps a deeper meaning behind the old idea from medieval times and beyond of the transmutation of the alchemy the transmutation of base metal into gold that was the external interpretation of it transforming base metal into a precious substance of gold so there's the alchemists worked with that there were books written about alchemy but the the they are all really talking about an inner transformation the transformation of human consciousness the transformation of pain into presence of suffering into consciousness transformation of the alchemy the alchemical transmutation of suffering into consciousness and that is the ultimate purpose of human suffering yes human suffering can end challenges no suffering can end but it has a purpose until it brings about this alchemical transmutation then you rise above suffering you will still face challenges in life but these challenges will not be transformed into suffering suffering amazing amazing process so eventually you will be thankful for you for your suffering and for the emotional pain that you have had because it was an essential part of your awakening

eckhart i just have one final question for you you mentioned towards the beginning of this live teaching that many of us in the process of awakening experience a fluctuation between being identified with our thinking mind and our emotions and presence there's this fluctuation and i'd love to hear more about your guidance on how we can make a lasting shift so that living with presence becomes our new way of living each day yes the important thing is present moment awareness

[Speaker 1] (7:22:22 - 7:34:08)
because that's all there is sometimes people wonder will i be able to sustain presence what do i how can i sustain presence better forget about that the the only vital question is am i present now or am i lost in my mind that's a vital question you can only be present now so the point of power is in the present moment now how can i how can i be present in the rest of my life it always comes back to the present moment in this awakening process many times probably you will lose yourself again in your mind you lose yourself in the horizontal dimension of life you lose awareness of the vertical dimension the being of you you lose you lose yourself in the doing unaware of being and when you lose yourself in doing which includes the primordial doing is thinking doing the thinking and then all the outer doing and all the things that continues to demand your attention they're all mental phenomena anyway so that you lose yourself in doing you lose yourself in your mind you lose yourself on the horizontal dimension and then inevitably some form of suffering very quickly when you lose yourself on the horizontal dimension very quickly some form of suffering will come into your life usually it's anxiety fear anger stress impatience regret feelings of envy of countless negative feelings all kinds of things can come in and so we could call it suffering we can call it the most generic term would be unhappiness in one form or another arises and that can be you can learn to recognize this when it arises we could call it a dysfunctional mental emotional state you recognize it for what it is and you say oops i must have lost the present moment you get stressed about something you get upset about something oh i must have lost the present moment you can you can use it as an alarm clock that tells you wake up stay awake you can return your the moment you realize that you lost yourself you have a choice you can continue to go back into the horizontal dimension totally trapped in the horizontal dimension or you can step out of it and enter the vertical for a moment take a conscious breath feel the inner body don't believe your mind when your mind tells you no i don't have time for this you do have time for this because it doesn't take much time to take a conscious breath or feel the inner body by taking conscious breath let's say something upsets you in daily life irritates you upsets you and you can feel thoughts associated with you by the way it's more likely you're not upset by the situation you're upset by the thoughts that you have about your situation the situation is as it is every situation is as it is the upset is caused how how you enter your mind interprets the situation a negative narrative this is awful i can't stand this anymore why why did i why can't they do this he shouldn't have done that he should have done what all kinds of narratives so you realize that's losing yourself in the unconscious thought processes so you gradually learn to return to the present moment again and you lose yourself the moment you notice that you lost yourself some presence has returned because if there are no presence at all you would not even know that you are lost in your mind you would be so lost that you wouldn't know that you're lost and if you don't know you're lost in your mind you're truly lost it's the same way let's say a person who is mentally ill if they know that they are mentally ill there is some chance of recovery but if you are truly mentally ill you don't know that you're mentally ill you're so taken over by the mental illness you're totally lost in it but when you are unconscious in a normal sense that is also this normal being unconsciously and completely identified with your thinking mind now you may not be people you you're not mentally ill in the conventional sense of the word but the way i see it the normal state of human unconsciousness is a state of mental illness so normal the normal state of human unconsciousness has this it's not entirely mentally ill but it has a strong element a strong pathological element to it if that were not the case humans would not create this havoc that they create on the planet and have done for a long time so there is a strong element of something deeply dysfunctional in the human mind also wonderful things but always marked by something very deeply dysfunctional and that is the condition that all the ancient traditions have recognized they called it uh unconsciousness or delusion the state of being spiritually asleep the state of original sin which really means it's an original dysfunction that everybody inherits christianity got original sin some the state of suffering that the buddha says is normal that every human they can't get out of it unless they awaken suffering is normal unless you awaken if you don't awaken buddha says wherever you go whatever you do do whatever condition you encounter sooner or later and usually sooner you will encounter suffering no matter where you go or what you do it's very very true unless something changes within you you awaken so they all point to some fundamental dysfunction that humans are born with and this is ultimately this looks like a very negative thing but ultimately it is this fundamental dysfunction that will provide the brings about the suffering and the suffering brings about the desire to awaken the the that is the that the motivating factor behind wanting and needing to awaken out of that unconsciousness that motivating factor is provided by suffering so suffering is both good and bad amazing quite amazing so presence then you you need to find a moment of presence as the moment you remember that you are lost you can choose to be present if only if only take a moment of presence even in a complicated situation that you're dealing with take a moment of presence breathe in feel the inner body become familiar with the feeling of the inner body become familiar so that you can easily quickly go there and direct your attention away from thinking and to drop down into inner body field the being of and if it's only in terms of temporal time maybe it's only a minute and even a minute it makes a lot of difference here if you can find 10 20 times a day one minute of presence make will make an enormous difference in your life and quite soon a minute will become a bit longer and then gradually it's no longer you no longer need to interrupt your activities to be present after a while you develop the ability to sense presence in the background of your life even while you're engaged in dealing with things in the foreground and that is reconciling the horizontal and vertical dimension in your life that is across at the present moment is the intersection of the horizontal and vertical so you deal with the horizontal without losing your rootedness in the vertical and that is the mastery of life and that is the fulfillment of the purpose of your incarnation here so it doesn't matter externally what the circumstances of your life are because in any circumstances you can you might be imprisoned any circumstances you can find this uh find the intersection between the vertical and the horizontal so that you become a human who is able to deal with the things on this world in this world without losing him or herself in this world you're rooted in the transcendent

[Speaker 3] (7:34:16 - 7:36:49)
that concludes our session for today heckart thank you so much and thank you to everyone for being with us how presence can transform our lives again this session is occurring as we are opening the registration for a program that's called doorways into presence and just to share personally for one moment we filmed this program over the course of several days and at the end i had the feeling that the way that these 14 gateways were professionally filmed and delivered with so much clarity from eckhart the instruction and the guided experience where the viewer does it right along with eckhart that this was historic actually and was tremendous medicine for the culture for all of us in the society and you know i've recorded so many different programs but there's a couple handfuls where i've had this moment of kind of chills in the back of my body of knowing the historic nature and the power of the program and that's really what i felt with doorways into presence again it's 14 different gateways that eckhart takes us through it's delivered over seven weeks there are live community sessions and an online interactive practice guideline workbook additionally people who participate in the program will receive a two-month membership in eckhart tolle now which offers over 400 hours of eckhart's teachings so again you can learn more at eckharttolle.com here in the present moment thank you thank you for being with us thank you friends heard uh

[Speaker 11] (7:36:49 - 7:37:38)
just a few minutes ago before you came on stage that there was a bit of a rush to get very close proximity physically to you and i think i've i might have heard you mentioned before the idea of a silent transmission of the teacher between the teacher and the student and we just talked about how someone who's deeply unconscious in a room when you go in that room with them you can feel it and it's you can feel the pull and therefore when you're with someone who's very conscious and present you can also feel that and feel open yes can you can you speak to that a little bit about the physical presence of yes someone yes there is the

in addition to the words that are being spoken the the words come out of a certain state of consciousness so when we meet there is the dimension of the verbal dimension the words that are being spoken but there's also a state of consciousness out of which the words come and that state of consciousness also emanates it's less noticeable than the words because the words the mind looks for the words and mentally they are taken in the sound is decoded translated and in addition to the words there is another dimension of teaching that is the emanation of presence and i'd like to i'm glad you bring this up now because for the second part of our retreat i'd like to have a little bit more silence also so that you can or many of you will be able to directly sense that power of silence and if you can sense silence coming from me or stillness rather that means it's also in you if you can sense that there is an emanation it must be in you if it were not in you you wouldn't even know it so if you can sense there is a silent emanation behind the words or silent emanation when no words are being spoken then that's a wonderful thing that can strengthen your own presence it's a bit i believe i used the analogy

in one of the books of a burning a burning log in the fireplace there's a log and if you put it next to another log that's burning strongly then that will help the block that only just started to burn maybe burning is not the best analogy but it's burning in a good sense because in a way what's being burned up here is the unconsciousness of the ego the unconsciousness of the ego can be burned up through suffering and this is happening to most people on the planet that is how they make progress spiritually through suffering a lot of it self-inflicted or either on themselves or by humans on other humans and the other way of burning up the egoic self is through exposing yourself to a spiritual teaching or teacher and that can be done through a book a book has a certain power that is released if it came it if the book was written from presence in some strange way which i don't know how it happens the words still have a certain power the moment you read them and if there is an opening into presence in you they can the words can put you into presence so there are many people who read my books they've read them several times and they pick them up again and again not necessarily to learn something new on the level of information although that can also happen because sometimes you realize when your conscience has changed you hadn't really understood something that you had read previously but you pick up the book because just reading one page or half a page can put you again into the state of presence so there's definitely just as unconsciousness spreads can you an un very unconscious human can infect many others around them with unconsciousness and nowadays you don't even need to be around them you can infect others through the internet so the internet has a lot of it can be very infectious and a lot of unconsciousness in itself of course it's neutral it can be used to spread consciousness and i'm attempting to do that of course but it is also used to spread unconsciousness so it's a neutral thing can be used for for higher purposes and lower purposes yes a state of consciousness infects others presence i would no longer use for presence i would no longer use the word in fact because it has negative connotations presence uh can pull others into presence so that but only if there is some opening in the other there needs to be that receptivity the it is almost to say that there is an a faculty in a human that in many humans is dormant or completely obscured and that faculty is the faculty of presence it's like an organ that is not operating yet but not a physical organ the ability to be present is a faculty a potential in every human being that still in most humans is still dormant and at some point in a person's life that something happens to awaken that faculty and it comes to life and when that happens and often it happens through suffering but it can happen in some cases there are some children born these days that already have that openness i've met some who are already born that was perhaps almost unknown in my generation they're already born with that faculty that's already awakened so they are immediately receptive even at the age of six they would be receptive to it i wasn't i believe i don't know but but there are also some and those tend to be born also into relatively conscious a relatively conscious family so definitely there is the wordless teaching and there is the teaching through words and both operate stop cherishing opinions now he's not saying stop having opinions because that would be difficult you can't at one stroke give up all opinions when the mind becomes active especially in a conversation opinions are expressed the egoic mind usually needs to respond in order to assert its existence or strengthen its sense of self particularly with opinions it can happen easily that before you know it you have been taken over by a mind stream the question is whether there's at any given moment there's enough presence in you so you can be aware of the movement of your thoughts in a conversation that's the challenge otherwise you're lost in the mind stream and the reactive patterns of the mind a good practice is to become aware of yourself listening when somebody says something be aware of two things when you're listening to another person but the other person may be voicing an opinion or gossiping or criticizing somebody else as is often the case when you're listening be aware of two things rather than one thing so make it into a spiritual practice be aware of obviously what you're listening to the content and at the same time be aware of yourself as the listener the presence that makes the listening possible the presence in you that makes the listening possible so as you sit with people you are there as a listening presence in addition to being aware of what they're talking about you feel your continuing presence there and now if you never said anything that would be an easier practice but at some point of course you will probably because it's a normal human situation you will probably begin to speak also and then the important thing is not to get taken over by your mind stream you need to be particularly alert when a negativity comes in as you mentioned gossip about other people you find yourself you say agreeing or disagreeing so you're taking up a mental position is there is there something in between that is not necessarily agreeing not necessarily disagreeing in between the two mental positions of acceptance of what they're saying or reinforcing it with your opinion agreeing to it or disagreeing is there a neutral space from where you can simply observe possible mental positions mental positions in others and your own tendency to adopt a mental position one good practice i believe i even recommended it somewhere in the book is when everybody expressing their opinions whatever it may be about a good practice is and let's say it makes nobody's asking you let's say for your opinion and it makes no difference to the situation so they are not trying to decide some course of action but simply people are simply putting out their opinions you can observe the almost compulsion to give your opinion especially things like politics or other favorite things that people love to express opinions about you might feel the compulsion to say something and as a spiritual practice just let go of needing to put forward your opinion so in other words you ask yourself what happens if i don't express my opinion how does that feel of course it doesn't make any difference to the situation or who you are so to just refrain from unnecessarily expressing your opinion is a spiritual practice in itself and at first you feel almost that you're losing some of your identity when you're not participating in that but you're actually going away from egoic identity to a deeper place of awareness so the the pull of the mind is very strong when you're discussing things and other people are expressing their positions identifying with their positions be aware observe in other people the emotional charge behind their mental positions also observe how there's no there's no awareness of their of their mental position is complete identification with the thought streams so be there when you're with people be there as an observer also not just as if somebody's participating observe the force behind mental positions and if you see it in others how they get taken over by their opinions the buddha talks about the the thicket of opinions and how people get entangled in that really what he's talking about is identifying with thoughts so the thoughts become you and so people get trapped in the thicket of opinions as the buddha puts it and of course one zen master i can't remember the name recommended as a spiritual practice a very simple but powerful spiritual practice stop cherishing opinions he actually said don't seek the truth just cease cherishing opinions stop cherishing opinions there's no need to seek the truth stop cherishing opinions now he's not saying stop having opinions because that would be difficult you can't at one stroke give up all opinions nor is it necessary but he says stop cherishing opinions to cherish means really to identify to give your to have your whole sense of self in your opinions which are mental positions stop cherishing opinions stop identifying with the mental positions then you can still have them but you are not they don't have you that's a fundamental difference for most people who are unaware in other words for most people they don't have opinions you can almost say the opinions have them they are energy forces mental energy fields that take possession of you completely and then it's not you think you have an opinion no the opinion has you the mental position has you it'll it's kind of like a parasitic presence in you so great spiritual practice rather than looking for the truth or god or self-realization or enlightenment stop identifying with your mental positions stop cherishing opinions that's a spiritual practice thank you hello

i live in las vegas nevada which is very mind dominated and uh it's tough there um there seems to be two forces in my mind that's build up energy and it's very strong and it keeps me from uh getting in touch with my true self into creating more space and cultivating that space one of them is that it's not that interesting i'd rather go along with interesting thoughts and do interesting activities and also i have this fear that if i don't analyze and constantly think about like solutions and things in my life that everything's gonna fall apart so it's hard those two forces are built especially where i live it makes it even more increases it more so the energy

field there is a kind of nervous yes actually i work in a casino too that's a wonderful challenge to stay conscious there yes it is that's your spiritual practice right i've been there i've walked through some of the casinos in amazement and the it's it's a quite a place that seems to come out of some kind of dream when you walk around las vegas it's a but it's actually quite interesting when the mind doesn't label it it's actually quite amazing oh all these all these strange life forms and what they have created it's quite amazing it's there's an intense aliveness there would i want to live there i don't know there have been some spiritual teachers who moved there i know of at least two i think it was andrew harvey a spiritual teacher moved to las vegas and there was a spiritual teacher called vernon howard who lived near las vegas and there may be one or two others why they moved there i'm not sure perhaps they maybe they loved it or perhaps uh to pay less tax perhaps who knows the well the challenge of course is uh to stay present and have stillness inside you that what you mentioned now you need to think about your your life problems or your life this is a very very common uh assumption unconscious assumption in humans that if i don't think about my problems my life is going to fall apart i need i have to think about my life and what's going to happen and transfer of course nothing is going to fall apart if you stop thinking things will get better if you stop thinking with the exception of focus thinking in case there's a specific problem that needs to be addressed then focus thinking and then step even there stepping back into stillness so it's a wonderful thing if you're able to be present and still in las vegas then of course you're a master it's many people have been able to be present and still out in nature be a beautiful forest or the seashore or on top of a mountain and you watch the sunrise wow very still so still let's move here says the mind let's move here where it's so still and then wherever it is and if you do move there for a while it'll be wonderful oh it's so still and then of course the mind is becomes restless after a while there's nothing happening and you're not challenged by anything anymore if you have a meditation practice then you can of course convince yourself that you have finally achieved and you meditate five hours a day and let's say somehow food is brought to you as i remember a monk i knew buddhist monk telling me that story that he meditated in a hut up a mountain in thailand for half a year and he attained complete peacefulness peace nirvana he thought and every day somebody would bring him a bowl of food nothing to worry about nothing to do just be present and still the only challenge were mosquitoes he said but he learned to deal with that in other words to just completely accept and not mentally label it and just being used by them for food so he was came with that that was one challenge then he had to go back into the city to renew his visa because he was in thailand and he was a westerner and at the visa office they kept him waiting for one hour two hours and he was in the wrong lineup for two hours and then he had to start lining up somewhere else and when he finally got to the window the man said oh no you haven't filled this out you do that again and he started so that was he then suddenly realized he had not attained nirvana so you're much better off in las vegas the thing is to use whatever environment you are in as part of their spiritual practice does not mean that you have to be stuck it may be that a deep sense of that you need to remove yourself suddenly comes to you and then you go somewhere else that could happen because it seems like more of a challenge there yes yes so that's it's it's probably in many ways a better place to practice than a monastery right i never thought that way and worrying about your life or your problems is a very common belief that that is necessary to hold things together but it's not you have to recognize the futility of of worrying and realize your life is already together you're breathing you're eating when you need food you sleep when you sleep you go to work you do what you do you look around contemplate look at the sky look away now Vegas is very much a man-made or human-made environment everything is kind of artificial not to say fake so everything is fake that's fine it's not everybody that much but there are trees there are some trees in there there is the sky there's a light there's the desert you can easily get out and you're out in the in the stillness so you can take advantage of that but you need to and so be happy with where you are and accept where you are and then while you do what you do in the casino what do you do there i'm a dealer at night time with the drunks yeah yeah place your bets and then yeah and then you can observe human nature there around you most definitely yes every facet you observe human nature in its unconscious state mostly yeah but that's fine that's where they're at you can be the the presence for them yeah it's hard not to judge them oh yes that's your practice not to judge because they are expressions of life of aliveness right in their form they're beautiful too

[Speaker 7] (8:04:23 - 8:05:30)
yeah okay thank you so much hello um i live in las vegas nevada which is very mind dominated and it's tough there um there seems to be two forces in my mind that's build up energy and it's very strong and it keeps me from getting in touch with my true self into creating more space and cultivating that space um one of them is that it's not that interesting i'd rather go along with interesting thoughts and do interesting activities and also i have this fear that if i don't analyze and constantly think about like solutions and things in my life that everything's going to fall apart so it's hard uh those two forces are built especially where i live it makes

it even more increases it more so the energy field there is a kind of nervous yes actually i work in a casino too well that's a wonderful challenge to stay conscious there yes it is lots of discipline yes that's your spiritual practice right i've been there i've walked through some of the casinos in amazement and the it's it's a quite a place that seems to come out of some kind of dream when you walk around las vegas it's uh but it's actually quite interesting when the mind doesn't label it it's actually quite amazing wow all these all these strange life forms and what they have created it's quite amazing it's there's an intense aliveness there would i want to live there i don't know there have been some spiritual teachers who moved there i know of at least two i think it was andrew harvey a spiritual teacher moved to las vegas and there was a spiritual teacher called vernon howard who lived near las vegas and there may be one or two others why they moved there i'm not sure perhaps they maybe they loved it or perhaps uh to pay less tax perhaps who knows the well the challenge of course is uh to stay present and have stillness inside you that what you mentioned now you need to think about your your life problems or your life this is a very very common assumption unconscious assumption in humans that if i don't think about my problems my life is going to fall apart i need i have to think about my life and what's going to happen and transform of course nothing is going to fall apart if you stop thinking things will get better if you stop thinking with the exception of focused thinking in case there's a specific problem that needs to be addressed then focus thinking and then step even there stepping back into stillness so it's a wonderful thing if you're able to be present and still in las vegas then of course you're a master it's many people are be able to be present and still out in nature a beautiful forest or the seashore or on top of a mountain and you watch the sunrise wow very still so still let's move here says the mind let's move here where it's so still and then wherever it is and if you do move there for a while it'll be wonderful oh it's so still and then of course the mind is becomes restless after a while there's nothing happening and you're not challenged by anything anymore if you have a meditation practice then you can of course convince yourself that you have finally achieved in you meditate five hours a day and and let's say somehow food is brought to you as i remember a monk i knew buddhist monk telling me that story that he meditated in a hut up a mountain in thailand for half a year and he attained complete peacefulness peace nirvana he thought and every day somebody would bring him a bowl of food nothing to worry about nothing to do just be present and still the only challenge were mosquitoes he said but he learned to deal with that in other words to just completely accept and not mentally label it and just being used by them for food so he was came with that that was one challenge then he had to go back into the city to renew his visa because he was in thailand and he was a westerner and at the visa office they kept him waiting for one hour two hours and then he was in the wrong lineup for two hours and then he said to start lining up somewhere else and when he finally got to the window the man said oh no you haven't filled this out you do that again

[Speaker 12] (8:10:32 - 8:10:35)
and he started shouting

so that was he then suddenly realized he had not attained nirvana so you're much better off in las vegas the thing is to use whatever environment you are in as part of the spiritual practice does not mean that you have to be stuck it may be that a deep sense of the need to remove yourself suddenly comes to you and then you go somewhere else that could happen because it seems like it's a challenge there yes yes so that's it's it's probably in many ways a better place to practice than a monastery right you never thought of it that way and worrying about your life or your problems is a very common belief that that is necessary to hold things together but it's not you have to recognize the futility of of worrying and realize your life is already together you're breathing you're eating when you need food you sleep when you sleep you go to work you do what you do you look around contemplate look at the sky uh look away las vegas is very much a man-made or human-made environment everything is kind of artificial not to say fake so everything is fake that's fine it's not everybody that much but there are trees there are some trees here and there there is the sky there's a light there's the desert you can easily get out and you're out in the stillness so you can take advantage of that but you need to and so be happy with where you are and accept where you are and while you do what you do in the casino what do you do there i'm a dealer at night time place your bets and then yeah and then you can observe human nature there around you you observe human nature in its unconscious state mostly but that's fine that's where they're at you can be the the presence for them yeah it's hard not to judge them oh yes that's your practice not to judge because they are expressions of life of aliveness right in their form they're beautiful too yeah i can see the beauty of life after reading one of your books there's a very strong desire or wish to share this realization did you also feel such feelings after understanding what happened does this come only from ego a strong desire to share what you know what you've read now hopefully it's not only what you have absorbed through reading the book but something that you also know in your life experience if you've only absorbed it through reading the book then it is uh generally speaking premature to share too much with others except when a special occasion might arise when it is helpful to tell somebody well what i have a nice quote for you from what i read and it might help somebody but on the whole you need to at least begin to live it before you can show the way to others and it's not always ego the desire if there is a desire built into a spiritual realization it wants to spread of course it wants to reach others but the way it happened to me was just organically spontaneously after a while people would sometimes come and ask questions and i didn't know the answer beforehand the answer only came after listening to their question and that is the true spiritual teaching you don't teach what you've read in a book you teach what you know for yourself never attempt to teach anything that's not part of your own life experience then it's not a true teaching and others may even resent it or you may get into trouble because you're trying to convince others that you are right and they are wrong and if it's it you can recognize ego if you want to get in there when nobody has asked you there's not an openness and yet you want to get in there change somebody's life because you know the answers that is very probably your ego trying to control somebody else's life and telling yourself that this is a good thing so on the other hand anybody who awakens as you begin to live this spiritual realization this awakening the way in which you interact with other people changes and the way in which you interact with other people begins to affect other people even if you do not specifically say anything about anything spiritual so you cannot not teach when you begin to become transformed and you go through the shift in consciousness gradually you begin to teach in a wider sense not in the narrow sense of me teaching you no but it's the presence spreads and sometimes no words at all sometimes it can just be being with a person and listening to them in presence and perhaps you don't say a single word it could be lives sitting with a dying person and just being there as a still presence and you haven't uttered a single word because you didn't need to and yet it was a wonderful your presence was vital for that moment and that person so the teaching can come in many forms not necessarily verbal the teaching can come in a moment of non-reaction when somebody is unconscious around you or attacks you verbally and the teaching will come when there's absolutely no reaction in you and then the person knows what's happening he's not feeding my ego not feeding my pain but you know the person wouldn't even know that but they can so in many so it can take many forms and some of you are already engaged in a more formal teaching i know that some of you are already practitioners of this or that where you meet with people and that the presence flows into whatever you do and others many others will become here will become teachers if not formal in some other way it may just flow into what you do and all your the people you meet in your everyday life who knows or it could be a total shift that life takes you out it puts you somewhere totally different so there is this desire to teach is you have to be watch within yourself to see so to make sure that it's not your ego that wants to change others and get in there when they haven't asked for any help at all and don't want to know but you may also find that as you teach and the teaching again comes when people ask a question you say something has happened to me and perhaps is already happening to you or will happen to you you find yourself saying things that arise spontaneously because you were listening in presence then suddenly you say something that you didn't know yourself beforehand it is helpful for this person in this situation and you go oh i said that where did that where did that come from and that's wonderful you discover your own the source of wisdom within yourself and that happens to certain therapists after several years of therapy at first when you're a therapist you apply your particular modality of therapy and if you do it for long enough after a while you you just begin to just if you if it's really working the modality that you have learned to apply to the therapeutic situation becomes less important and then after a while you're just there as an as a presence then it's then that you become an effective therapist at that moment your therapy becomes empowered and then you find you are suddenly of real help to another person but why because you have gone into the state of not knowing rather than being in the state of i know the answers because my look my degree certificate is on the wall i know the answer you have gone into the state of not knowing and that's where wisdom suddenly arises so there have been therapists some famous ones who worked in that way and then other people came and tried to make a method out of it i believe that was the case with nlp there were certain therapists if i remember correctly that worked very effectively and then some people came in how do they do it how do they move their hands what is their body movement and then they discover things like they mirror the other person's body movements the the client or the patient sits there and then the therapist goes if the client does this the therapist does this or the client sits like that but the therapist did that intuitively he didn't even know he was doing it and i discovered i often do that i did that when i sat with people it just didn't there was no decision around it just happened because you tune into the other person in not in on every level and it just it just happened does it still work if it becomes a technique rather than arising out of an intuition i don't know that's my favorite quote of the dalai lama by the way i don't know he often says that because he's comfortable but not knowing and often after that he says interesting things but first he says i don't know and the mind still says i need to awaken where's the awakening it's looking for the kingdom of heaven as if it could be found as an op like a like you find an object science to be perceived well where's the kingdom of heaven oh there it's coming oh no it's over here where's the awakening the enlightenment the fireworks i've been waiting for the fireworks for 10 years nothing's happening so you find it arises spontaneously in certain either when it's things are helpful conditions around you are helpful could also happen when they seem the opposite of helpful and there's chaos around you or drama people are screaming or whatever or something has gone drastically wrong and suddenly instead of reacting suddenly you find you become very still and alert but all that that is an awake that is part of the awakening so it's not really an event that you can take on so this is the this is what happened to me or it for it very rarely happens some human beings go through a permanent shift but that happens very rarely for most humans it's a gradual transition from constantly being engaged in the stream of thinking and being dragged along by the stream of thinking one thing after another including the thought when am i going to awaken i've been to audit was what's the point in carrying on it's not hasn't happened yet it's all part of the stream of thinking transition from that to at first the occasional arising of something else that heightened alertness or aliveness that replaces thinking in which thinking can still take place but it's no longer compulsive and it's a space with really where thinking is unnecessary you have risen above thinking that is the awakening

[Speaker 6] (8:27:15 - 8:28:17)
i would just like to thank you for this morning's talk my uh mother died friday died on friday i just thought it was so appropriate and the peace of mind that gave me what you said this morning was fantastic that wasn't my question uh the question i had was really related to with all the talks you give the retreats and and advice uh have you ever looked back and thought afterwards that man i wish i wouldn't have said that or boy i goofed up there or this this was a mistake thank you thank you

[Speaker 1] (8:28:27 - 8:33:21)
well only the pope is infallible you know the the teaching if we can even call it the teaching of course is not mainly based on information not primarily based on any kind of conveying of information or facts but on on its most fundamental level the teaching is awareness awareness which is non-conceptual so that can't be wrong uh so on that on the most fundamental level nothing could possibly be wrong because it is it transcends all concepts that's the essence of the teaching the moment you move into concepts the possibility of error of course arises but the first of all the first level of concepts that are used are concepts that point back to that which is beyond concepts and beyond thought so the concepts that i use in the teachings are concepts that are whose purpose is to point back to that which is beyond so and that also there can't be much wrong about that except that it could be that i used a pointer that perhaps uh was not the most appropriate one for a certain person or group of people that could happen if we but you again error doesn't really apply here it just it might not be the best possible point and maybe i wake up in the middle of the night and say oh i could have said that that's maybe possible but usually it doesn't arise next level up occasionally i let information slap in about to illustrate certain things i might talk about something historical or might talk about some fact about something i read in the paper or whatever just as little illustrative stories and of course that's where things occasionally get wrong even in the power of now i wrote for example that 100 million people had been killed in the 20th century alone by other humans and i later realized that was the figure was much too low apparently it's quite a bit higher it could be 140 million nobody knows exactly it's dreadfully high and so i got that wrong and and sometimes in talks i might something may come in a historical fact or something and i later somebody tells me you got that wrong in one talk i talked about depressed antidepressant before taking depressants antidepressants and i wasn't perhaps careful enough to emphasize that you should do this extremely slowly with the help of a conscious physician and so on and there was one or two physician in the audience who get up got upset and this is all wrong it's all wrong that's usually what happens is that the answer to a question or even the general talk always there's a correspondence between the questioner and the answer or when there's a talk there's a correspondence between the energy field in the room and what comes out and that's not decision based there's no there's nothing in my mind that says oh in this energy field i'll better talk about that because i don't know before the words come out what's going to come out so that doesn't apply and so it can happen though that a person asks a question and an answer comes and i later realized that the answer was not the deepest answer that i could have given but i do know that the answer that comes out reflects the degree of openness in the questioner usually and so if the answer is not that deep then the question wasn't that deep that seems to be often the case occasionally some deep answer comes even when the question is not deep but perhaps there's an intuitive realization then that it is possible to break through the surface layer this question no your question was deep enough thank you

[Speaker 6] (8:33:25 - 8:33:30)
well i do want to say this morning was was perfect you were right thank you thank you

[Speaker 1] (8:33:30 - 8:57:43)
thank you the so there's an ancient saying of course which you may have heard that which is the teacher and the taught together produce the teaching so it's a two-way process it comes out of presence it doesn't really come out of a person it comes through the person who is empty enough spacious enough so that it can come through it's not off the person so on the surface level then yes mistakes are quite possible on the most essential level no i had a i knew a person many years ago uh i only knew her for about a year then she died she was a psychotherapist and she would sometimes come me come to see me i was still doing a private sessions then she would often come to see me once a week or so to ask questions and her questions were so wonderful like the deepest answers came with that person always and i said to her maybe we should record because your questions seem to be so draw out these wonderful answers and she agreed and then a little later she was too ill and she died and just before she in the months before she died she went through this shift where she didn't need to ask any more questions she went through a complete presence shift surrender to what is and her body became virtually transparent and luminous and she was just there and then she didn't need to ask any more questions so it was too late for recording anything just the shift happened and the flowering happened and that was enough thank you thanks this question has a contains a slight misunderstanding of presence but it's a fairly common misunderstanding it can probably be explained very briefly the question is i'm afraid that if i become enlightened i will not be able to relate to others i will not say to my son you can't do this or that i will let him do whatever he wants even if it is wrong how can i be enlightened and have an agenda on the present moment point i just allow everything to be a common misunderstanding of presence when you respond to the present moment you don't have an agenda that's not an agenda as the questioner here says you have an agenda when you have a pre-planned sequence of things that you want to happen or want somebody else to do then you're not in the present moment but responding to whatever it is that the present moment requires that is not an agenda that is a freedom from an agenda so there's an error in the question and of course to be able to tell somebody like a child to stop doing something for a good reason not because you want to exercise control but because whatever the child is doing may be dangerous so you have to respond to the need of the present moment and this is what happens in presence so presence and again there's a misunderstanding here which is allowing everything to be that is misinterpreted by some people as if it meant that you never say no to anything or anybody so you if your child climbs on a on a high wall and to the other side there's a cliff i allow the present moment to be as it is the the allowing to be is an internal thing rather than an external thing so allowing to be is it often happens you may have observed a child goes into a dangerous situation the parent suddenly panics and they run and grab the child they might even hit the child i've witnessed it and they shout don't you ever go there again you could it could kill you don't you see that this is a curb you shouldn't cross it there's a traffic you could have been killed and they shout at the child you don't ever do that again that is non-acceptance and the acceptance is that a child does these things and you take effective action you don't fight against what is you take effective action there's not an internal resistance which is a totally misinterpreting how a child behaves and the the shock that some parents in their panic or their fear give their children leaves a dreadful trace inside in in the children contributes to the formation of the pain body of emotional suffering because a child is very sensitive when you scream at a child even though your intentions may be good because you wanted to protect the child but you're screaming at the child and of course it's it's like even if you don't physically hurt the child you are hurting the child energetically it's extremely harmful and this is part of non-acceptance of what is so when a child does something dangerous as you're present you take effective action without fighting against the isness of that moment which is what the child does so you pull the child back and you explain this is this is very dangerous and there's no anger the anger always comes when there's a non-acceptance of what's going on it's internal and that puts you in opposition to the with the to the present moment and so you and then anger arises and resentment arises because this shouldn't be happening so the action you take is much more effective in the absence of inner opposition then you can take truly effective action and you're not causing in eastern terms bad karma because when you there's an outflow of negative energy you you are causing suffering to yourself and others and that's karmic and if you shout at a child many times to your child many times during childhood then most likely he or she is going to do the same to their children until somebody finally comes who discovers the power of presence and then breaks the cycle of karmic whatever they inherit karmically so allowing the present moment to be as it is does not necessarily mean that you cannot say no but you say no in a clear non-confrontational way not aggressively you just say no oh there's no negativity behind that very different from the aggressive no that is against what's happening you may have seen the movie with Jim Carrey i think it was called yes man uh he he goes to a he goes to a new age guru and listens to a seminar and this is a the character that he plays is very negative he loves saying no to he's a mortgage consultant or at a bank and his favorite occupation is to say no to people and he's a continuously negative state no no straightforward no you can't have a mortgage no and somebody takes him to the new age guru who teaches that whatever life gives you say yes to it say yes to life to everything to everything and at first he they make the character resists and then he says oh that might be interesting and then the rest of the movie shows you that from then on whatever happens he says yes and he goes with it and gets into the most incredible and absurd situations and of course it's a misinterpretation of of a basic truth of an inner yes to the present moment which does not necessarily mean an outer yes to the present moment so when somebody says okay offers you a okay do you want to i have this great drug i mean they don't call it drug i don't know what the the words are the hit you want the hit or whatever you don't say i'm not in touch with these things but uh you don't say okay i need to accept the present moment say okay i'll i'll have it now in the movie that's what the character would do and he does all kinds of things like that that's a misinterpretation you can clearly when you say when you're present you can say no to something which is non-confrontational no it you do not make the other person wrong by saying no to that you're still there is still benevolence there is still kindness and you can say a very loud no and still emanate kindness or benevolence you say no no no i'm not getting into this car with you because you're drunk i'm not i don't want you to drive me home and i would recommend that you don't drive home either to get out of the car so you say what's needed you i call that in the in the power of now i called it a high quality no no as opposed to a low quality no so and coming back to the movie as if you haven't seen it i'm not taking away the pleasure of seeing it by telling you that at the end in the end he he realizes that it wasn't quite right and i think if i remember correctly he comes to he realizes it doesn't necessarily mean doing everything that somebody asks you to do it's an inner thing rather than an outer thing so that is very common often been asked that question a very common misunderstanding of what allowing this moment to be what that actually means in practice and saying yes to what is it's an inner yes whether it's an outer yes also or whether it's an outer no depends on the situation but if you don't have the inner yes then you have a loss of goodwill a loss of kindness as like in the example of the parents shouting at the child if we say the world is crazy are we judging no it actually is crazy so how is that not a judgment what judgment really means in spiritual terms is to equate something that you see in another a deficiency a characteristic that is regarded as not so good to equate that with who that person is in their essence their identity you if you make if you see unconsciousness in another human being which you can do easily unconscious behavior either in an individual human being uh they get insanely angry they get depressed they misinterpret everything they project their insecurities onto you they project their fears onto somebody else they want to they make enemies everywhere complete and when you it would be absurd to say oh no this person is fine i'm not judging you but you can clearly see that the behavior is totally irrational and insane and creates continuous suffering for themselves and others so you see that whether or not you verbalize it is secondary but you see it and you might say this person it is unconscious which it does not mean you equate their behavior or what they do with who they are if you make an identity out of it then it's a judgment so if i said human beings are crazy that would probably be a judgment but if i see their behavior as crazy and realize that is the egoic mind operating in them they are manifesting behavior that corresponds to the present evolutionary stage of human consciousness it is not who they are it is the way in which they manifest the unconsciousness that is still part of the collective human consciousness that's all so basically the answer is when it's not equated with who they are when it when you are not making an identity for them out of whatever behavior they manifest then it's not a judgment the judgment becomes when you say he is or she is such and such for he's a liar let's say that he's a liar that's the judgment judgment he often lies is not a judgment because the you can see that the lying is something that that is a manifestation of his egoic state of consciousness for him he believes presumably that he can gain some advantage from telling things that are not true enhancing himself or whatever many egos say things that are not true to enhance themselves for example but the moment i make it into an identity he is a liar that's a huge trap i have put myself in not just him i've put myself in because i've made an identity for another human being out of their unconscious behavior once i've done that once i have attached a huge label mental label onto another human being next time i meet this human being i'm not not really meeting them anymore i'm meeting my judgment i'm looking at them through the screen of the label that i have already given them that i've mentioned to others do you know what do you do you know that he's a liar don't you yeah okay here next time he comes you're not meeting a human being you're meeting a liar and by doing that you have yourself reduced yourself you get trapped in your own judgments the way in which you relate to this person is diminished you're not relating freely anymore to that person you yourself become constrained by your judgments because it will then control this the the mental concept will control your behavior towards him also so as that's why i believe it was desert when you judge you you judge yourself or something like that so there we need to be careful when you when we make pronouncements about others when we transform their behavior that we deem unconscious into an identity for them okay now that becomes extreme when somebody's extremely unconscious even then it applies he's a thief now it may be true that he is living is by stealing things but you need to be careful with these things because it could be that this person suddenly realizes perhaps in prison realizes the transcendent dimension in him or her and wakes up and even a murderer could wake up and it has happened and does happen that if they suffer enough as they will a moment comes not necessarily in this lifetime but for some it has come they wake up people who have murdered even more than one person they have they wake up and suddenly the unconditioned consciousness emerges and it emerges because the suffering that afflicted not only on others but on themselves through their actions was so extreme that the ego self-destructed and then something emerges and suddenly they wake up now therefore i would say even to call someone a murderer is a judgment but to say that to recognize that this person may be dangerous even to you that we he may need to be confined to prison because he's a danger to others that's the case but to impose to make an identity nobody nobody is incapable of waking up even seemingly very evil people seemingly very evil people sometimes awaken only through intense suffering in their case but anytime we make an identity for a person out of something that they do that becomes a huge limitation that we impose on them and on ourselves so you see clearly what a person does but it's not what this person essentially is and the same applies to groups of people or humanity as a whole if we say the world is crazy which means of course human beings the human beings are crazy what we are saying is many human beings alive on this planet are still unconscious and manifest behavior that corresponds to their unconsciousness they create suffering for themselves and others and they know not what they do and then when you hear this in the religious book it says forgive them for they know not what they do really forgive them means don't make an identity for them out of what they do they just they but don't deny it either you don't say oh no this this is fine he's just he just kills people it's he's okay right so the deeper meaning of forgiving somebody is to recognize that in essence that's not who they are which does not mean that they do not have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness that happens by itself and sometimes this karmic consequences of a person's deep unconsciousness may come through the judicial system and sometimes through other ways not that the judicial system is always just

so

[Speaker 1] (8:58:04 - 9:15:59)
so that has to be the foundation for your life and becoming embracing the isness of this moment how can you run away from it how to how do i strike a healthy balance between simply accepting life as it unfolds and actively working towards and striving towards goals destinations aspirations balance between accepting life as it unfolds and actively working towards and striving towards goals destinations aspirations well accepting life as it unfolds of course is the foundation for conscious and sane living accepting whatever unfolds in the present moment there is nothing else that's the foundation does that mean you cannot have goals you cannot have aspirations wanting to achieve this do this do that it's perfectly compatible with accepting what is arriving in this moment one difference between the unconscious state which denies this moment and wants to make it into a means to an end all the time the difference then is what is the motivation for your doing if you deny this moment can never embrace it honor it appreciate it then the motivation for your action is basically dissatisfaction with what is and the action is looked towards as a possible way of overcoming the discontent and the dissatisfaction that you feel with the present moment and that's a very normal pattern and that's in for many many people that what is what motivates them they don't feel good enough they don't feel there's something they feel there's something fundamental missing in their lives they don't feel recognized they don't feel loved whatever and so they try to find something achieve something that will bring them that which they feel is missing they don't realize that it's that is not going to work you need to start with the foundation for your life which is this moment and go deeply into that and become okay with it friendly with it realize it's the only thing there ever is just this moment nothing ever exists that's not this moment so you might as well become friendly with it and appreciate it and look around and see how actually it's okay this moment is actually okay and if it's not okay that you can still say well that's what is right now something goes wrong that's what is and then things will come in that you want to do you suddenly an idea comes or you need to do something to make a living and then out of that state of becoming one with the isness of the present moment something rises and wants that wants to take form in the world that perhaps you want to create and then you create it out of the joy of doing instead of out of a feeling of lack that you need something to make you complete or happy so the motivation changes from neediness and discontent to joyful doing it's not stressed anymore when stress is a sign that you've lost the present moment the next moment has become more important than life itself the next moment was being only a thought so the future is a thought in your head nothing else let me know if you if i'm wrong if you ever meet the future let me know so you have to in your own experience you have to see whether i'm right whether whether the future can actually be which seems so important doesn't it more important than this moment surely isn't it well if it's so important then where is it does it ever come as i said i'm let me know if you find it you won't of course there's only this moment so that has to be the foundation for your life and becoming embracing the isness of this moment how can you run away from it there's nowhere to go except in your mind and the mind does it all the time it always goes somewhere else so you can still do because you enjoy doing and you you see how it contributes to the awakening in one way or another if you if you live if you practice present moment living you cannot not contribute whatever you do you cannot not contribute to the awakening you can have the simplest job you can have a job at a toll booth at the bridge and the cars come up and you say five dollars please and even there you interact with hundreds of people every day for a few seconds even there if you are completely present something will flow as you take their money and say have a nice day something will flow out of you to the other person and you contribute to the awakening no matter what you do your present state of consciousness spreads affects others so discontent discontent as the motivation for doing is replaced by the enjoyment of doing what you do because what is the point if you are not enjoying what you do what is the point now sometimes you may say oh i can't possibly enjoy this but you may be surprised how many things you can enjoy doing and if definitely if you find that absolutely you cannot enjoy something whatever your job is then of course you need to walk out and don't stay with unhappiness live with unhappiness and do something that you cannot tolerate and be and surrender to and do with if not with joy at least in a state of acceptance the world is full of people who are doing what they don't really want to be doing not only their jobs but also at least any action they do at the moment if you really look closely into them they're going about their daily business and a lot of the time what they're doing there's something inside them just doesn't really want they don't want to be where they are but they are there but and they're doing this but they really don't want to be doing what they're doing so there's a reluctance often in people there's a resistance to what they're doing to where they are where they have to go it's so common people many people have lived with it their whole lives and they don't even know it anymore because when you have lived with it's an inner state for so long you don't even know it it's like the the humming of the refrigerator it goes on for a long time you don't even hear it anymore but when it stops but suddenly then you say wow was this noise there all the time didn't even know it anymore so their inner states that people live with of discontent and resistance but they've become so familiar they don't even know it anymore is presence possible for me if i have problems with my attention i'm burnt out and depressed and it is very difficult for me to be present with people and situations and this is the same person as far as i can see who somewhere else asked me something like i've been following your teachings for 10 years and no change has happened in my life the same person you say i am burnt out and depressed and it's very difficult for me to be present with people and situations one thing that you can that is not a help but a hindrance is the thought i am burnt out do you need that thought is that actually true it may be true that your energy level is low yes yes even the thought i'm depressed again these are concepts that arise in your mind you identify with them and you already you believe there's nothing i can do not if you're if i'm burnt out how can i be present but that's just it's an idea in your head you start with the reality of this moment which is not an idea about it but to simply face what is without the carrying some identity in your head that you are a burnt out and depressed person that's a conceptual identity it becomes can become a conceptual identity so let's you start with what is not a story about what is or a story about who you are because the story may be so negative that it that you believe in it and it becomes a closed door your entire sense of identity becomes a closed door so you begin with what is you can say you can't be present with people and situations is that true or is that just a thought because you have to find out for yourself you go into a new situation a place somewhere can you be present can you look around go to a cafe have a cup of tea or coffee sit let go of the i'm burnt out i can't be present just be and look perceive you can do that you don't need the highest energy level for that perceive look feel the energy field of the your inner body anybody can do that you can feel some life in your hands starts with a tingling sensation perhaps or warmth and in your feet and your legs and your arms and then you feel that not a big deal and then you look around and you your senses are awake you look you listen noises people you breathe in the air perhaps you taste the tea or the coffee and you're entering the present moment no big deal just entering the present moment and then you become aware of the fact that you are here that you are a conscious presence that perceives the world around you well that's that's a good start and it's not a challenging situation but that's how you start when you're not being challenged and so the next time you talk to someone can feel the inner body you've been following this teaching for 10 years and your mind keeps telling you that because you're burnt out and depressed you can't do it that's an illusion it's it's very simple don't believe in any idea in your head that what your mind is saying about who you are and then it becomes very simple then listen to your friend speaking to you feel the inner body as you listen if you can only feel the inner body feel that a little bit of aliveness in here throughout the body that means it's beginning to work for you and perhaps it's started to work already but your mind continuously denied it otherwise why would you carry on for 10 years so it's quite possible that it's there's already a beginning of an awakening but because you're listening to your mind it's denying it so I just wanted to point you in the the right direction here I'm sure I will hear from you again and you let me know how it goes this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation

[Speaker 10] (9:16:32 - 9:17:11)
I take care of patients from surgery chemotherapy hospice end of life and there's that that same pressure on all aspects not to spend the time and take care of them maybe the way that we would like to if we could so I'm doing this to help take care of me which is great but my question is related to all the other physicians that I work with who are suffering and I can see it in them and it's the more that I learn your teachings the more I see the suffering in them and I don't know what to do to help them I think I saw your question I had selected it to answer it if it was written question that might have been yours that was good so I'm glad you were chosen have you had made any attempt to somehow convey this to your colleagues maybe unsuccessful attempts

[Speaker 10] (9:17:50 - 9:18:18)
so far to some degree just over the last couple years there's been real research showing you know burnout and that's a definable thing and so we can use the term burnout which doesn't seem to offend people to talk about it and then I can we I've introduced some mindfulness strategies because that's another term that doesn't seem to offend people I was just going to say that mindfulness

[Speaker 1] (9:18:19 - 9:19:45)
has become almost acceptable so you can if you use that word that might be more acceptable than presence it's the same thing of course but I don't use mindfulness because it implies that your mind is full but that's okay so what about creating a support group for people who work in similar capacities both people that you know personally and perhaps other people because nowadays here the strange thing is the wonderful thing about the technology that we have nowadays not only it amplifies human madness because any person can put out any thought and immediately no matter how crazy it is there will be a few thousand people in the world who will respond to it and agree with you and participate in the craziness but on the other hand there's also you can reach so many people through the media those things internet and so on but you would start on a small scale what about a mindfulness group for physicians you could call it that you can become the leader of that because

[Speaker 12] (9:19:53 - 9:19:53)
okay

[Speaker 1] (9:20:00 - 9:25:39)
sometimes life asks you to do something it may ask you to do something before you may think you're ready for it but life knows better and the strange thing is you as a person would never really feel ready for this because it's it's hard to do but if you can become still and get out of the way because becoming still means getting out of the way if you can become still you'll be amazed and i'm not only talking to you but many others you'll be amazed how empowered suddenly the words that you speak become or the energy that flows through you and how inspired you become and what it might lead to because things need to change if we the the system not only in medicine but in many other areas is bribed for either collapse or complete change it cannot go on the way it's going because it can only become more disintegrating and the no matter where you look it's a question of it'll either collapse or change and if it collapses that's fine too now i'm talking about social systems and so on in general eventually something more conscious will arise or something more conscious may arise and transform the old before it collapses completely so what is it that you could the ideas will come to you you can just offer to them for example have an a meditation show show them what mindfulness is see if they like it and then go on from there and then transmit it go on the internet contact others uh it may suddenly spread there are people in mainstream who are doing this i got invited by a scientist to stanford university a couple of years ago i gave a talk there and you would have thought they would not be interested in what i have to say but that i was wrong they were very interested now not everybody came but many people did come and this is a scientist who actually he is a i believe he's a neurosurgeon and he teaches at stanford he is extremely interested in mindfulness and spreading the message he's connected also to buddhism and buddhist teachings so maybe he can also you can talk to him and see what feedback you get from him it's good if you can i don't know if you've met other physicians here if you can build up a support network of people who can then support others um there are infinite possibilities but you anybody who is here would have to consider themselves as a leader in this because you may not yet be fully present all the time um and fully enlightened continue on a daily basis but you know much more than most i mean and i don't don't mean conceptual knowledge there's a knowing in you of that dimension of consciousness that is still new still many and i believe that the world desperately needs you and you start in your world you can reach the most appropriate place for you to reach others is within your sphere of influence and that is your work so what exactly what form that will take only you can know it will be helpful to connect with others get feedback talk about it what can we do and then the person at stanford i believe is professor james doti doti unfortunately i don't know how to spell it d-o-t-y something that i can let you know um so see yourself as a spearheading this movement of awakening because they need you so not only your patients need you your colleagues need you and then the work that you do which is wonderful will be enhanced immeasurably by bringing a different state of consciousness to it and once that happens then the entire system may begin to undergo a change change always begins within how do you feel about this

i'm a i'm a little speechless but it's a crisis and and i think that uh it really is a crisis and so if i know you're speaking not just to me but to others that are here and and and i think that we need to do this in all aspects of of medicine so if i can help

[Speaker 1] (9:26:17 - 9:27:10)
so thank you for giving me the the push thank you i know that dr patel and his wife is here he's been coming for many years and have you met him he i believe he has a in his cancer clinic in field he introduces also counseling and mindfulness maybe you can connect with him thank you this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation

[Speaker 5] (9:27:49 - 9:35:28)
namaste so i can feel the energy kind of rise a bit in the room so let's release some of that energy some of you know what's coming okay we won't stand because there's not much space except for the front row so you can kick off your shoes if you like leave them on it doesn't matter if your feet don't reach the ground sit forward a little bit some of you may wonder why what is she going to do if you've never experienced this so energy gets trapped in the body the belief in any forms thought forms emotions events that happen in our day-to-day life so we're just going to release that a bit it's like releasing the past so we become that empty vessel for consciousness so let's just start by just wiggling a little bit maybe wiggling our sit bones in our seat so the whole body is relaxed and then allow the head to wiggle and the jaw to drop and maybe the shoulders to wiggle and your hands to wiggle your fingers wiggling and just wiggle wiggle wiggle no thought just wiggling and sigh if you'd like ah just release that energy ah and you can do this at home too for those who are watching through that wormhole and now we begin to just stomp our feet a little bit you can raise your arms up if you'd like and just stomp and let's release vocally feel different yes yeah and then we can just settle right into our bodies into the stillness that goes beyond the conceptual mind i can feel the stillness returning and from this place of stillness let's just do a meditation a short meditation or who knows maybe it'll be long okay sitting comfortably in your chair body is relaxed eyes are closed if you wish imagine the crown of your head being lifted towards the ceiling your sit bones rooted on your chair your feet planted on the floor your hands could be facing face down on your lap or face up or your hands clasp together whatever feels natural and comfortable for you in this moment let's just let go of the concepts let go of names labels ideas just become aware of your breathing oh and become aware of your body is there any tension tightness or pain just let go of those labels and just simply feel because all they are is sensations experienced in the body okay relaxing your body from head to toe if thoughts arise just notice just let it go return your attention to your breath to your body let's bring your attention to the inner body that feeling of aliveness within if you don't know what that feels like just simply raise your hands off your lap just hold them up in the air palms facing up and then you can ask yourself how do i know i even have hands and simply feel

just a quick reminder of very easy access to the present moment dimension easy access is sensory perception alert sensory perception in breathing inner body awareness inner body i sometimes call it a portal into a presence and of course breathing and inner body awareness are closely related almost they merge into one as you may know i often recommend to start with the hands when for people who have never experienced inner body awareness and you can do that with people that you know who are not especially not open to any anything else that's so-called to do with so-called consciousness spiritual whatever can you feel your hands oh that's not too spiritual nobody should be object to that and say i'm not into that spiritual stuff well your hands just your hands and that works with people who otherwise have no idea what it is that you're talking about you ask them to close their eyes are they are your hands still there yes how do you know you're not touching anything well i can feel feel them it might take a while before they can because they may be so much stuck in their heads that they can't get their attention down there and then at some point you might say children can probably do it fairly quickly can feel them oh well if you can feel your hands and you perhaps you can feel your feet too yeah okay well then and then gradually the rest of the body that's one entry point another one is you start with breathing as you know i don't give many techniques this is the closest we are getting to a tech technique you start with breathing conscious breathing now you may know that that's just a part that i sometimes recommend in daily in your daily life to occasionally take a conscious breath so that you break the incessant stream of thinking if only for five seconds and two conscious breaths even better but that's not where i'm going right now this is now entering the inner inner body awareness starting with the breast rather than starting with your with your hands and you you breathe consciously don't without overdoing it it'll be a little deeper than your normal breath and the the quickest way most is to do abdominal breathing so as you breathe in you feel that the air is going all the way into your abdomen of it isn't really but because i don't think when you breathe in the air will actually go into the abdomen but what goes into the abdomen is your conscious attention because your conscious attention is following the breath and as it goes when it is in the abdomen it rises slightly because now the abdomen is full of air not really but that's what it feels like uh hopefully it's not full of air it feels like that but it's actually an energy suddenly is there that you didn't notice before because your attention is moved there so you you ride so to speak your attention rides on your breath as you breathe in and then as when it's in the abdomen it's good to when you feel it's full then you hold it just for a few seconds it could be three seconds it could be up to five before you start breathing out again when you reach the end of the out breath a short cessation before you start breathing in again that's also a very calm point the end of the out breath is basically you've died so the it's a miniature miniature death because every out breath is a is a miniature death and then the start of the in breath you're born again and you grow up reach maturity belly is full and then you start declining again so the end of the out breath is also just a short pause just to notice the end of the out breath there's a still point when the in breath hasn't started yet and then again you breathe in hold it and out now the next thing is while you hold it in the abdomen the you can feel the energy spreading from there into other parts of the body there's an energetic point i believe in japanese and sometimes used in zen is called hara which must be where the word hara kiri comes from but we're not going there hara is the belly and so as if you feel that then from there it's easy to feel the energy spreading into your legs and into the rest of your body so this is the energetic point and so a few times abdominal a few abdominal breaths and you are in the body and out of your mind in a good sense you're out of your mind thank you i am i take it as a compliment in particular when you're being plagued by thoughts that are futile perhaps even destructive negative unhappiness inducing and you realize that these thoughts are futile destructive and unhappiness inducing so you they are they fulfill no purpose whatsoever which applies to most thoughts that occur to you when you're lying in bed between midnight and six or seven in the morning and you wake up and she's there one can say almost any thought that happens to then is futile unless you have a wonderful incredible insight suddenly which happens on rare occasions too particularly if you go into the body first but mostly people are plagued by thoughts in their mind first of all you need to know then that's already you need that minimum of awareness to know that you don't want those thoughts if you don't know that you don't want those thoughts that means you're so identified with the thoughts that you aren't even there so spiritually speaking you are asleep or unconscious as we call it so when you are so completely identified that you your thoughts become your reality and there's nothing else your thoughts become your reality then you are not there your thoughts occupy the place where you should be and this is like a state of being possessed by mental formations like little gremlins they live in you so you need a minimum of awareness to know that these thoughts are useless and that you don't want them but you can't push against them because by pushing against them or try to suppress them you actually would strengthen them and you might even create another set of thoughts their mind creates another set of thoughts that fights the set of thoughts that you don't want and all that doesn't work very well also to eliminate thought through willpower is also not a good idea because it doesn't work except work for a short period of time they're holding your breath let's say you have a strong yang energy in your body you're i'm going to make it and i'm going to stop thinking now it's happening it's happening i'm not thinking but at some point you have to let go again and that's like you take the lid off the pressure cooker and then and then you think even more than before and then you have to do it again and it will damage your body if you do it too often so that doesn't work so instead of fighting the thoughts just take your attention away from the thoughts but then you initially you need to put your attention somewhere else and that is the inner body so you don't fight the thoughts you recognize them as not useful that you don't want them then you simply remove attention you don't feed them with your attention with your consciousness so you break that you break this this cycle of compulsive not only compulsive but actually addictive thinking one of the greatest addictions for most humans probably on the planet is the addiction to overthinking excessive thinking unhappiness inducing thinking and you won't believe or maybe you do how many millions make their lives miserable by unnecessary addictive and destructive deeply negative thinking millions it's an enormous amount of unconsciousness is generated not only people do it to themselves it's also when you're deeply identified with obsessive and negative thinking it also of course influences the way in which you act so if habitually your uh the thoughts that go through your head are destructive and you have enemies up there that you're fighting not realizing that your greatest enemy lives between your two ears so you have enemies that you're fighting and then you get actual enemies in life so if you externalize this and this becomes the world that you create and this this becomes the way through the screen of thinking you experience so-called reality that becomes your reality and it's not a pleasant reality and if let's now imagine millions of people who are living in such an unconscious state then they create their collective reality a lot of that is on the world news every night and on the internet so once you know you don't want them then you have a choice this is where freedom comes in one could say you have a choice now without awareness you have no choice you are an automatic you are you're run on auto you are pre-programmed and what is running through your mind is the programming which is the conditioning of your mind since childhood created by your[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 25:10) environment, your personal environment and your cultural environment. So just a just a program, then you are a walking program and you have no choice because you're so identified with the program you are asleep. So as you become aware choice, the element of choice comes in.

And this is an interesting topic of free will of sometimes people ask philosophical questions. Is there such a thing as free will? Well, yes and no.

We can see that when you are totally conditioned, your mind is totally programmed and conditioned, there's no free will, then it seems that there is free will because you can make choices. But you don't exist as an independent autonomous entity, you just seem to, you're connected to the totality of consciousness. So when it seems to you that you are making choices, for the first time you're making intelligent choices when the awareness comes in.

It's good to believe that you are making the choice. But if you look more deeply, the consciousness moves through you and is making the choice and you realize that you are an inseparable part of it. So we, even though we, it seems to be free will, especially compared to what was before.

But even that, free will would only make sense if you are a totally autonomous entity, totally separate from the rest of the world and other people and the universal consciousness. But that's not the case. So you're connected to the totality and so the universal consciousness really, when you begin to awaken, then there's an intelligence that is greater than the accumulated knowledge of the mind, which is borrowed.

It also uses universal intelligence, but it becomes trapped and limited. It forms an illusory entity. So free choice, you do feel that for the first time you have free choice.

In ultimate terms, you don't, but that doesn't mean you don't have to worry about that. So you have free choice for the first time and you can choose to, you can become responsible for your state of consciousness. And then, of course, you forget again.

And something happens, you lose yourself again in the conditioning of the mind. And then you notice again, the waking up is part of the awakening process that you are going through, is that it's a process because it's, you're not continuously at the same level of presence. Sometimes you're very present, perhaps here, hopefully, I believe you are, can feel the energy, the collective energy field here is an energy field of presence.

You may not be this present when you leave here and you arrive at the airport or whatever you do, or you arrive home and you're faced with your daily life again, all kinds of demands come up again. And you lose yourself in all the things that you have to do. And really, it means you lose yourself in your mind.

And then suddenly you notice this has been happening. And then you wake up again, and you take a conscious breath. And you don't believe your mind when it says, I don't have time for a conscious breath, there's too much to go do here.

Now, a conscious breath is five or six seconds. So it must be a lie if you say, unless you're in absolute emergency, everybody has time for one conscious breath. And almost everybody has time for two conscious breaths, even the busiest person.

And so a conscious breath is just, if it's abdominal, then immediately it puts you in touch with the energy field of the inner body. And it's a short cessation as you breathe out. Hold it for a few seconds.

And it's so lovely that you might even want to take a third conscious breath. You feel alive. The body is alive, but it's not just what you feel, it's not just the physical body.

It's an energy field behind the physical body. And for a moment, you have transcended the person, the personality, the ego, whatever you want to call it. For a moment, something has opened up within you.

And then, okay, what's the next thing they have to do? So this is being and doing. But some of this, for a little while, remains with you.

Some of the attention, even if you start doing again, especially if you do this several, frequently during the day, two or three conscious breaths. As you see, I started with one, now I'm saying two or three. Two or three conscious breaths, many times during the day, makes an enormous difference to your life.

And gradually you learn not to completely lose yourself in the activities, whatever you do in your doing, so that you can be... There is still a point of awareness, a point of stillness, a point of rest, a point of power within you that is not disturbed by anything that happens out there. And so you can still do things.

And then you do them, by the way, you do them more intelligently, then because this connects you to universal intelligence. It's also the seed of the source of creativity. When you use your mind to solve a problem, and you think about it, the possibilities, this, that, you might talk about it to somebody, or you do it by yourself, and you think, and then you can't find a solution, then it's the time to take two, three, four...

Oh, I've gone up to four now. Four conscious breaths. So it's stillness.

You become still, and you feel this power that lives in you. And when you then start thinking again, very often you come up with a new insight, or a solution to the problem. And if not immediately, you do it a few times, and then at the moment that you would least suspect, suddenly you have an insight of this is the solution, or this is what I have to do.

That frequently happens. And another thing that happens, this is a little mysterious, or some people might call it weird, but when you are connected with this, the point of power that is the entry point is the inner body, it does often bring about so-called chance events, or encounters, or synchronistic events that happen that seem to be just the right thing for the right moment. Just helpful events happen more frequently.

Just meeting the right person, a chance encounter, nobody can predict in what way. And when you find this actually does happen, that's an amazing thing, that life becomes more helpful, cooperative than it was before. But I'm not implying that life will be free of challenges.

No, challenges continue to come, and you need them, because now, as you're undergoing the awakening process, every challenge is a great help, because a challenge forces you to be more present. And you will then begin to recognize the challenges as opportunities for being more present. Then you turn up the light, the inner light.

Chhh. Chhh. And then suddenly there's an earthquake, and everything is collapsing around you, and then you go, chhh.

Or it could be your own, your death instead of an earthquake, that's a kind of earthquake too. The awareness of death is a wonderful thing, and we've talked about it before. Die before you die.

So whenever you take identification away from the egoic mind, it is a kind of death. But it's quite a nice death. If you resist it, it becomes painful.

And this is when life is forcing you to experience the ego death, that can be quite painful. But that's ultimately good too. The universe wants to create.

It wants expansion. But why is it that so often it seems to put obstacles in the path of expansion? Things go wrong.

Difficult situations, difficult people, loss, confusion. Why do some people experience life as one damn thing after another? Why does life leave me alone?

Why does expansion seem to be blocked so often, if the universe wants expansion, which it does? The universe not only wants to expand externally, it also expands internally. So every obstacle potentially is a deepening within, so it goes in two directions.

So if somebody's, let's say a child grows up with a handicap or very difficult life situation, it doesn't have to be a child or any human being encounters a huge obstacle. Either they overcome the obstacle on the external level, or they transcend that obstacle on an inner level. So this is a universal thing.

I just have to give one example. Let's say a child is weak, gets bullied at school, very unhappy because of that. Then the child could generate so much energy that he or she would take up martial arts, go to a teacher, just as it's shown in those movies.

And then eventually, he or she can defeat the bully, generate energy that would not have been generated if the bully had not been there. So it becomes stronger on that. That's expansion in a way.

Or the child is just too weak. It doesn't generate expansion on that level. It can never defeat the bully, but the energy goes within, develops other abilities, perhaps the ability to be creative, to think, to create.

And 20 years later, the child that was the bully works in some menial job, and the child that was bullied is a great creator. That's expansion too, or becomes a spiritual teacher. So the universe wants to expand, but it also wants you to experience obstacles to expansion, which are part of the expansion.

It goes in two directions. So welcome all the obstacles in your life, the obstacles to whatever. And collectively, if you listen to the news, continuously things go wrong, dreadfully, on the planet.

It happens to be the case that the news focuses on all the things that go wrong. It doesn't focus on the things that don't go wrong. So, of course, a distorted version of what life is like, but undoubtedly things do go wrong.

Humanity is being challenged through, sometimes through factors that seem to have nothing to do with, it just, things just come at you. And other factors created by humanity's unconscious mind, dysfunctional, egoic thinking. And so it's only through experiencing the effects of that unconsciousness collectively.

If you look at humanity as a whole for a moment, as one single expression of consciousness divided into billions of little entities, one new array of consciousness divided into billions of smaller arrays of consciousness, one of them is you. So humanity is evolving. One consciousness expressing itself as the human being is undergoing a process of evolution.

It's like birthing and gradually becoming more conscious. Seems to take a long time, but every human being reaches a point where the consciousness accelerates. And that's when you become, you consciously embark on the spiritual path as you are doing.

That means you no longer, your primary teacher is no longer suffering. It may still come in, but it's no longer your primary teacher. You grow, you awaken voluntarily without being pushed into it through suffering.

But you have been, otherwise you wouldn't be. You've had your suffering. It may be a bit more, but not like before.

And for many of you, suffering is coming to an end. It doesn't mean that you don't face problems anymore, but you don't transform them into suffering. The I am practice, I am, there's no doubt about that.

Everything else could be an illusion. And one way of looking at it is to say, well, it is a kind of illusion because nothing lasts for long. Everything here is impermanent.

Be aware in your daily life of the gap between two thoughts so that your mind doesn't drag you along in an incessant stream of involuntary and compulsive thinking. Invite these gaps into your life. So look, by looking at something without interpreting it, by listening to something without interpreting, by taking conscious breaths occasionally, observe the air flowing into the body, out of the body.

No thought. You become aware of the underlying presence. And only then do you become a true human being.

So humans are still undergoing an evolutionary process. They're not finished. They're not even fully human yet, most of them.

You're fully human when you are both, when you are conscious, not only of your humanness, but also of your beingness. And when the two come together, you are a human being. Before, you're only a human, unaware of being, only a personality.

A human being lives in two worlds, the manifested and the unmanifested. And that would mean you would, when humans, more and more humans begin to live like that, of course the world would look very different, the world that we create. Be not only human, but be the being so you become a true human being.

[Speaker 12] (26:22 - 27:52)
For the past several years, I've been making a concerted effort to live a especially sort of conscious, present spiritual path, and doing yoga and meditation and retreats and that sort of thing. And now when I hear people talk about spiritual stuff, I kind of cringe. It's like, I feel like there's this spiritual thing that's like separate from this, this special dimension.

At first, it was really great because I was meditating 10 hours in a weekend, and I could tell everybody how cool it was and how special and unique I felt practicing this special spiritual life. And now I listen to what you say and other people say, and I just want to hear about how I'm no one. And I mean that sincerely in being in this, but just not having to.

Even though I am conscious, all these words that just seem to get in the way a lot of the time, I mean, they're concepts and everything. But I feel the sweetness of just really not having to be this special, unique, spiritual person on top of being a regular person. It's like this double-decker sandwich that I got to carry around, and it's getting stale, and I don't know.

I don't know if there's a question in there, but maybe you could speak to that. Thank you. Yes.

Okay. Thanks.

[Speaker 1] (27:54 - 28:52)
Well, you overdid it a little bit with your spiritual practice. And hence the reaction now, because you have to get back to some normality after all that specialness over, of course, your spiritual practice where you thought of yourself as special and your practice as special. You went quite far to an extreme, and you're now experiencing the reaction to that extreme, and that's good.

In other words, you don't want to hear about anything spiritual anymore. I've had it, right? So you overdid it.

Now there's a reaction. Don't mention to me anything spiritual anymore, you say. But of course, you know the famous expression, what is it?

The baby in the bathwater. Don't throw out your baby with the bathwater. It's all spiritual, so to speak.

[Speaker 12] (28:52 - 28:53)
It's all spiritual.

[Speaker 1] (28:53 - 32:39)
It's so separate. So first you went to that extreme. Now you go to an extreme of reaction, and eventually you end up in the middle where every moment is spiritual as it is.

There's nothing special. Spirit is not separate from daily existence. So when we say spiritual, we're not referring to some realm out there that is to be achieved at some point where you become more special than you are now.

It's not going to happen. It's here and now. We're going deeper into the here and now.

That's spiritual. Now you are a little bit tired of these words because you went too far, that extreme. So you have to realize if you're a little bit perhaps like a Christian who was once very religious and suddenly got fed up, and then occasionally I have people in talks who are ex-Christians, and the moment occasionally I say, Jesus said, they go, oh, don't talk to me about anything that's remotely Christian.

I don't want to hear that. I've had all that. So they don't realize because of course they had a somewhat distorted view of what the whole thing was about, so they didn't, but they can't stand the terms anymore.

And that's fine. It's a phase. You will come through that.

Maybe it's happening already. It's the ordinariness. Spiritual means the more spiritual you are, the more ordinary you are, the more non-special you are.

And again, for the ego, that means, okay, I have to become more non-special. How do I become ordinary? Okay, I need somebody to teach me to be ordinary.

So I understand your dilemma, and perhaps you understand it also. And so this, nothing special, chopping wood, carrying water, as Zen defines spirituality, ultimately, what is the spiritual life? Chopping wood, carrying water, which is the kind of thing you do in Zen monasteries, daily doing.

In my case, it's buying some food in the store, going to have a cup of coffee, taking the dog for a walk in the forest, listening to the BBC World News, having a glass of wine occasionally with a meal, watching a movie, nothing extraordinary, and so quite an ordinary existence. And so it's hiding in there, the spirituality is in there, it's not away from there, just this. And so I'm sorry about these words that we use, but language is limited, so we have to use certain words.

And perhaps the emotion around these words then eventually is going to go and become neutral again, and you can use them for what they are, which is simply useful pointers no more. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (33:10 - 33:38)
We talked about it off the top, right? Are you one of those people who worries about everything, what happened yesterday, what's happening tomorrow, and your mind just keeps going and going and going and going, and there's always somebody in your life that says, you've got to live in the moment. You've got to live in the moment.

If you worry so much about yesterday and today, you're missing the now. Well, chances are, your friend who told you that read our next guest's book, because he can help teach you live in the moment. Millions of people have read his work.

Oprah loves him. Spiritual writer, teacher, Eckhart Tolle will be right here. Here's his bio.

[Speaker 1] (33:51 - 33:56)
Who you are and stillness are one and the same.

[Speaker 4] (33:56 - 34:59)
Now, if you're into this guy, you consider Eckhart Tolle one of the world's most influential spiritual leaders. People say he's a master of inner calm and peace. Was he born that way?

Is he some kind of a Buddha? Well, no. Here's how it happened.

Eckhart was born in Germany, spent his teenage years in Spain, then headed to Britain for university and grad work. Now, up until that time, Eckhart said he was depressed, he was anxious, he was often suicidal. But at the tender age of 29, his life suddenly changed.

He says he woke up one day feeling an overwhelming sense of joy and peace, and it took him years to figure out what had happened. It took him even longer to teach others how to get to the same place. So, in a nutshell, here's what Eckhart says.

You are not your mind. In fact, he says your mind is your worst enemy, that it overtakes the real you and creates thoughts that make you miserable. So, if you want to achieve peace, well, then you've got to disassociate yourself from your mind.

Eckhart's key? Live in the present. Because, according to him, dwelling in the past only leads to guilt and regret.

Thinking about the future brings anxiety and worry.

[Speaker 1] (35:00 - 35:01)
You may have noticed that already.

[Speaker 4] (35:02 - 36:01)
And it's all summed up in Eckhart's enormously successful book called The Power of Now. He wrote it in Vancouver, where he currently resides. That thing came out over 10 years ago and sold more than 5 million copies.

Yeah, you know, thanks in large part to this person. She's also a big fan of Eckhart's follow-up book, A New Earth. It was one of her book club picks.

This is the most exciting thing I've ever done. And last year, she made it the basis for 10 weeks of seminars with Eckhart on Oprah.com. Thank you.

Everybody, say hello to Eckhart Tolle. You know, when you first published that book, Paranay, with a small independent publisher, 3,000 copies, I can imagine you would have no idea that this was going to happen to you.

[Speaker 1] (36:02 - 36:58)

No, I thought the book would only appeal to people who were already deeply into spirituality or had been meditating for many years. And after about three or four months after it got published, I realized that many people were phoning and writing in to tell me they'd bought more than one copy for friends or relatives. And then I began to realize that it was a kind of snowball effect and it would be growing and growing.

That was a surprise. Another surprise was that for quite a few people, that was the first spiritual book they had ever read. And it made sense to them.

And so I hadn't realized the degree of readiness in people for this message. And that was the surprise. And then more surprises came later.

The book became what one reviewer called an underground bestseller for a while.

[Speaker 4] (36:58 - 37:02)
Usually in music, underground means people like it, but no one buys it.

[Speaker 1] (37:02 - 37:53)
Well, here underground means people buy it, but there's no publicity, there's no advertising, nothing on television about it. And so word of mouth. So it grew for about a year and a half.

It grew through word of mouth. Gradually it got to some cities. There was a time, at that time I would take a few copies of the book to little spiritual bookstores in Vancouver every couple of weeks.

And then they would phone me again and say, we need another five copies. I would carry five copies. You did it yourself?

Yes. That's fantastic. That was enormously satisfying to have this personal contact with the book.

And at that time also, there were not that many readers. People could phone in and say, oh, I'd like to meet you. And I said, okay, what time do you want to meet?

And then as it grew, after a while I couldn't do that anymore. Yeah.

[Speaker 4] (37:54 - 38:04)
Rule number one, man, if someone wants to meet you on Facebook, don't. That's the trick. Do you have horror stories?

Horror stories. Where you met somebody and you went, oh, I got to get out of here.

[Speaker 1] (38:06 - 38:35)
No, nothing that comes to mind, but the book does seem to, not only The Power of Now, also the later book, A New Earth, for some reason it does seem to upset some people. I remember my office getting, they told me, they don't show it to me, but they told me they got the open one package and somebody had shredded the entire New Earth book and sent it in the shredded version back to my office. So something must have triggered something in here.

[Speaker 4] (38:40 - 38:46)
If you go back a few decades, you're 29 years old, A Fateful Night, is that what started this whole thing?

[Speaker 1] (38:46 - 41:25)
Yes, a night when I'd had many unhappy nights, but that night I was just so deeply depressed again and I'd spent the previous weeks in anxiety and the, what happened, a thought came into my head which said, I can't live with myself any longer. And at that moment a separation happened between myself and that thought and I looked at the thought and said, I can't live with myself, what does that mean? There must be two of me, there's an I and there must be some unhappy self that I cannot live with.

And through that, although I only understood the full implications years later, a separation happened between the unhappy self, which I later realized is a mental construct consisting of repetitive unhappy thoughts about me and my life, an unhappy story. I was continuously retelling myself the unhappy story of me and I was so identified with the unhappy story of me that there was no gap between that and me and that was the self that I couldn't live with. And when I realized that there is a self I can live with, something separated and I became the consciousness behind the unhappy self and I could see that the whole structure of the unhappy self was a kind of fiction, a narrative that I was kept repeating in my mind.

So the separation happened and I realized that in essence I am not my story, whether happy or unhappy, I'm the consciousness behind the story. The consciousness or the space, whatever you want to call it, there's not really a name for it. And I suddenly realized myself as that and with that I was in a state of peace.

From then onwards I never again identified with this unhappy mental construct, the me with its story. And that's what I call now the shift in consciousness that happened, or you could also call it an awakening. And then later it became the teaching because I tried to explain, after a few years later people started coming to me, just casually asking questions.

And gradually a spiritual teaching developed, but it's all based on that disidentification from this continuous stream of thinking that you take to be yourself, but it's no more than a stream of thinking. It's not who you are in essence. Well one other thing we know, but however it is we are or we act, ultimately we are all affected by where we come from.

[Speaker 4] (41:25 - 41:37)
That sort of sets the table for who we're going to be in the next phase of our life. And I wondered for you to get to that point, what were your folks like? I never hear about what your childhood was like that would have set these sort of dominoes up for them to come falling down that one night.

[Speaker 1] (41:37 - 42:06)
Well the childhood was already unhappy. There was always almost continuous conflict in my parents' marriage. And I was the only child that makes it even more difficult, because if you have siblings then you can kind of relate to them.

And so I suffered a lot, I think the beginnings of the deep unhappiness and depression are probably there. But again I'm glad now that it did happen, because otherwise the shift wouldn't have happened.

[Speaker 4] (42:06 - 42:40)
You know the idea of being in the now, it's something that my friends, they've sort of stopped asking me to be in the now because they recognize it's not a reality for me, because so much is like, I'm sort of in the now, but I'm going here trying this. The one thing we know is that our society is constructed in a way where we have a history and we have things to look forward to. How do you almost approach the unlearning of a people to change the way that this structure, that this society is built?

This society is built on here's my past, learn from my past, if I don't learn from my past I'm doomed to repeat the mistakes. How do you, how do you put all that together realizing how society is?

[Speaker 1] (42:40 - 43:26)
Well this is all true. Of course it's good to learn from one's past mistakes. On the other hand, if you identify with your past and your memories and that forms the basis for your sense of self, that becomes a kind of prison.

So nothing wrong with learning from the past, but the very essential thing is the realization that your life is always this moment. Your life is never not this moment. And whatever you think or experience has to be in the now.

So life and now are actually inseparable. It's tomorrow never comes right? Yes, when it comes it's today.

As they said in the British pub there was a sign which said free beer tomorrow.

[Speaker 4] (43:30 - 43:46)
And that is so unfair to drunks. That is so unfair to drunk people. You said Tiger Woods lives in the now, right?

That Tiger Woods is a great example of the now? Yes. What's the difference between being in the now and just being simply focused?

Because I don't, when I watch him golf, he golfs like a man who's chasing something.

[Speaker 1] (43:47 - 45:05)
So what's the difference between in the now and being focused? I don't think he is chasing anything. I think he is present.

There's a nice story of a Zen master who was watching a sports person perform and he was watching very closely and the person wasn't quite making it and the Zen master observed him and said the need to win drains him of power. The need, because if you have the need to win, now the West of course subscribes to that. It says you must want to win, but that's not the Eastern way and I believe that that's the truer way because the need to win, you project a goal to some future moment.

You cannot fully be present in what you do if you have the need to win. You want to get there. But if you're a pro athlete, you only have to win, right?

That's the challenge. But the great ones, when they actually perform, when they are, as the expression goes, in the zone, they don't think about winning. They're absolutely and totally present.

And so I believe that's where mastery arises, in that state of absolute and complete presence. There's also a nice film, The Legend of Bagger Vance, where it's about a golfer who learns to be present.

[Speaker 4] (45:06 - 45:16)
You said that there are certain people or things that are better at being in the now than others. You said animals are great at being in the now, but then you also said women are better at being in the now than men. Is that true?

[Speaker 1] (45:17 - 46:24)
Yes, to some extent. Women are not quite as much in their head as men. Women tend to be, they are in their head too, but not quite as much.

They tend to be still a little bit more connected with the body, the energy in the body, with their feelings. So they're not as mind identified, not quite as, of course, always exceptions, not quite as mind identified as man. And therefore, it's a little easier.

And so the many talks that I've given, often there's always more women than men. This is beginning to change a little bit occasionally now, but still the case. And the new earth is just taking the idea of the power of now to a much bigger level, right?

Yes. New perspectives on it and an elaboration and a new, also indicating what it is that prevents you from being present. Structures in your mind, the ego, the identification with the voice in the head, to become aware of that.

If you're not aware of it, it'll take you over again and again. I know you've got a lot of traveling to do.

[Speaker 4] (46:24 - 46:34)
When you come back to Canada, please come back on our show. Thank you. That's what I want to talk about.

Eckhart Tolle.com is his website and there's a lot more to see with what he's got going on. And of course, he's got them books. Good to see you.

[Speaker 18] (46:34 - 46:35)
Thank you for coming out.

[Speaker 4] (46:35 - 46:41)
Eckhart Tolle, everybody. Thank you very much for watching the program tonight. There's an awful lot more to come.

Thanks for watching.

[Speaker 1] (46:42 - 1:42:48)
No, you are intensely alive. And in the depths of that aliveness, you are not a form identity. And in the depths of that aliveness, you have no needs of other forms, but you can enjoy other forms.

Should you engage in intimacy, even though now that you are awakening and understand you don't need a human being to complete you? Should you engage in intimacy? Now, of course, should doesn't come into it at all.

Neither should you engage in intimacy, nor should you not engage in intimacy. Should is not, there's no should. You either do or you don't.

Maybe the question means, do I have to? Only you can know that, whether you feel that that is the right thing now, then it arises. But the fact that you no longer need to be completed psychologically does not mean that necessarily you no longer engage in intimacy.

It just means that the egoic part of an intimate relationship is then no longer there. And that's a great relief. You can still have an intimate relationship on a physical, emotional level, without the psychological need that says, I need you to be the answer to my life, psychological completion.

Because it is that delusion that there can be a human being who is psychologically going to complete me that creates all that, a lot of the conflict in relationship, because after a while you realise that the other human is not living up to your expectations, because no human being could. But you can still have an intimate relationship, even without the need to be psychologically completed. You still, you have a physical form.

So the physical form may, for example, have sexual desire. And again, it may also have emotional feelings, which exist within the greater context when you are awakened, or even the spirit dimension is already there in your life, then there's the greater context for all that, in the spaciousness of who you are, those things appear or happen, not as an answer to your life's problems, and not as an absolute need, not even on an absolute need on the emotional, physical level, not as an absolute need.

But the form as which you appear may feel drawn to another form, and that's fine. And if it doesn't work, or if there is no other form because you are in prison or some other reason, then you can live with that without turning into an unhappy being, because you are in touch with that which is beyond form. The unfulfillment on the level of form creates, yes, there's some area then in your life that's unfulfilled, and you can feel that, and yet it does not turn into, it doesn't make your life miserable or makes you unhappy, or creates a mental interpretation that tells you that your life is dreadful and meaningless because that need is not fulfilled.

Because as presence enters your life, that need exists as a small manifestation within the greater spaciousness that you are. And if it's met, it's fine, and if the need is not met, you can live with that also without turning unhappy or feeling that you're not alive anymore. No, you are intensely alive, and in the depths of that aliveness, you are not a form identity.

And in the depths of that aliveness, you have no needs of other forms, but you can enjoy other forms, but the absolute need is not there, because all forms are already contained in that, in you. You're ultimately from the deepest, seen from the deepest level, you're always meeting yourself in another form. So, no should or shouldn't, you may or you may not engage, as you put it, engage in intimacy.

I assume that the belief that there's a human being there that's going to make you happy has dissolved, and you realize you don't need that, not to make you happy, or to fulfill you. And so, with the psychological need gone, you can appreciate another human being, and you can appreciate emotional or physical levels, if they are there. So this, you need to work on this in everyday life, invite presence in ordinary situations that are not particularly challenging.

For some people, even a red light, a traffic light is challenging. Having to wait in line somewhere is challenging. Why not use this precious moment and bring, oh, invite, become alert, if, feel the energy field in the inner body, and just be there as an observing presence.

And then you have the two dimensions. You have sense perceptions, hearing, and you have the formless presence. So you have, there's a light and that which appears in the light.

It's always the same, the light of consciousness. So then you grow in presence power, as you use all those situations that before were never good enough, you're always on your way somewhere better, use those situations to bring presence in, and then that power grows in you. And if that hasn't, it's only then, if that power grows in you, presence power, that you can deal with the heavy, let's call it, use an Eastern term, the karmic stuff, those accumulations in you that are old patterns, some of which originating in your present lifetime, in childhood, but in many cases, patterns that go back a long way in time.

Your ancestors acting out patterns that your ancestors acted out 500 years ago, 1,000 years ago, 2,000 years ago, and still the same conditioning. Or you can look at it in terms of whether you look at it in terms of genetics that you think that come or in terms of past lifetimes, whatever approach you want to use is fine. The fact is, there are accumulations in you, there are patterns of unconsciousness that have been there a long time, we could call them karmic.

Karmic meaning unconscious patterns that you identify, usually identify with as yourself, that take you over completely. And the truth of the real karma is not the external events in your life. The external events in your life really trigger the karma that you carry inside, and they become your reactions.

And your reactions determine how you experience your life. So in a way, you could have the same thing happening to one person, creating a certain response and the same event happening to another person, creating a totally different response. I can have, for example, when I first, when I had just written my first book, the publisher said, why don't you sign some books for some famous people, they might give you an endorsement.

So I did, and they were sent out, and almost nobody replied. And I didn't realize at the time that those famous people, how many books and manuscripts they get sent every week and every month, but now I'm getting them. And now I'm the one who doesn't reply.

Because you just can't, it's impossible to read it all, even dipping in, they pile up, there's a backlog, I have now already several months of backlog to get through. So it's very hard, if not impossible. But I didn't know that.

But fortunately, I was not, I didn't take it personally. Without having read the four agreements, I already knew this is not a personal thing. So it was not problematic.

But I had some instances where people have sent me books, and they got extremely upset, because they didn't get a reply. And they get more and more upset, and the letters became more and more angry. And then I became some great, the worst dreadful person in the world.

You can, and those are old karmic patterns that people carry, the external event triggers the pattern. For some people, what becomes a huge drama for one person is an insignificant event for another. So how you experience your life is not really so much to do with what happens to you, but it's how you react, because every reaction determines the next thing that happens.

So something goes wrong, you create, make drama out of it. And that creates more stuff. And this is how more karma gets created.

Your, how you react to a person determines how that person reacts to you. And so it's a reflection. In other words, you kind of, you create, to a large extent, your life, not to a large extent, completely, your life experience, unconsciously.

And so to break the old patterns that create so much suffering, unnecessary baggage, I sometimes call it, that you carry around with you, that you, so you meet it, you interpret situations and people through the unnecessary baggage in your mind, that, for that to be transcended or dissolved, that requires presence power. The presence needs to be there when the old patterns arise in your life. And that is there, so you don't wait for the challenge when hoping that you can stay present because you won't.

Use it when you're not being challenged and invite presence into your life. All those moments that are really precious, and that generates more than you, it's like a, almost like a, the equivalent on the physical level would be working out. You get stronger, so to speak.

This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. So our entire retreat is about deepening, for most of you, and discovering, for some of you, the ability to live from a deeper state of consciousness, a, we could call it transcendent state of consciousness, instead of the thinking state where the person resides, the movement of thought that gives rise to the personality, the person, what most people identify with as themselves, me, me and my story, me and my history, my opinions, they are very important, my likes and dislikes, desires, fears, experiences, accumulated experiences, knowledge, possessions, sufferings, bad things people have done to me, bad things I did to other people, all those things that make up the personality, and that's fine, you're not, this is not going to disappear while you're, just like that, just because you're in a retreat center, suddenly you're free of yourself. No, because as you know, wherever you go, there you are. And you can leave behind many things, your home, your usual environment, the people you live with, your work situation, but what you cannot easily leave behind is your mind, it travels with you.

And then you're in a new place and you arrive, let's say here, the retreat center, and if your mind is all there is to you, you will very quickly find a discrepancy, a gap, a conflict between the expectations of your mind and what you're encountering. You will also find old patterns quickly reassert themselves that you thought you had left behind, reactive patterns, repetitive thoughts, habits, mental habits, complaining, for example, favorite one for the ego. Oh, I'd imagine the retreat center to be different, wasn't supposed to be like that.

First of all, it wasn't supposed to rain. And then it's too big, I'd imagine something more intimate. It's impersonal, I don't like it.

Let's see what else I can find that's wrong with it. There are too many people. How can I be on retreat with all these people?

They're all talking, why are they all talking? And the food, that's not what I expected. And my place is not, it's too small, the bed doesn't come, the shower doesn't work properly.

And I had expected to be at peace and I'm not at peace. I suppose it's supposed to be a retreat, why am I not at peace? Well, because yes, you are on the level of the person and you can't expect much change there.

You can rearrange the furniture a little bit. Must think positive, must think positive. It's actually very nice here, it's nice.

I like it here, I like it. I should be feeling peaceful, I should be feeling peaceful. So that's the thing that travels with you, your mind.

I'm sure I haven't exhausted all the possible things that it can say to you. So if you remain stuck in that dimension while you're here, it's not going to be a terribly satisfying experience. And you might even be longing to get back home.

And then you can look, might look on your smartphone on the weather forecast at home, it's so much better than here. So we are here in order to experience a deeper level to who we are, rather than we, you. You are here to experience a deeper level to who you are, deeper than the personal personality, which is not going to go away completely, no, it's there.

But there is an unconditioned state of consciousness underneath all that, much vaster than the conditioned. The analogy applies that are often used. The unconditioned is the ocean.

The conditioned is the ripples on the surface of the ocean. And that's you. You are the ripple, you're also the ocean.

And to live more from the level of depth, the unconditioned consciousness is why we're here. So in order not to get trapped in the repetitive activity of your mind, we need to invite the unconditioned consciousness. You need to invite the unconditioned consciousness into your life at every moment.

Use this opportunity here to do that. And we already did it when we started just now, when I said, listen to the silence in the room. And you went, that is the something that's deeper than the personality that emerged for a moment when you went.

Your degree of attention rose a little and you went. Now the strange thing is, when you're listening to silence like now, there's nothing to listen to. So what are you listening to?

And as I say, listen to the silence, I'm basically saying, listen to nothing. Because there's no sound except my voice. But when I'm not speaking, it just goes, unless your hearing is better than mine and there is some sound that I can't hear, but I can't hear it.

So listen to the silence. A seemingly very simple thing, a seemingly very insignificant thing. But all the things, all the practice that we do, our retreat here is really, this is only one version of the same practice, which is the step from the thinking mode into the presence mode or awareness mode, whatever you want to call it, the unconditioned consciousness and experience yourself as not only the person, which is the thinking mode, experience yourself as the depths of awareness.

So you, the transcendent you emerges more as you're here. So, listen to the silence and you go. And you're not really listening to anything because there's nothing to listen to, but something happened.

It goes far beyond listening. That was only the entry point. We use the auditory perception as an entry point into a different state of consciousness.

Now, the wonderful thing is when you're listening to silence, when you're listening to sound, there's something there that you can be aware of whatever sound you're listening to. A musical sound, a bird song, any sound, the rain, my voice, when you listen to a sound, you listen to, you're conscious of something. So that's the normal state.

But when you're listening to no sound, what are you conscious of? You're not conscious of anything because there's nothing there. You are just conscious.

And when you're just conscious, the historical you has, for a moment, subsided. Because when you're just conscious and listening to the silence, you don't even remember your name, nor do you remember your date of birth, nor do you remember whether your life up to this point has been a big success or a huge failure. It becomes irrelevant.

If you listen to the silence, it's irrelevant whether your life up to this point has been great or miserable. Well, for most of you, it's a mixture. For some of you, one predominates, for some others, the other predominates.

But the moment you access that deeper consciousness, you are that deeper consciousness, that becomes irrelevant for that moment. You are still there, but not the historical you. The historical you, for a moment, has subsided.

There you go. So you're not listening to anything. You're not conscious of anything.

You are just conscious. You're not aware of anything. You are just aware.

So you are, the object has been removed when you listen to the silence because silence is nothing there. And so another way of putting it, when you listen to silence, you can become easily aware that you are aware. Usually you have a ray of, let's say, a ray of sunlight is looking for stuff and it goes, bzzz, bzzz.

Oh, there, and there, and there, and there, and there. And then suddenly there's nothing to look at. And only then the ray of sunlight suddenly becomes aware of itself.

And it may even become aware that it's connected to something vast, the sun, in our analogy. And that's a moment of transcendence of the self, which is kind of Buddhist terminology. And, or we could call it self-realization of it.

Do you realize that the transcendent self, rather than being stuck in the personal self, the transcendent self is what the Buddhists call, just to confuse you, what the Buddhists call the no self. There is no self. The Buddha says, and some Indian teacher says, yes, there is the great self, the transcendent self.

No, you're wrong, there is no self. I'm telling you, there is a self. They're talking about the same thing.

This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. Don't, please don't think, okay, I'm going to become an alcoholic.

Then I'll go into AA and then I'll experience spiritual awakening. The ancient Romans believed in vino veritas. What do you believe about the effects of drink and why do different people react in different ways?

In vino veritas, they said. In wine, there is truth, I think it means. I suppose it means when people get drunk, they start telling the truth.

Well, I have partly answered this question already. The effects of alcohol. Once you are disidentified from the mind, awakened, I won't say, not even necessarily totally permanently awakened, but relatively awakened, you will be able to drink alcohol if you want to.

It will not affect your state of mind and the desire to overindulge will most probably not be there. From my own experience, I enjoy more recently than before a glass of wine with dinner and sometimes even two, but almost never more than two and usually just one. That's all, and that is a pleasure.

If it's more than that, it's no longer a pleasure. It feels wrong. The body doesn't want it.

The body even rejects it. And there's not the slightest desire to have more than that. For those people who are awakening, alcohol can be a hindrance, especially overindulgence in alcohol.

As presence arises and you drink, you quickly lose the presence again, and it can activate and reactivate a lot of the unconsciousness in you, even pain bodies in some people. In some people, more men than women, getting drunk, overindulging in alcohol activates their pain body, so some men become violent when they drink, and they become even more unconscious than they are in their normal state, much more unconscious. But even if that's not the case with you, if presence is arising in you and you get even, let's say, you overindulge once a week in alcohol, that can represent a significant setback in the arising consciousness.

So you have to be very careful there, and if you know yourself and you know that you cannot stop yourself once you've had one or two drinks, then it would be better not to drink at all. So once presence becomes your normal state, you don't need to be concerned anymore about drink. You may or may not have drink occasionally, and even if you were drunk, awareness would then still be there.

Once you are established in presence, the awareness would still be there. I know that if I drank a whole bottle of wine, some people do that, some people drink a whole bottle of wine every day. Not that I could ever do that.

If I drank a whole bottle of wine, I would probably collapse, but until I collapse, the awareness would be totally there. Ram Dass, the famous story, had a guru in India, and Ram Dass, of course, was into LSD, heavily into LSD, and he gave his guru, what do they call it? Hits, pills, whatever.

He gave his guru two or three, normally you take one. He gave him three or something like that, and the guru says, oh, I'll have another. Gave him four, let's give me another.

Gave him five, and the guru put them in his mouth, and then Ram Dass sat there waiting for something to happen, and nothing happened. The guru sat there for a few hours, and Ram Dass was disappointed and also very impressed. On the one hand, disappointed because nothing happened, but very impressed because nothing happened.

Wow, he took all that, and I believe that the guru did see or experience strange things, but he didn't show it externally because it did not affect his awareness. So his awareness, his witnessing awareness was always there. So he didn't act on anything that he, perhaps visions or whatever he saw.

The awareness remained undiminished, and in the meantime, he experienced strange things, heightened sense perceptions, visions, whatever. It makes no difference. When the awareness is there, it makes little difference whether you see an actual person or whether you have a vision.

It's just things that appear in the space of awareness. So the guru knew that, and the guru was dwelled. It was the awareness, and so it didn't matter what he saw.

It was just another spectacle to him. Nobody said that, but I know that's what he experienced. I took it once.

So that's all. So awareness was not touched by that. Now, probably if he had taken 10 or something, I don't know what people, he might have collapsed, but even then, awareness is there.

So that's the... Sometimes people are surprised when they see that I occasionally have a glass of wine and say, you drink alcohol? Well, if my state of consciousness is so fragile that I can't even have a glass of wine, then what's the use of awakening?

But if you have an addictive pull towards alcohol and presence is arising in you, and you're pulled towards awakening, then it is very important to refrain completely. If that is one of the main areas that makes you unconscious in life, the addiction to alcohol, and you cannot continue to have occasional drinks, because as you know, when you have that addiction, an occasional drink is always more than an occasional drink. Because the moment you have the first drink, already awareness diminishes.

You have the second drink, it diminishes even more. The third drink, it's gone completely. So if that is your problem, then it is of absolute importance never to touch it.

Otherwise, you'll be going up, you're going up the escalator, and then it takes you down again. It's like, no, I think this analogy doesn't work, but... You would continuously fall back.

So this is what I mean. You continuously fall. You make a little bit of progress.

You go to a retreat. You come to a talk. You practice in daily life.

Wonderful. A few days later, you go to a bar. Okay, I'm just going to have one drink.

Just one, because it makes me feel I deserve a treat. I've had a rough day. Okay, just one more.

Oh, this feels so good. Third one can't do any harm, can it? Okay, I'm losing it already, so I might as well.

This is the last time, but I'll do it again and again and again. And the next day you wake up, totally in your mind. Body feels sick, totally in your mind.

And you have to start all over again. So don't do it. Quite a few people over the years have come to me and have come to talks and retreats who, if they had not been alcoholics, would not be undergoing spiritual awakening.

Quite a few people have come through AA, Alcoholics Anonymous. They do a lot of good work. They've come, for the first time, they got in touch with the spiritual dimension through AA.

And so if they had not been alcoholics, and of course, AA encourages you to admit to yourself and to others, I am an alcoholic. And as long as you don't believe that that is the reality of who you truly are, it is a useful recognition, temporary recognition. Because it's always good to face the reality instead of deny the reality.

So once you face the reality, as they do in AA, and then several people have said to me, if I hadn't been an alcoholic, I wouldn't be here now. But I suggest a more direct way rather than the long way around. Don't, please don't think, okay, I'm going to become an alcoholic.

Then I'll go into AA and then I'll experience spiritual awakening. So usually happiness exists as part of the play of opposites. You experience the happiness because something makes you happy.

And then that thing that made you happy either leaves you or the very thing that made you happy suddenly makes you unhappy. Marriage, for example. And for some reason, by some strange synchronistic event, I have two questions here, which may be by the same person.

Are you happy? Then the other one, with so much sadness in the world, how can I feel joy and happy? Be happy.

Am I happy? Uh, no. I wouldn't call it happy.

Some people might use that word to talk about, to point to a very deeper state of connectedness with being. But conventionally, happy really is the opposite to unhappy. And so you go from happy to unhappy is...

And then something happens. You know the two masks that, for theater, comedy and tragedy, the two masks, one is a comedy and then there's a tragedy. So usually happiness exists as part of the play of opposites.

You experience the happiness because something makes you happy and then that thing that made you happy either leaves you or the very thing that made you happy suddenly makes you unhappy. Marriage, for example. Or a relationship.

A relationship. Before you start living together, you're happy. When you start living together, you're unhappy.

So what is, if it's not happy, what are we talking about? There's a, if you let go of thinking and remain as the awareness, then there is, in that awareness emanates a certain peace, alive peace, joy, peace, a peaceful, joyful sense of aliveness. Inner peace may be a better word than happiness, but one would have to add to it.

It's an alive peace. It's not the peace of having deadened yourselves to emotions or anything like that. It's an alive, intensely alive peace.

You can sense it even if it's only just a glimpse right now. Surrender thought. And of course, right now, if you're not thinking about the problems of your life, there are no problems in this moment.

There's only a sense of beingness or aliveness. And that is the connectedness with being. And so you transcend the opposites between happiness and unhappiness.

I have a chapter in the course, not in the course, in America, I didn't write that. Well, in a way I did because all books are written by the one consciousness. But anyway, let's just, in conventional terms, I didn't write it.

I don't claim ownership, causing miracles. But in a deeper sense, of course, I did write it. And you did too, because we are the one consciousness.

So in the power of now, there's a little chapter called beyond happiness and unhappiness, there's peace. So instead of being subject to the fluctuations of happiness and unhappiness, there's that peace where you realize the essence of who you are. And so you're no longer ego-based.

Form identity, yes, but not identification with form identity. So it doesn't turn into ego. And then you function in this world from that place of inner peace.

And whatever you do or who you come into contact with, that your actions, your thoughts become a manifestation of that. And that's more people enter that place, then more people become peaceful human beings. And do not contribute to conflict in the world, the madness of the world.

Don't contribute to the madness of the world. Come back to the question, with so much sadness in the world, how can I feel joy and happy? Now, yes, there is a huge amount of suffering in the world.

Why is there suffering? Because humans are disconnected from the source of who they are. And that is the fundamental source of suffering.

That's how it arises. So if you say, I refuse to be happy until there's no more suffering in this world. Okay, so the end of suffering, then I'm waiting for it out there.

And you might even become very active. I'm going to bring about the end of suffering. You do good things, but you haven't brought about the end of suffering in yourself.

So how is the end of suffering going to happen? Even if you do good deeds, which is a wonderful thing, but if you are unhappy doing good deeds, then that unhappiness also flows into how you do those things and your interactions with other people. It has to, the shift in this world, the end of suffering, to use the Buddha's terminology, the Buddha described his teaching as pointing the way to the end of suffering.

That's the Buddha's teaching. He never used a negative term, end of suffering. Jesus talked about the kingdom of heaven, which is within you.

He used a positive term. They're both talking about the same thing. So the end of suffering has to begin with you and then it spreads.

Then, because that changes the way in which you experience the world, it affects others. And then what you, your relationship with other human beings changes fundamentally because only when you are in connectedness with the essence of who you are, can you have harmonious relationships with others. And can you have feel this deep sense of goodwill towards other human beings, not conditional upon whether they happen to agree with you or belong to the same political party or belong to the same religion or belong to the same nation.

It doesn't depend on that. The same tribe, no. To have a goodwill or benevolence towards all humans that you come into contact with, no matter what their conditioning is.

That can only come from that deep connectedness with being and where you do not automatically and unconsciously judge others the moment you meet them or even in an abstract way, judge an entire group of people as less than human, as evil. I mean, even in Europe, that was not that long ago, first half of the 20th century, entire nations came into violent conflict. And so there was unbelievable unconsciousness of collective ego on a massive scale.

So it needs to start with you. Then this benevolence, this goodwill changes the way in which you interact with other humans. And that changes on a small scale.

And then gradually others, other human beings here and there can also go to that place within and then start to live it. The end of suffering, let's forget about happiness. Let's talk about peace.

So it starts with you. Be the change. Somebody said it, was it Nelson Mandela or Gandhi?

I don't know. The one consciousness said it. Be the change that you want to see in the world.

So if you want to see peace, you have to embody the peace. But the end of suffering needs to start with you, your suffering. That's the end of suffering on the planet.

And then you can show the way to others too. You don't necessarily have to become a spiritual teacher, but you may. But in some way when you, even you don't even need to fully embody that shift in consciousness, fully enlightened master.

No, even just to be undergoing the transformational process you already begin to teach, so to speak, even though you might not teach in a conventional sense of the word, but whoever you come into contact with, you affect with your state of consciousness. The Course in Miracles says, you become a teacher of God.

[Speaker 15] (1:43:15 - 1:44:14)
Namaste, Eckhart. My name in this form is Rena. And my question is about euthanasia in pets.

And in February, my little dog was diagnosed with lymphoma. And, oh, I'm sorry. And there's nothing that you can really offer.

It's a matter of making him happy until his time. And I was pretty upset and panicked by it. And my vet said, you know, when he starts to be symptomatic, bring him in.

We'll give him a shot. He'll go to sleep and all that. So when I was so upset, I thought, well, this is a good answer.

It's a good plan. I, you know, have an idea of what to do. But then I thought about it and I thought, you know, I have power over his life.

He's a little guy I bought. And I have power over his life. I can end his suffering.

But really, am I ending my suffering? I mean, I don't want to see him suffer. But on the other hand, doesn't he have the right to really go through the dying, the work of dying and the process of dying?

And I guess that's my question about feeling what is right action. You know, what is the right thing to do?

[Speaker 1] (1:44:15 - 1:50:49)
Thank you. Answers to questions like that are difficult to find when you start thinking about it, because as you know, your mind can assume different positions and you might have one voice in your head arguing one way, one course of action, and another voice in your head arguing another course of action. And suddenly you're stuck.

What is the right thing to do in a situation like that? And so the answer always has to come from within you, but you have to go beyond the mind that is putting forward either the yes or the no, arguing for or against some kind of position. I never, or very rarely, probably never, I don't know, I can't remember, give advice as to what actually a person should do.

Because I believe when you get in touch with the unconditioned intelligence within you, in other words, become still, then the answer will come through you. It may not come the very first time, but it may come the next time and as you take it into stillness. I know that probably I would, if our dog were suffering, I would probably be inclined to, if there were no way beyond the suffering and you can, if I were sure that the animal is actually in intense suffering, I would probably feel the pain.

The compassionate thing to do would be to end the suffering, but that is every individual's decision, but not so much decision, but it has to come from a deeper place where it's not a decision, it's a knowing. And any individual case, animals and pain is a strange thing. The animals are very much surrendered to pain.

And when we took our dog to the vet a couple of months ago, the vet discovered a broken tooth and said, oh, she must have had this broken tooth for quite a long time and probably had a toothache for several months, never knew it. The only thing we knew that she didn't, wasn't interested in chewing bones anymore. And so, and the vet also said, it's amazing how animals can be with pain, where humans would complain and all kinds of, humans, of course, has a psychological level of suffering on top of the physical suffering.

There's an entity that comments and resists, feels sorry for itself and all those things. So humans, animals have capacity for surrendering to pain, but also animals are surrendered in death also. The same way that animals don't make life into a problem, they don't make death into a problem either.

There's something in animals that knows, that is connected with the life itself. And so they know in some non-conceptual way, they are rooted in being, so they don't have that fear of death that humans have. So take that into a meditation, become still, maybe with your animal there, and then perhaps what the animal needs will come to you from within or from the animal itself.

And then the painful decision-making process then no longer determines what action you do. I was at the vet and when the tooth got extracted from Maya, of course, with an anesthetic, and the same afternoon the receptionist said, this is very sad for us, there was a dog that had to be put down and I could hear it was being done in a room and there was a little girl crying. And I never saw the dog or the girl, but I cried a little too, but I didn't even know the dog or the girl that cried, but that's how it is.

The end of form comes to all beings, including ourselves. So becoming familiar with death is a good thing so that when death comes to someone close to you, and even a dog. Some people who don't have animals, they say, how can you make such a fuss about an animal?

But there's a deep, very deep connectedness with that being. It's not only that being, because through that being you sense the entirety of being. And so that is not something you can lose.

That remains untouched by death. So in a way, don't believe that you lose that. That would be very painful.

In a way, the dog is only an opening for that, as are you.

[Speaker 18] (1:50:53 - 1:50:54)
Thanks.

[Speaker 1] (1:51:21 - 1:56:05)
Oh, yes. Surrender. Surrender to the light.

A slight modification of the dictum, accept what is. We could also say, it's a slightly different signpost. Accept your experience of this moment, or accept whatever you're experiencing at this moment.

So if you're experiencing resistance, mental, emotional resistance, then you would have to accept that. That seems to be a contradiction, almost an impossibility, because can one accept non-acceptance? You will have to find it out.

Similarly, if you feel unhappy in whatever form, instead of wanting not to feel unhappy, and thereby, as you can't get rid of your unhappiness, feeling even more unhappy, you could also try to just be okay with being unhappy, so you no longer complain about being unhappy. I'm not saying, let me be unhappy. It's just, I'm suggesting it as an experiment.

Next time you're unhappy, what happens if you are okay with being unhappy? Because the essence of unhappiness is not being okay. So if you're not okay with whatever it is you're...

And some people are unhappy about something abstract that they call my life. They're not necessarily unhappy about a single event or a few things that should be happening, but they have this entire huge thing they call my life, and they're unhappy with it, which means you're a large part, if not the entire part of your identity, the entirety of your identity is unhappy. And there are people walking this planet who are almost or literally permanently in a state of unhappiness.

And they may be... The strange thing is, it is often not the people who have the least in the world but it's often possibly the case that there's more unhappiness to be found in the wealthier parts of the world. So if you, whatever it is, experiment with it and see to be totally okay with whatever you're experiencing at this moment.

So I don't mind being unhappy. It could be that something happens to the unhappiness when you're completely okay with it. It could be that the two states of being okay with something with the unhappiness and the unhappiness cannot coexist.

[Speaker 17] (1:56:17 - 1:56:18)
Strange.

[Speaker 1] (1:56:30 - 2:01:00)
You might have noticed that the thin layer of ice on the lake is slowly beginning to dissolve in the sunshine, forming beautiful patterns like abstract paintings. It's just like the patterns in your mind, conditioned mind patterns, slowly dissolve in the sun of awareness. But it's amazing that it does take quite a while for this ice to completely go away on the lake.

One could use this ice as an analogy also for consciousness. We could say, ice, of course, is water in a particular state. And we could say, talking about consciousness, that ice is like inanimate matter.

Things, so-called inanimate things, are like frozen consciousness. And then water can become liquid. And that would be, in this analogy, consciousness becomes a living thing, something that is alive, rather than so-called inanimate matter.

Although inanimate matter isn't all that inanimate. It only looks inanimate. As we all know, there's intense movement, even in a stone and a pebble.

There's continuous motion of atoms and molecules with vast spaces in between. So it is alive in its own way. So frozen consciousness, matter, and then it becomes liquid.

And then that means it's living things. And then what can happen to water is it can become vapor, and then it rises up. It becomes invisible, unless it's very close together.

But a lot of this moisture in the air, and you can't see it. And that would be mind. Consciousness manifesting as mind.

So you have those three stages. It's interesting, if you look upon matter as frozen consciousness, then you have a different relationship with matter. Nothing is totally inanimate.

So everything ultimately is alive. Probably even a physicist would agree with that.

But there's a big difference between something that is, there's a big difference between a pebble and a worm.

There's already what it is. Nobody knows exactly what, how does so-called inanimate matter suddenly become something else? And there's a big difference between a worm and you, I think.

Because you have a mind.

[Speaker 8] (2:01:10 - 2:01:40)
Thank you for spreading such a positive, shining light. My question is a fun kind of question. I was wondering, is it possible to have a conscious conversation?

[Speaker 1] (2:01:42 - 2:01:50)
Yes, yes. Have you experimented with that?

[Speaker 8] (2:01:51 - 2:02:05)
Yes, I have. I came to the conclusion that maybe two people wouldn't actually be talking to each other in a conscious conversation. They would be sitting opposite each other in awareness.

[Speaker 1] (2:02:06 - 2:04:41)
Oh, well, that's even better. But a conscious conversation is basically a conversation where there's at least between two people. Each person is not identified with their viewpoint, their perspective, their mental position.

They put forward their perspective, their positions, their viewpoints without any sense of self in it because they don't need that because their sense of self is derived from the presence that they can sense throughout the conversation in the background of their being. And then they can play with concepts. They can play with opinions.

They can play with words. They can play with arguments even. My argument is this and then the other person, well, and mine is that.

There's the famous saying, we, what is it? We agree to disagree or something like that. That sounds relatively conscious because if at least you're not identified with your positions, then that's fine.

We agree. That's okay. It's interesting.

Self-identification with mental positions is the unconsciousness because then you will be defending your mental positions, but you're really defending your sense of self. And this is why these conversations become easily and very quickly become very unpleasant. They are unconscious.

So in unconscious conversation and with very unconscious people, it can even happen. I mean, you can probably read about it in the papers all the time. They get so defensive and aggressive about their respective mental positions.

They start physically attacking each other. It even happens sometimes. You can see it in certain parliaments in some places.

And suddenly all these members of parliament start attacking each other. Washington sometimes gets close, but it probably hasn't quite had that where it could happen there too. Who knows?

So what is your experience with being engaged in conversation? Do you easily get into that position where you start to defend your sense of self?

[Speaker 8] (2:04:42 - 2:05:11)
In my case, I've been experimenting with thoughtless awareness. Yes. And I've been present, appreciating and being aware of the essence of the individual in front of me.

Yes. Listening to their words, but just allowing that presence of acceptance. However, I've struggled with returning a conversation point in that state.

[Speaker 1] (2:05:11 - 2:05:12)
Yes.

[Speaker 8] (2:05:14 - 2:05:15)
That's right.

[Speaker 1] (2:05:17 - 2:05:55)
And that's where the real practice begins. Because if you kind of withdraw from engagement, then it's relatively easy to sustain presence. But when you begin to actually interact verbally and thoughts, of course, thoughts become words.

Yes. Then the real practice begins. And especially if you engage in a conversation with certain things that you feel strongly about.

And ideally you choose somebody who has totally opposite viewpoints. Then you can really practice.

[Speaker 8] (2:05:59 - 2:06:45)
It's funny you should mention that because I'm an acupuncturist. Sorry? I'm an acupuncturist.

Oh, yeah. And I've just started a position in a hospital in central Sydney. And the way I operate with energy medicine is in an opposite position to Western medicine in many respects, from a thought-based point of view.

And so I'm meeting a lot of individuals who have got a very strong position. And I'm trying my best to allow this concept into this new institution. So I should imagine I'll be facing a lot of challenges.

[Speaker 1] (2:06:46 - 2:08:37)
Yes. So you can, there's a lot of, we'll be practicing conscious conversation, especially with physicians who say, I don't believe in all that. And I know that's an old, it's a load of rubbish, but you do what you do.

But then that could be an interesting conscious conversation. So it can be challenging. But the art is to remain present even as you put forward your point of view so that, and this is important, I've said it before, but I say it again, so that you don't identify with whatever thoughts you are expressing.

Identify meaning that they constitute your sense of self, and that's unconscious. That is self-identification with thinking. That's the essence of unconsciousness.

And so in order to counteract that, because there is an enormous pull when you start arguing with somebody or they argue with you, you need to, there needs to be a high degree of alertness in you. And that alertness is presence. And that alertness needs to be there.

And then the words need to come out of that state of alertness so that you don't get, and that gives you your sense of who you are. Your sense of self is in the presence. Then you can play with concepts and words.

Then you can put forward your viewpoints. And even if your viewpoints are being challenged, you will not feel attacked in your sense of self. And so that is the essence of conscious conversation.

I wish you luck.

[Speaker 8] (2:08:37 - 2:08:41)
Thank you very much. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:09:06 - 2:29:03)
We'll have some questions, but before, just read two or three questions that people have been sending in questions for people who are watching us, who are with us, but elsewhere in time, in space, and eventually in time too, except that it's always the present moment. So time ultimately is an illusion, but on a conventional level, we talk about time. So I forgot to say hello to everybody who is not physically present here, but present somewhere else on the planet.

This question has been asked in the past a few times and tends to come up very often. So it is a question that quite a few people have. If we live with a person who is unconscious a lot of the time, is it possible to have a harmonious relationship whether the person totally awakens or not?

That seems to be a recurring problem for many people. Now, if you have brought your unconscious partner here, that means, and he or she actually came along, that means not all is lost if he or she is still here. So it depends in what way the unconsciousness of the person that you live with manifests.

There are many ways in which it can manifest from being in negative states and misinterpreting what you say or do, anger, and then it goes up on the scale of verbal abuse, and then it goes higher up on the scale of unconsciousness to physical abuse. So if the unconsciousness is not too high up on that level of intensity, it may be possible to live with a person who may not share your, not only not share your interest in spiritual evolution, but have no idea what you are practicing or reading or talking about if you try to point something out. That person may just be uninterested.

And then if you go up on the scale of unconsciousness, then another person may be hostile towards what you're doing, and there's a big difference. But in both cases, there's unconsciousness. Your partner may just have no idea what it is, but say, well, yeah, go listen to that guy, Eckhart.

I don't know why you go there, but that's okay, I'll be fine. That's fine. So that should be, you can live with that person.

And then another one gets angry. Why do you always have to see me like, I can't stand it anymore, or whatever, criticize. So you might be able to live with that.

What you can live with, only you can know whether you can continue your presence practice and bring surrender into the situation with this person. And miracles are possible. Miracles do happen.

And sometimes the seemingly most unconscious person can suddenly shift. Now, if that person is very unconscious, usually what is required is some blow, not you physically throwing it. I'm speaking metaphorically.

Life administers some blow in the form of big loss, accident, illness, and then deeply unconscious people very much trapped in their ego can sometimes suddenly open up. The ego gets cracked. You may sometimes observe that when a person with a big ego is unconscious, it happens not to everybody.

When they become ill, they're lying in bed, and they're ill. Sometimes the ego gets even stronger, it seems. But for some people, the ego, there isn't enough energy left to keep the ego going in that, because the illness absorbs so much energy, so there's not enough energy for it.

And suddenly this person who was never a genuine person that you couldn't talk to heart to heart because there was always egoic posturing and egoic role-playing there. And suddenly this person is ill, lying in bed, and there just isn't enough energy for posturing and role-playing. And then for the first time, I've observed it a few times, people have told me and have personally observed, for the first time, you can communicate with that person in a deeper level of presence.

This can also happen when people who had a huge ego all throughout their lives, when they're approaching death. Sometimes miracles of transformation can happen in the last moments, in the last days, or in the last weeks of a person's life. When resentments that had been building up over a lifetime and other narratives of an extremely negative nature are let go of, can happen.

It can also happen when a person is ill that when this person recovers, that shift that you observed doesn't last. And the moment strength returns to that person, the old egoic patterns are back. And it's like, oh my God, you're your old self again.

You were so nice when you were ill. Loving and present and open. Well, just wait, things will happen again.

So if there's abuse, and these are more pronounced manifestations of unconsciousness. If there's verbal abuse, can you live with such a person? Only you can know whether you're prepared to do that, whether you can sustain your presence practice.

Perhaps not physical abuse. If you stay with physical abuse in the hope that this person will become transformed, that is probably a delusion. But I cannot tell you what to do.

But if you are alert and vigilant and observe yourself in the presence of that person, you will know what to do. You just have to see that what you, the right course of action is not being sabotaged by certain patterns that remain in your mind, mental, emotional patterns, such as fear of being alone, fear, loss of security, perhaps the security of being with another person. Even if it's fear of the unknown, stepping into the unknown.

So you may be held back by certain patterns in your mind. And if you are present enough, you can recognize that and then go beyond it. I've been a model for 10 years.

Somewhere deep inside, I kept hoping for a big break. It never came or has yet to come. Is it time to move on to another job if this job is not making me money?

It's time to move to another job if this job is not enjoyable anymore. If you're unable to enjoy what you're doing, then it's time to move to another job. But you have to look to see whether your inability to enjoy the job you're doing now has something to do with the particular job you're doing or has more to do with your inability to enjoy the present moment.

In which case, the next job that you find, you will also not enjoy. So if you can't enjoy your job, either one of these is true, either there is something for you to change, there's something inherently not right anymore with this particular job, does no longer corresponds to what, to who you are or your state of consciousness. Or you cannot enjoy your job because you haven't learned yet to be present enough to enjoy what you're doing now.

And you always think, oh, the next one is going to be much better. And if you don't know which one it is of those two, you may have to get another job and then see if you can enjoy that one. Many jobs that the mind tells you cannot be enjoyed actually can be enjoyed.

Also, the mind telling you if you enjoy this job that you really don't want this job to be permanent, and if the mind tells you, no, if I enjoy this job, I'll be stuck with it for the rest of my life and I don't want to be stuck with it. Let's say you got a job working, working in a diner as a waiter or waitress, but you really want to get your job as an actress or you really want to be a writer, you really want to be whatever you want to be, a senator, successor of Donald Trump, whatever your mind says. And so the mind says, I'm not going to enjoy this job because I really want to be somewhere else.

And if I enjoy it, then I'll really be stuck. But you may find that the opposite is the case. If it is freeing to enjoy what you are doing, even if it's not something that you would want to do for the rest of your life, all you have to do is enjoy the present moment.

Your energy field then shifts. And when this energy field shifts, you become open to life only if you no longer resist life. You cannot be open to life without the greater consciousness coming through you if you resist life.

And you resist life if you resist or resent the present moment. That's where life is. So the shift happens.

You need to be in the state of alignment with the present moment, no matter what activity you are doing in the present moment. And if you absolutely cannot be in alignment with the present moment, you need to walk out. So if I got a job as a bartender in a disco, I would walk out.

I could surrender if they shut me in there and it's impossible for me to leave the building, I would still surrender. But since there is still a door that I can open, I would walk out. Because although I know how to surrender, I wouldn't want to surrender there if I can help it.

So when we use the expression to enjoy what you do, we get this little word joy here again, enjoy. To enjoy, this is the English language, to enjoy what you do. So when you enjoy what you do, joy arises from within.

And I would say it's not the doing, it looks as if what you do perhaps gave you joy, but it's really your presence in the doing that allows the joy to come from within you. And then it flows into what you do. So rather than the doing giving you joy, because you are present in the doing, the joy arises from within and it flows into what you do.

And so you can say, I enjoy this work. I enjoy doing this. Now, if you cannot enjoy it, try first just to accept it, that this is what you're doing at this moment.

Let's say you start off with, you're working at Denny's, or you're not from the United States. Denny's is a chain of diners throughout the States. Not bad.

Okay, often there's nothing else if you're driving along. You work at, let's say you work at Denny's and you absolutely are resistance. You don't really want to be there, but you have to earn money.

You're a graduate, let's imagine you're a graduate. You've applied for jobs, but because of the recession, you can't get any jobs and you've had 50 rejections and you're getting frustrated. And here you are stuck in this menial job.

What did I study for all those years? All for nothing. All these thoughts go through your head while you're serving people.

Okay, and then you come into contact with a spiritual teaching or this teaching that points to the possibility of enjoying what you do. And you say, I can't enjoy that. Okay, then try something else.

Can you at least accept that right now, this is what you do? Don't try to get yourself to enjoy it. It might become unnatural.

You might play a role to yourself. You may go to a workshop, a new age workshop and say where they teach you, I'm happy, I'm happy. And then you can kind of, you go, I'm really enjoying this, but you're not.

So can you at least, can you accept that this is what you're doing right now? Not for the rest of your life, not even perhaps for the whole year, who knows, but just right now, this is all there is right now. So I might as well accept that this is what I'm doing right now.

Can you accept it if you can't enjoy it? Okay, I can try that. Feels already better, feels much better.

And sometimes from there, before you know it, there is no clear dividing line between acceptance and enjoyment. Somewhere they merge. So if you begin with acceptance, you may find suddenly there's even some enjoyment there.

Acceptance just means there is an absence of resistance. You're just, well, that's what is. And that can sometimes take you suddenly, before you know it, there's an enjoyment that arises.

[Speaker 18] (2:29:03 - 2:29:04)
Oh.

[Speaker 1] (2:29:05 - 2:41:34)
So if you think you can't enjoy it, don't force yourself to enjoy that doesn't work. Accept that's all first. This is what is right now.

I talked about that in the New Earth where I had three modalities. It's just come back to you. I haven't read the book in a long time.

Three modalities of doing. You can have acceptance. You can have enjoyment.

Or the most intense is, and this is usually when there's a creative process happening through you, I call it enthusiasm. Enthusiasm is an intense energy stream that flows, is part of creativity. And so if you are, in order to live consciously and sanely, you have to be in either one of these three modalities.

If you're neither in acceptance, nor enjoyment, nor enthusiasm, you are somewhere in dysfunction. And you're creating unhappiness and suffering for yourself. And that usually implies you're also creating suffering for others because unhappy humans make others unhappy too.

So if you cannot accept, enjoy, or be in enthusiasm, remove yourself. Remove yourself. And then try again somewhere else.

But acceptance, in a way, is the most accessible, of course, to. Just try that. That's it.

My sons drowned in the sea 10 months ago. I did surrender, but when I felt the peace and calm coming over me, it felt wrong. It was not right to feel peace and calm with such a loss.

That's the natural way of being after death of a loved one is there's suffering at first, and then there is a deepening. And in that deepening, you go to a place where there is no death. And the fact that I'm not talking to the questioner who is not here, the fact that you felt that means you went deep enough to the place where there is no death.

But their mind, conditioned as your mind is, of course, by the society, the contemporary world you live in, which knows nothing about that dimension, your mind then tells you that there's something wrong about this. And your mind says, I should not be feeling peace. It's not what one feels in a situation like this.

But that's a conditioned thought by the culture that you live in. So instead, you can recognize when this happens, when that thought comes, and recognize it as a conditioned thought that is not true. It doesn't mean that the waves of sadness don't come back from time to time.

But in between the waves of sadness, you sense that peace. And as you sense that peace, you can sense the essence of your children also, the timeless essence. So death is a very sacred thing, not just a dreadful thing.

When you react to the loss of form, it's dreadful. When you go deep enough to the formless, the dreadful becomes, it's no longer dreadful, it's sacred. Then you experience the two levels when somebody dies close to you.

Yes, it's dreadful on the level of form. It's sacred. On the deeper level.

And death can enable you to find that dimension in yourself. And you're helping countless other humans if you find that dimension in yourself, the sacred dimension of life. So death can help you find the sacred dimension of life, where life is indestructible.

Surrender can open that door for you, complete acceptance of that. So honor that sacred dimension and realize that what your mind is saying that this isn't right, is just a form of conditioning. It's not the truth.

It is supremely right. Death is always a window into the formless as you accept it, surrender, because the form is gone. Your mind becomes still when you surrender to death.

There's nothing, explanations are, it's not through explanations that you accept death. You could have explanations, mental explanations that say, well, he or she, they will move on, reincarnate or go to a place of rest. That can be comforting, but there's a deeper, you can go to a deeper place than that where you don't need even explanations and a state of immediate realization of the sacredness of death, because what opens up when the form dissolves is life that is beyond form and that's sacred.

That's the only thing that is sacred. It's not a thing. The only, that is the sacred dimension.

You can get tiny glimpses of that, tiny glimpses of that when you lose something and you completely accept that it's gone. This is a tiny glimpse of death and can give you a tiny realization, maybe even more than tiny if you're ready. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 17] (2:42:07 - 2:42:09)
Thank you all for this opportunity.

[Speaker 16] (2:42:09 - 2:43:02)
My question is nearly all spiritual and spiritualists and religious traditions refer to some sort of life after death. The idea of living on after dying seems to me like an idea that egoic structures would come up with in order to support or enhance the ego. Some sort of life after death might still be true, but it seems to me that the idea could instead possibly be one big narrative lie created and propagated across human civilization by the ego.

Our embodied consciousness can be realized while we are alive, but upon death might actually become completely non-existent. Can you please speak to this?

[Speaker 1] (2:43:03 - 2:49:51)
Right, a very profound question. The ultimate answers, reincarnation, of course, there are many traditions that speak of reincarnation. And it's always good to just, whenever you are asked a question, you can speak from your own experience or realization.

And this is what I am also going to do mostly. The first thing to discover experientially is, as I've said before, it sounds a little strange, is that you are essentially invisible. Not only what I can see of you is the body, and sometimes I may be able to see certain things in your mental, emotional field.

I can hear words that you speak or your facial expressions. I'm talking to everybody, not just to Tina, but I can see facial expressions that kind of give me a hint of what you're feeling or thinking. But anybody who was looking for you in the realm of physicality would not find you.

And if that's too much, let's just go for a moment to, let's talk about, this perhaps makes sense to anybody who has a dog or a cat at home. When the dog or cat dies, which can be a very sad thing for people, and we come to humans later, it might be a little bit easier to start with the dog or cat. You may realize in that moment when suddenly the dog is dead or the cat is dead, but everything is still there, the fur, the body.

There may even be some warmth left in the body, and there it is. But that which you essentially loved and related to in the dog or the cat isn't there anymore. So you can still, the touch is still the same, but something essentially is gone, and that was always invisible.

What you love in the dog is ultimately, or the dog, you might like, love the way the dog looks and what it does. But when you relate to a dog, you essentially love, or you know what it might have actually if you expressed it like that consciously, you love the consciousness of the dog. That's what you love in the dog.

And when you look into the eyes of the dog, what's looking back at you is there's a consciousness of the dog looking back at you. And when that's gone, the dog is, and same with the human. What you love in the human is the consciousness of the other human.

And now you yourself, all that is invisible because consciousness is the greatest mystery in the universe, that science still has no idea what to do with it, cannot explain consciousness, in most cases avoids talking about consciousness. The greatest mystery is the fact that the universe is conscious and that you are conscious. A surgeon looking for you by cutting open your skull and analyzing your brain will not find even a trace of you, will not even find any of your countless, hundreds of thousands or million memories that you have somewhere.

What, in what form does a memory survive in you? Is the memory of your first teacher at school? I just mentioned the word and suddenly an image of the first teacher you had at school comes to you.

The memory of your grandmother who passed away, the memory of the bed that you slept in when you were eight or 10 years old. I just need to mention it. It was somewhere, but where did that live in you?

Was that in a molecule or an atom? One atom was your bed? Or what is it?

Nobody knows, and nobody can find even the memories that you make up the person that you are, even on that level, let alone the deeper level of the unconditioned consciousness, nobody can find you there. You don't exist in the realm of the visible and not just the deepest essence, even as a person, even the person that you are, which is a mental, emotional construct or entity, even mind and emotion, you cannot find a thought as a material form. So this is why the downloading as some science fiction predictions, downloading your mind into a computer, I don't think that's going to happen.

It's an interesting idea, but it's not going to happen. You don't even know what a thought is. Nobody knows, and it doesn't exist in the realm of the visible.

So you are essentially invisible. Now that you can, you can sense that, that you are essentially invisible. The moment there's a cessation in the stream of thinking and all that remains is even though, even all the thought is already invisible, but if you go a little deeper, there's the consciousness.

[Speaker 17] (2:49:53 - 2:49:57)
And you cannot see it, taste it, touch it.

[Speaker 1] (2:50:02 - 2:52:18)
Now the important question that arises, is this consciousness a product of the physical brain? Is it produced by the physical brain? Is it possible that the physicality of the brain, which is on one level chemistry, on a deeper level, the atoms and molecules.

So on the chemical level, the soup, the chemical soup that makes up the brain, can the physicality produced something non-physical that is consciousness, or is the entire consciousness an illusion? As some scientists say, it's an illusion that the chemical soup is having. But who knows that?

Who is the one that knows that the chemical soup is having an illusion? It's getting very complex now. Is consciousness an epiphenomenon?

That's a fancy word for by-product. Is consciousness an epiphenomenon of the brain, the physical brain? Or undoubtedly there's a connection between the physical brain, physicality and consciousness, because you can knock somebody out, or somebody could give me a substance that makes me unconscious, or I could fall suddenly on my head and stop talking.

Is that proof that consciousness is produced by the brain? Would it be proof, is it if I smash the TV, that whatever you have been watching, or let's say the radio, I don't know if people still have radios, if I smash the radio, which had been playing the Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and suddenly Beethoven's Ninth Symphony disappears. And then I say, ah, this is proof that the radio produces the music.

[Speaker 7] (2:52:46 - 2:54:49)
So I have a pain-body question. And the basic is, how do I know if I've dissolved it, or if it's just gone dormant? My experience, like prior to four years ago, when I discovered the power now, is that when it would come up, I wasn't even aware of it, and I drank and drugged and managed emotion that way, and then I got in recovery, and I would share and talk about the pain, and it seemed to dissolve in those moments, but upon discovering Eckhart's work, I was thinking, well, maybe it's just gone dormant.

And so in the last four years, I noticed certain suggestions or triggers. They still bring it up. And I think, okay, in the moment, I can dissolve it.

I've used some of the techniques right out of chapter two, maybe three, where, you know, try not to feed it with thought, and just, you know, look where it's at, put attention there. But then, and I've had some success with it dissolving. I didn't have to go share it with another ego, but I wasn't sure if it was Eckhart's ego through the reading that helped put it dormant or not.

So this idea of dissolving, my hope is like, I want my pain body gone for good. Yeah, and we all do. And I'm being told if I can just stay present 100% of the time, then it is dissolved.

But then I can't seem to stay present. I tend to go to sleep all the time. And then all of a sudden my pain body wakes me up.

So I don't.

[Speaker 2] (2:54:49 - 2:54:50)
So you know it's not dissolved.

[Speaker 7] (2:54:51 - 2:54:51)
Yes.

[Speaker 2] (2:54:51 - 3:01:44)
Yeah, yeah. Then you deal with that in the moment. What a drag.

But I want it gone. That's what the ego says. I want it gone.

Why do I have to keep on dealing with this? It's ego. The moment that we can just face it and when it comes up and not even think about whether it's gonna be gone forever because you know what?

Forever is now. There is no forever. There is no time.

There's only this moment and what arises in this moment. Are we gonna choose to deal with it consciously or unconsciously? And then the mind will bring up and the ego will bring up that oh, but I've gotta have it, you know, stay away forever and I can't have it come back.

Huh. You know, it could be gone for years. And then life will say okay, you're ready for another test to see if it's really gone.

Who are you committed to? Are you committed to consciousness? Are you committed to being unconscious?

Which means bringing in time, bringing in the ego, bringing in thoughts such as I don't want this ever to come up again. That's a thought. We are dealing with a lot of baggage, not only personally but collectively because we are all connected.

We're one. So we've got our personal unconscious actions that we have dealt with and that personal could be in your family life and your upbringing and stuff and then we have the collective unconsciousness within our own community, within our society, within our country, different egos. And it is interesting because when you say you want it gone, I mean, that's a nice thought to have but it's not the reality of this moment because even when you dissolve your own, you're going to feel, you actually become more fine-tuned, okay, where you will begin to feel the collective unconsciousness and the collective pain body.

Yeah, because you are awakening and you are meant to awaken and not only bring healing to yourself through that conscious being but we are also meant to bring healing to others. That's how it works. That's the cycle and the gift of awakening is now we have to be present for others and we are there and whether we become formal teachers or informal teachers, we will be teaching because life, the evolution of consciousness is happening through the human being and that means all human beings, including the ones that are severely unconscious.

So even when you dissolve your own pain body or when that happens, maybe it's not you as in the ego you dissolving it but when it happens through you that it's actually dissolved, your work isn't finished. You'll find life might bring you somebody that comes along who has a big pain body and you're there as that aid, that assistant, that helper. I've told this story before and the reason why I keep telling this one is because it was the most profound and the first time I really understood what Eckhart meant was that how we can bring, help somebody dissolve their pain body.

I went to a Starbucks, got my tea and there were several empty seats but I happened to sit down in a particular seat and right next to me was this young girl and an older man, maybe her father, I don't know. But she was really upset, angry. You could feel that burning energy coming off her and I'm like, well, there's other seats.

I guess I can move, that was my thought but my body wasn't moving and I recognized, okay, my body's not moving so I guess I'm staying put. And all I can do is drink my tea and feel this sensation that was happening because energy knows no boundaries. It won't go, hey, you know, I'll stop here.

It just, right? It's all one. So here I am feeling it as I'm drinking my tea and suddenly, and I don't know how long it was, whether it's 15, 20 minutes, 30 minutes, I wasn't aware of the time but suddenly what I felt inside of me, that energy that I was feeling that was inside me suddenly burst.

The moment that it burst, she started laughing and I understood what Eckhart meant by how we can help dissolve another person's pain body. If you are truly unaffected and it doesn't touch your own pain body, so meaning your start to get activated, you can sit through somebody's pain body and help them dissolve it. But as soon as it activates yours, then you need to be more conscious, more aware because you're really not gonna be much help because it's within you unless you can sit with both that's happening at the same time.

And if you can't, then I suggest that you remove yourself because you don't want your pain body to become fully activated because then you'll go into full unconsciousness. So you can remove yourself and then dissolve it within your own body. So life will bring you an event to show you whether or not it's dissolved or not.

And if it isn't dissolved, wonderful. It just means you've got more work and that's okay because it's what's happening, it's what is.

[Speaker 1] (3:02:19 - 4:05:15)
You mentioned that pain is necessary for growth, but in one of your talks in the past, you mentioned that pain is necessary for growth until we realize that it is not necessary. Which one do you agree with more? Which one do you agree with more?

Let's see. Let's see. Well, pain is necessary for growth.

There are exceptions. It's usually true. I just forgot to add until you realize that it's no longer necessary, that's all.

It's the same statement. It's just the first statement was incomplete. So it's the same thing, pain.

At some point you realize your further evolution no longer requires pain. All of you are here because you've reached that stage. But if pain should still come or suffering still come, then all it'll do is it'll lead to greater deepening of where you are already.

Title of the question is, is it possible to go to the state of presence directly? The question is, is it possible to be in the state of presence without before having questioned all our stressful thoughts? I think that Byron Katie would say no.

Thank you. Okay, I'll read it again. Is it possible to be in the state of presence without before having questioned all our stressful thoughts?

I think that Byron Katie would say no. Okay. For those of you who don't know Byron Katie's teaching, it's about questioning your stressful thoughts so that you don't believe in every thought that comes into your head anymore.

So you ask things like when a thought arises and you make a statement about a situation, a person, about yourself, about life, you ask yourself, do I know absolutely that this is true? Example. Example.

And other questions with which you address that thought. Now, the questioner says, can one be in a state of presence without before having questioned all our stressful thoughts? Well, there is no, the questioning of your stressful thoughts implies that there's already an awareness that's arising.

Without an awareness of your thoughts, you can't even question your thoughts because you would be your thoughts. So you wouldn't be able to step outside the thought. Consciousness would not be able to at least partially step outside the thought and from there, look at the thought and question whether this is absolutely true or whether this is just one of many possible perspectives.

So the questioning of your thoughts is inseparable from the arising of presence, although not for everybody in whom presence arises. It applies that they question their thoughts. It might, the disidentification can happen in various ways, but the arising of presence always implies disidentification from thinking.

Questioning your thoughts is a way in which that happens, one particular way in which that happens. So you cannot question all your thoughts and then enter the state of presence as the questioner implies. It's a simultaneous process.

As you question your thoughts again and again, as they arise, especially stressful thoughts means thoughts that cause you upset or suffering, then you begin to disidentify and with the disidentification, presence or awareness grows. And when it's grown enough, thought loses its power to make you unhappy, loses its power to bring about a state of stress inside you, to make you suffer, basically. So as awareness arises, awareness grows, the power of thinking to make you unhappy and to distort your experience of reality diminishes.

And so, and that's the transitional stage. And then you come to a stage where stressful thoughts don't even arise anymore. But the most important thing is already when thoughts, if they do still arise, the intermediate stage, they're recognized as stressful thoughts, so they lose their hold over you.

In other words, the mind loses its hold over you. There's no longer total identification with who you are and your mind. And then in the awakened stage, stressful thoughts don't arise anymore.

In other words, you don't tell yourself stories that make you unhappy or upset. And so then to a large extent, you can let things be. To a large extent, you can move around life without an excessive interference of thinking.

You can approach situations and people and let them be, even interact without judgments. That's an enormous sense of freedom that comes in. And you become free of external conditions.

The external conditions no longer have power over you. You no longer give them that power. You only give them that power through your involvement in them, and the involvement in them happens through judgment and reactivity, which are unconscious.

It's a wonderful thing when you don't need to judge people anymore. You'll just let them be. And one thing you notice then with people who are conscious in an awakened state, you don't hear them say, commenting negatively about anybody.

It's not ultimately true. Any negative comment just strengthens the ego. Don't complain about anybody.

They do what they do. What can you add to that by complaining? Situations are as they are.

What can you add to them by upset? Should, shouldn't, all those mind structures. He should have, he should not have.

They shouldn't, they should. I should have, why didn't I, why didn't he? That complicates life.

But that's the most people's reality. So with the awakened state, you become very simple and just very clear, and really no situation is complicated anymore. And you don't even try to figure out what people's motivations are.

They do what they do. And today's thief or dishonest person, or whatever they do, maybe 10, 20 years from now, they may be enlightened. So when you call a thief a thief, then you fixed him in your mind.

You've created a conceptual reality for that person and stuck it on his head. But you cannot stick a conceptual reality on somebody's head without sticking an equivalent one on your head. And since the mind manufactures a conceptual reality for everybody with fixed ideas and opinions about people, often with a focus on the negative, often with a focus on their shortcomings.

So you get trapped in prisons. You have a prison for everybody, a conceptual prison, not realizing that the more conceptual prisons you create for everybody else, the more you yourself get trapped in your own conceptual prison. Somebody else said that 2,000 years ago in slightly different words about judging others.

But it's so prevalent, that mind pattern, and it's so satisfying to the ego, the false mind-made sense of self. With every conceptual prison that you make for somebody else, it feels strengthened in its sense of identity. The more you judge, the stronger the ego feels, because you have the authority.

You are then the authority figure that judges. You are morally superior to every person that you judge and to any situation that you judge. This is the implication, the unconscious assumption.

And imagine then millions of humans living in that way, forming a nation or forming a religion or any entity, collective entity. So the world cannot change unless those patterns change. And they do not change with the collective entities.

They can only change with you. And it requires vigilance on your part to know whether or to what extent you're still doing it. As a spiritual practice, you could say, next time I complain about somebody or say anything negative, I'll notice it.

Let's see if I can catch myself. And when you do, you don't need to beat yourself up. It's a success.

It's not a failure to catch yourself in a negative conditioned thought, to notice it. You don't say, oh, you see, I'm doing it again. How dreadful.

No, it's a great success to catch a thought. And then, oh, well, there it goes again. You don't even need to say, go away.

It's enough to see it. And then it loses its power over you. That's all.

♪♪♪ Presence and stillness are really synonymous. There are different words you can use to talk about it. Another word you could use is awareness.

So let's look briefly at what presence is, both conceptually and experientially. Knowing something usually involves these two levels. So to know what presence is, it helps to understand it conceptually to some extent.

But there's also a different way of knowing something, not only presence, anything, knowing it directly without concepts. The example of, given, I think it originated in India. Some, I don't know which spiritual teacher gave that example.

So you can ask, do you know what honey is? Yes, I know what honey is. You could know a lot about honey.

You can write a PhD about honey, and I'm sure people have done it. There's a lot to know about it. That's knowing through conceptualization.

And then there's direct knowing, which is tasting the honey. Now, it could be that you know honey only as a taste, so you might not know anything about it conceptually, and yet you might experience the taste of honey every day. And you have an intimate relationship with honey without knowing much about it.

Maybe you don't even know that the bees produce it. That's already conceptual knowledge. So for many things, both are needed.

But in our world, we have placed excessive emphasis on conceptual knowing, cutting things up into little fragments, interpreting it through the veil of concepts, interpreting your entire reality. Every moment, every experience is immediately conceptually interpreted, and that's the mind. There's a place for that, we need it.

But we should not be consumed by it, possessed by it. That's the danger, and this is where presence comes in. Presence is another way of being, a way of knowing that is non-conceptual.

So if I talk about it conceptually, I could say presence is a dimension of consciousness that is accessible to a human being, although many humans don't even know that it exists or that it is possible. But quite a few humans occasionally experience moments of presence without knowing what it is. They may experience it as a moment of just inner peace or clarity or an intense sense of aliveness.

A feeling totally at one with the present moment and your surroundings and other human beings, a sense of oneness. For most humans, when it comes, it doesn't stay for too long, and then you are back in what is really the ego state, which is you identify with a conceptual self-image, a narrative in your mind, and the narrative you call me or my life, and you think that is your true identity, but it's not your true identity. It is a superficial kind of identity.

There's a deep identity that connects you with something that far transcends who or what you are as a person. We don't necessarily need to name it, but it connects you with something deep, profound, the source, and that is presence or awareness. And it's a state of consciousness or a dimension of consciousness that all ancient spiritual teachings have pointed to, spoken about, using different words to talk about it.

So people have never tasted the honey of presence. They think all those different teachings and different spiritual traditions are totally different. They don't realize that they talk about the same thing, just using different terminology.

So if you hadn't tasted honey, you could read different books about honey, and they use totally different words or different languages to talk about, say, oh, they're all totally different. No, they all point to the one thing that honey is. So let's taste the honey then.

We've spoken about it. Presence is when you're able to experience this moment without a screen of mental concepts and interpretations and judgments, clarity of perception. That's the beginning of it.

So they would mean, it implies that perhaps briefly, the stream of thinking that is usually behind your sense perceptions, continuously interpreting, calling it this or that, that stream of thinking temporarily subsides, and there's a moment of not thinking. Maybe it's just a few seconds, but you haven't fallen asleep at all. You're completely awake, but you're not thinking.

So to even have a taste of that, even here and now, to be completely awake and alert, there's a moment of, a space of no thought, just awareness or presence. You can take everything in, all the visual, auditory perception, any of the senses, and there's a stillness around every thought, sense perceptions, or behind the sense perceptions, a still presence. You can look at a tree, a plant, see it, even know it through presence, not conceptually.

You might not know what this plant is called. It's concepts, and yet you can look at this plant, and there's a background to the sense perception that's called stillness, because you're not thinking, and that enables you actually to go deeper, to relate to things, seemingly external things, without a sense of separation. You can sense, for example, you can sense the being of the plant, there's a stillness in it, or a tree.

Natural things are helpful in this. Trees are very still, plants are very still. Some trees have been there for hundreds of years, and there's always, they can just give them some attention without concepts, and they almost, they don't speak to you, but there's almost a sense of communication, or oneness.

You can sense their being, because you can sense your being. Being recognizes itself, that's presence. So it's a moment of no thought, of awareness.

Thought subsides, awareness arises, and replaces thought for a little while. Thought comes back when you need it. It'll probably come back even when you don't need it.

It'll push its way back into your mind, until you become a bit more familiar with presence, and it stays there for longer, and after a while, even while you're using your mind, there's still a sense of presence in the background. As I'm speaking now, I'm using the mind, or maybe even that's not the correct way of saying it, not I as a person is using the mind. The deeper I, which is presence, is using the mind, and talking about presence.

The deep I, I call it. The surface I is you as the person with a history, a personal history, some good, some bad, personal problems, everybody has them, but there's a deeper I. The deep I, that's consciousness itself, that's presence.

And so that is the most important realization in any person's life, in anybody's life, the discovery of that dimension within them. Is religion necessary if only presence matters? Is there a place for going to church and following in the steps of Jesus if only presence is important?

The question is specifically about focusing on Christian religion, but the answer, I suppose, I don't know what the answer is going to be, but it's going to be probably also referred to other religions, or religions in general. Is religion necessary? It depends who you are on the level of the form.

For some people, it can be necessary or helpful. For two reasons, it can provide the more superficial reason. It can give your life a certain amount of structure, which for some people can be helpful.

Regular practice gives you a feeling of comfort. Some people have too little structure in their lives and others have too much already. More importantly, on another level, religion can either obscure the spiritual dimension within yourself, and often it does, or if used rightly, if approached rightly, if understood on a deeper level, it can help you access and stay in connectedness with that deeper level of yourself or the transcendent dimension of consciousness.

Whether or not you need it, only you can know. Whether you find it either helpful or a hindrance, it can be either, depends on you as a person, your past, what function it had in your past, and so on. It is a hindrance if religion becomes an ideology.

Then it operates only on the level of the mind, and it's very similar to any other kind of ideology that you may believe in, whether it's communism as an ideology or any political theory or anything that explains the universe. It could be a metaphysical system that you completely believe in, philosophical system, and so on. So an ideology is something that takes possession of your mind, and exerts a controlling function, and it can influence almost your entire mental functioning if it becomes something of overwhelming power in your mind.

It's a little thought that grows into a huge thing in your mind, and the tentacles reach into every aspect of your mind, and there are religious people like that. Usually you can recognize that it is an ideology by the fact that they are not peaceful human beings, and by the fact that they have enemies, either even within their own religion or another religion. Anybody who does not agree with their ideology becomes an enemy.

In the same way, the people who were not nowadays that many were deeply believing in communism, which was a wonderful idea to start with, of course. The road to hell is paved with good intentions. It was a beautiful idea of equality.

Everybody would say, well, that is wonderful. No personal possessions, sounds wonderful too. And the only mistake was it was imposed from outside by people who themselves has not gone beyond the egoic state of consciousness.

They just played it in their mind as that's a good idea, and then it was imposed on other people who also were not in that state of consciousness, but most importantly, those who imposed the idea on others forced them to live it out. The ideal became contaminated with ego. So when these people came to power, their egos became inflated to an enormous degree, almost to absurdity, and without realizing it, they reenacted the same evils, and in some cases worse than those that they were fighting against.

Like in Russia, they saw the injustices associated with the Tsar regime and so on, and they truly saw that, and they truly wanted to remove that, and that seemed a good thing. But they had overlooked their own state of consciousness, and the great challenge is for people, power. You can have that very meek person that seems, oh, this is what a lovely person.

He seems to have no ego or very little. He's so, give that person power. Then the latent ego, which was there in a, let's say a person's very poor, has no power at all.

Give that poor person power, then the latent ego will no longer be latent. It will suddenly come to life, and that happens, is repeated, and has been repeated many, many times in countries where frequently the government is overthrown, and then the previous rulers are accused of corruption, and the new people who overthrow the previous, they truly believe that now they have a just, more just society is going to arrive, because they, again, they don't know themselves. They have not observed themselves, and the moment they achieve power, they are seduced by that, and their ego suddenly grows, and they reenact the same thing again.

Ha, ha. So ideology, religion can turn into, and often does turn into ideology. You can recognize it, as I said, by the fact that these people are not peaceful.

They will condemn other people or other groups of people as evil. They may verbally, even physically, attack others, and if it's not that extreme, it might be that they simply are extremely intolerant towards anybody who does not share their belief system, their ideology, and so that's a clear sign that that kind of religion is a hindrance to the spiritual dimension, to knowing who you are, to being a peaceful human being. It's in the service of the ego.

It's an egoic creation. The ego can take scriptures that are beautiful and point to the truth and can corrupt them, completely misread and misinterpret them, and then they're used in the service of the ego. So that's how religion can become a huge hindrance, but religion can also become an opening into the spiritual dimension.

So a religious practice or a religious reading, a reading of a sacred text, an ancient spiritual text, can be a wonderful thing. The questioner mentions Jesus, following in the steps of Jesus, is that or is only presence important? When you use it in a deeper sense, following in the steps of Jesus means becoming present.

How? First of all, Jesus taught presence in quite a few of his utterances, starting from the flower, that you said you should really look at a flower and see how it lives in the present moment without worry and anxiety. He taught egolessness, deny thyself, which means recognize the unreality of yourself.

He spoke of the I am as the foundation and which is misinterpreted. We have, let's just for a moment, in Christianity, we have a historical person, probably Jesus, and we have Christ. Now, Christ was not his actual name.

It was a title given later. And that's already mentioned in the more enlightened parts of the New Testament, that Christ is a dimension of consciousness. And I believe it's St. Paul who says, I must diminish and Christ in me must grow. This is a mystical, deeper interpretation of Jesus who was an historical person who realized his kinship with the transcendent dimension, the divine, whatever you want to call it. He realized his connectedness, his kinship, his oneness with that. And as he realized that, he became the transcendent dimension emerged in him as it does in you.

It emerged in him. And then the historical person, Jesus, became the Christ. Therefore we have in mystical Christianity, the term Christ consciousness, which is the transcendent consciousness that emerges where before there was only the person.

And we have in certain Buddhist traditions, the term Buddha nature that says that every human being and everything that's alive has at the core of their being is Buddha nature or the Buddha as the reality of who you are. That's the teaching in some Buddhist traditions. And it's a beautiful teaching that your true nature is Buddha nature.

And you just have to realize your true nature is Buddha nature. Isn't that what we've been talking about? It's just a different name attached to it.

In mystical Christianity, it's Christ consciousness. And so Jesus was a precursor who showed the way to Christ consciousness. And if we're focusing on the historical figure of Jesus and realizing that he embodies both the person and the Christ can become a vehicle for you if that is suitable for you.

And if you still feel drawn to Christianity or any other religion, that is the way for you to go deepen that rather than think you have to move into something else. But if that doesn't work for you, then fine. Then walk away and find Christ consciousness somewhere else.

And some people don't need any religious structure anymore. This is for the first time, perhaps in the evolution of humanity, there's spirituality that exists outside of formalized religions. And that's an amazing thing.

So many of you may not need the formalized religion anymore and others may need it. And that is a beautiful thing. You can deepen the way in which you live, practice and understand your religion so that it becomes an opening into the transcendent dimension within yourself.

If you are a Christian and want to deepen certain readings, I would highly recommend there were certain teachers who expressed the truth of Christianity from a deeper level than the conventional church Christianity. The most, in the past, Meister Eckhart, who lived in the early middle ages, the most wonderful, his writings are superb and in fantastic depth to them. And he uses Christianity to take you very, very deep into the core of it all, the core of all things into yourself.

Other mystical writers in the middle ages are good too. Some Spanish ones, some more German ones. And more recently, I would recommend Course in Miracles, which uses Christian terminology throughout, which to some people is obnoxious, can't stand it.

And others say, oh, now I understand Christianity much better. And Joel Goldsmith, he was a teacher in the fifties and sixties, also reinterprets Christianity and makes it deeper, discovers the depth dimension that's there. And other religions have the same.

You have deep teachings in Judaism. You have deep teachings in Islam. You have deep teachings, obviously, in Buddhism.

So there's the superficial level to religion. And if that's all there is for you, it will probably become an ideology and then it becomes a barrier. Or if understood more deeply, it can become an opening.

This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. Sometimes when I hear you talk about presence, it seems like you're describing a person or describing a state in which there's no mental or emotional content.

And yet I experience emotions in presence, perhaps sadness when something happens that is difficult for another person or at the news of the death of someone I love. And I experienced that emotion happening in present time. Isn't this possible for him?

Isn't it possible for emotional experiences to arise in presence? Yes, you can have presence while the emotions are happening or even while thoughts are happening. It means you're not totally lost in, totally identified with, totally drawn into the emotion or the thought.

There is in the background a space of awareness that in the foreground there is a space of awareness where there may be anger, sadness, and you're not totally lost in it. There's a space for it that you still sense and you are essentially not the emotion. You're the awareness behind the emotion.

You know that this emotion is there. The same thing can happen when the mind is active. You can talk and the mind can completely take over and you become lost in your mind, in a stream, either a stream of thinking or a stream of speaking.

You can observe it. If you can't yet observe the mind stream in yourself, you can occasionally just quietly observe people talking to each other and especially people who are having a discussion because when you're having a usually discussion or a disagreeing about something, there is not only the mind, there's also an emotion that goes with the mind stream. That's the disagreement.

Why is there an emotion when people are having a discussion and a disagree? Why is there an emotion that goes with their mental positions because they're identified with a mental position that identify means their sense of self has become one with the thought. The consciousness, the I, has identified with the form rather than realizing that it is formless in essence.

It has lost that knowledge so consciousness is in a dreamlike state, I could say. Consciousness identifies with I, with the form and so there is a self-identification with a mental position or thought which means anybody who questions or doubts or contradicts this mental position or thought is unconsciously regarded by the self-identified thought structure which you have become. The ego is part of ego.

Anybody who disagrees, contradicts, doubts is unconsciously, not in so many words, but unconsciously regarded as an enemy because you are threatening, it's a delusion, but there's an unconscious belief that the other person is threatening my very being because the person is threatening my mental position with which I have identified. So you can, it's a very deeply unconscious process and it requires quite an alertness to see it in the moment that it happens in yourself. But perhaps next time somebody comes to you and you're having a kind of disagreement about something and suddenly you can feel an influx as you defend your position or contradict the other person or justify something, feel the emotion that flows into what you say.

It will be some kind of either aggressive or defensive emotion that goes with it, either some fear or some aggression. If you can be aware of that at that moment and realize what is happening that you have identified with something in your mind believing that that is you, believing your very existence is threatened by somebody contradicting you, it's unconscious. That's why people get aggressive and negative energy flows the moment somebody contradicts you.

It just means somebody has a different opinion, but the ego can't allow a different opinion because the ego feels its existence is threatened by a different opinion because ego's identification with thought and a mental position. This is on a personal level, this can become an entire war between nations, the similar pattern. So you can, at first you can see it, let's say you're observing two people having a discussion and of course, let's say you are not involved, then it's easier for you to see that process at work and realize that usually both of them become drawn into a very negative confrontation simply because they hold different opinions, but for them it's more than an opinion, it's their very self that's threatened. It's an illusion, but that's how it is perceived.

So it's very fundamental and very basic to the huge amount of conflict that arises in human interactions. And it's basically so simple that it's just quite incomprehensible that people haven't realized by now that this is how it works. And so, but the pattern is so deep seated that even people who are engaged in spiritual work for years still get drawn into that when their mental position is threatened.

No matter how much spirituality, there they are defending their very existence because the pattern is very deep. So alertness is required. If you don't want to carry on in that way for the rest of your life and be part of that, madness ultimately, dysfunction ultimately, because it creates continuous conflict and negative feelings and so on, and interferes with the true relationship with another human being, be aware in yourself of this process when and as it happens.

And for that, you have to wait until the moment comes when somebody contradicts you or says, no, you're not right or I don't agree or whatever they say, and then you have to be alert. What is it that comes up and wants to defeat the other or protect itself? So that is a very vital thing, but presence is required.

The pattern is deep, very deep-seated. Without the presence, each time, every time it will take you over and you'll be lost. So alertness.

I can't remember what the question was, but this is vital. Ah, yes. Sometimes when I hear you talk about presence, it seems like you're describing a state in which there's no mental or emotional content, and yet I experience emotions in presence.

So we've been talking now just about experiencing the absence of presence and there's a mental-emotional stream that comes up. You can do it to yourself also. You can have a discussion with yourself.

You can doubt yourself. You can have an argument with yourself. You can have one part of your mind accusing another part of your mind of being lazy, for example, of being not good enough.

And then you have to have a similar argument with one part of your mind split in two and says, you should know better by now. You should do better. Why did you do this?

Well, I couldn't help it. No presence. So, yes, there can be presence when there are thoughts and emotions, and it is vital that there should be presence in the background, which means just you're aware that certain emotions are coming through you and you're not the emotion, but you're the awareness.

You're aware that certain thoughts are there. You're aware that you have an opinion. You're aware that you're voicing your opinion.

That's fine, but you are not in the opinion. Your sense of self isn't in the opinion. Your sense of self is the awareness.

And then you can express an opinion, and you can say, the universe is, in essence, consciousness. And then the other person says, that's a load of rubbish, or whatever they say. Mumbo-jumbo, you are talking mumbo-jumbo.

Where is the, show me the consciousness, or whatever the flat-footed materialist is saying to you. And then observe. See whether you actually know that you, the universe, which means you, ultimately comes down to you, as this is where you experience the universe as yourself.

Do you know that the universe is consciousness, or do you just believe that the universe, at that moment, are you the consciousness, or are you the belief that you are consciousness? If you are the belief, then you are the thought, and then you'll be defending yourself. So you'll be shouting back at the other person, that they are narrow-minded bigots.

Or there is an awareness in the background, and then you say, the universe is consciousness, the other person says, that's a load of rubbish, then you say, well, I'm sure in your perception, that the universe is not consciousness, and that's fine. Why should you believe that the universe is, that's not within your reality? Fine, you are entitled to believing that the universe is a soup of chemicals, that's fine, that's your reality, it's perfectly, I'm perfectly comfortable to allow you your reality of living in a soup of chemicals, or whatever, atoms floating around, whatever it is, or the gray matter of the brain producing the illusion of consciousness, whatever, it's fine.

No defensiveness anymore, and no negative feelings. This is why I liked the, when Obama said, you don't need to be disagreeable to disagree, you don't need to become disagreeable when you disagree. The deeper implication is, you're not identified with your mental position.

He couldn't say that, because nobody would understand what he's talking about, so, well, only some people would understand. There's awareness in the background, so presence or awareness is there while things happen in the foreground. The foreground can be your thoughts, the foreground can be your emotions, the foreground can be whatever is happening around you.

And so, the perceptions of whatever is happening outside, there's also, you're not perceiving this through the screen of concepts or thoughts, you're perceiving through, you are the awareness, not the thoughts, and even if a thought comes and says, that person looks weird, then you realize it's just a thought in your head, and when you're finally communicating with that person, you can still be the awareness, and communicate as awareness, rather than communicate as if the thought, this person is weird, where the reality, you realize it's just a thought that came into the head, and you don't impose the thought on the person, and then relate to that person as if it were true, and you say, and then suddenly, you're talking to this weird person, what are you going to, everything, it'll distort everything, or you want something, but the thought says, this person could be helpful to me, or whatever the ego says, that's a thought, be there as the spacious presence. Now the question is, yes, of course, there can be presence while thoughts happen, or emotions happen, including sadness or anger, but the questioner asks, it seems like you're describing a state in which there's no mental or emotional content, there's also the possibility of presence becoming so intensified at times, that all thoughts and emotions become obliterated. This is very different from suppressing emotions or thoughts, it's simply that the presence that arises becomes so intense, that just thoughts or emotions don't arise, and usually, it could happen in a limit situation, as existentialist philosophers call it, life or death situation, it could happen that presence sometimes can become so intense, or it can become, for no reason at all, it can happen, and you're simply sitting in your room, and suddenly, there's no thought whatsoever, there's no emotion, there's just an intense aliveness, it's not you haven't deadened yourself, because that is, sometimes people believe if you have no emotion, you're dead, you haven't deadened yourself, there's an intense aliveness, a different kind of aliveness than the emotion, a vibrantly alive field of intense consciousness, so that can arise sometimes, and it's beautiful, I sometimes spend periods of time without thought and without emotion, and it's beautiful, nature, walking around nature, or with nothing particular to think about, why think, or sitting in a cafe, drinking a cup of coffee, why think, be, just be the alert presence, so you have the presence can be there without thought and emotion at times that will happen, or presence can be there as a background to whatever emotions or thoughts are there, so, and presence can be lost completely, in which case, all you have is thoughts and emotions, and you will believe that you are the thought and the emotion, that's the unconscious state, so for us, it's important to be there as the emotions happen, and I suggest you work particularly with people, talking to people, exchange of opinions and viewpoints, observing aggression, observing defensiveness, observing negativity flowing into, just because somebody has not the same opinion that you have, and then don't condemn yourself and say, oh, I shouldn't have, I shouldn't be feeling this, no, just again, observe that, observe that, suddenly you've become angry with this person, and instead of saying, oh dear, that's, I failed miserably in my spiritual practice, no, just say, okay, I'm just noticing that, you're no longer in it, you're already out of it when you notice it, so be compassionate with yourself, and just, but the important thing is you're aware, so we all know the famous joke about the person, when you tell the person, why are you so angry, the person says, I am not angry, and that's, of course, a typical example of somebody who doesn't know, has absolutely no awareness, in the middle of anger, denies that there's anger,

[Speaker 2] (4:05:52 - 4:07:01)
and just, is there a particular region of the body that is rooted in and senses our eternal, unchanging nature, yes, I think so, and where that is, it's between the eyes, not on the outside, but on the inside, let's try this experiment, look around the room, and point to an object, so I'm choosing these flowers, you can choose anything, so I'm aware of my finger pointing to the object of the flowers.

[Speaker 1] (4:07:18 - 4:48:46)
There are thousands, or hundreds of thousands that you go on, every day, they look on their screen, waiting for the next thing to be offended by, and the ego loves

it. The transcendence of thinking means the transcendence of the egoic mind, it means that you're able to spend part of your time relatively free of compulsive thinking, certainly free of self-serving thinking and destructive thinking that continuously creates unhappiness for yourself and the people around you. How many people live the compulsive narrative in your mind that for many people is very negative, constantly critical, constantly complaining, never at ease with what is, there's always something wrong, fault finding because the ego grows through constant opposition, constant antagonism, never at ease, always looking for the next thing to complain about, and it strengthens the ego itself.

The more you complain, oh, offended is a new version these days, it's very popular on the internet. I'm very, very offended, outrageous, how dare you? There are thousands, or hundreds of thousands that you go on, every day, they look on their screen, waiting for the next thing to be offended by.

And the ego loves it. And for many of them, it's the only way they can inflate their ego by sitting on the screen and sending out tweets. The transcendent of thinking is not any kind of regressive movement, we are not regressing to the state of somebody who is, whose mind is relatively undeveloped and who does not have a problem with egoic thinking because there's very little going on in their minds, what used to be called, before it became politically incorrect, idiot, or fool, the fool was, they were always, you could see, happy fools, there's not enough thinking to make them unhappy, so they are below egoic thinking. In the medieval times, every village had at least one village idiot or fool, and none was accepted, essential part of the community.

And even the royal courts had a fool. Very important figure, although that figure probably was just pretending to be a fool, and that was one of the most, sometimes very influential position in the royal court, but also one of the most dangerous jobs you could have because you could lose your head at any moment. But only the fool was able to tell the king or queen what was wrong by making it into a funny story.

But the fool is more deeply connected, as we know from mythology, the fool is more deeply connected with the source still, hasn't gone as far out as a normally developed human, he's more simple. He, the fool, for example, relatively speaking, is a simpleton, it's like the hobbit in Lord of the Rings. The hobbit is a simple guy, doesn't think in complex terms, loves the simple things of life, loves eating and enjoyment.

But why the fool has to go on this important mission that nobody else can carry out? That's a mythological motive, that's often the case, because the fool has a connectedness still with source that the more developed humans don't have. Similar motive in Forrest Gump, the movie, the fool does great things, this guy, Forrest Gump, but he's, because he's, and life always supports him.

If you watch that movie again, he always, he saves people in the war, he does heroic things, but he doesn't claim credit because he doesn't have much of an ego yet. And all his life gives him the next thing and the next thing supports him. But we don't want to go there.

When I say cessation of thinking, I'm not talking about regressing to the stage, this is the pre-thinking stage of humanity. I'm thinking about rising above, pointing to the possibility of rising above thinking. So you stop thinking, which is normally associated with the diminishment of consciousness, and transcendence of thinking is an intensification of consciousness, turning up the light.

This is why the term attention and alertness, those terms are extremely important. They're also used in Zen very frequently. The Zen teachings could be described, if you wanted to summarize Zen, it would just, you can just say simple things like pay attention.

There was one Zen teacher who would, whenever they asked him a question to explain Zen, he was, became quite famous. He would always raise his finger, please explain Zen to us. What is Zen?

I haven't quite understood yet. He was calling people to attention. Now, this attention, there's a state of attention that sometimes people experience when they're engaged in dangerous activity, you can climb a mountain.

Do you think you're doing much thinking when you're hanging on this wall? No, you can't. You have to be absolutely present.

In that moment, you have transcended thinking and the situation has forced you, is forcing you into complete presence, this highest degree of alertness. Without it, you slip and you're gone. And so this high degree of alertness however, has no tension in it.

In the case of somebody practicing dangerous sport, yes, there is physical tension, but the state itself has no tension in it and you do not need to engage in a dangerous activity in order to enter that state. We are entering it here because even as I talk about it, I hope, well, I don't really hope anything, but I trust that as I speak about it, simultaneously to listening to it, you can verify in yourself this state of attention, which is a state of very high alertness, but there's no tension in it. It's not the alertness that sometimes goes with fear and you go, but it's not, ah, ah, that's really a contraction of the entire body.

It's not really alertness. So that's not it. It's a relaxed alertness.

There's both yin and yang in it coming together and it's that. I also mentioned the other day, when you first look at something for the first few seconds, a new vista, a new landscape, you enter a room or you step out of a room into the open or whatever it is, or suddenly something new comes into your field, into your perceptual field. In the first two or three seconds, you don't know what it is.

You have to first take it in. There's a moment of alert presence in this, but usually you're only aware of the sense perception. You're not aware of the background of the alert presence itself, but you can be aware of the alert presence itself as you take it in, and that's the key.

So you're not just alertly present. You're aware of the field of alert presence in yourself, so to speak, as yourself, and the awareness of it and it are the same thing. Cessation of thinking.

Now, you can try it. Let's, even now, I would suggest that as I'm speaking, you may find, you may not know this, yet in the moments when I'm not speaking, like now, and now, and now, if you're alert, you're not thinking. You're just present.

And now, it's just an alert field of presence. So some of you may not be able yet to be totally free of thinking, but I believe that most people are able to, they have short gaps of no thought, pure awareness, but no thought. Just to show.

So, and then you look around. In that moment, your whole, your personal sense of self has receded. In the moment of pure presence, which is just this, you have no memories, and you have no expectations for future, because you have no thought, but you're not, you haven't fallen asleep.

You're very awake. In that moment, you're not a person anymore. What are you?

Just a field of consciousness, conscious presence. Something has emerged from within you, and has taken place of the person. The person is still there, it's just gone, receded.

If the only thing you achieve in life is this, that you are able to be free of compulsive and addictive thinking, if you're able to almost, one could say, to choose not to think when there's nothing in particular to think about, when you can just be present. In other words, if you can step out of thinking into aware presence, that alert space, then that is the greatest thing you could achieve in this lifetime, that any human could achieve in this lifetime. And yet, there's nobody left to say, I have achieved it.

That's a problem for the ego. The ego would love to say, oh, I have achieved the state of presence. So it's not an achievement.

I'm just saying it's an achievement, but it's not really. Because you didn't do it. You got out of the way, and then it happened.

And if I reincarnate again, it will be a kind of service to humanity or an offering. But, I mean, who would want to go? Would you want to go through your childhood again or some other kind of childhood?

My God. Well, I haven't gone through physical death yet. As the Zen master who was asked about life after death said, I don't know.

And they said, why don't you know? You're the master. And he said, yeah, but I'm not a dead master.

But I've gone very deeply to what one could call death to identification with form. So in a way, I have gone into that realm from where I can say and know that ultimately what we see as death is the dissolution of form, that the eternal in us, which I know that firsthand, cannot be touched by that. So what exactly happens, I would say, depends on whatever state of consciousness you were in.

That must be a predominant state of consciousness in this lifetime. If in this lifetime, you were continuously identified with form, your body, or the psychological form of me, that means consciousness, this expression of consciousness was still in a somewhat dreamlike state, which is identification with form. And you can easily extrapolate from that if the tendency of consciousness to identify with form was still there, which in other ways, the awakening had not happened, this tendency will continue.

There will be further identification with form and the process will continue as the consciousness that is not yet fully awake will continue to identify with form again and then gradually come to a place where awakening happens. Or if there has already been a disidentification from form in this lifetime, then you can extrapolate from there that the compulsive urge to identify with form and to seek another form or another cycle of form identification, this compulsion to seek further experiences through identifying with form, then would either be much weaker or be completely absent, in which case the consciousness that you are is no longer bound to this realm and will not seek to re-experience the realm of form. But in either case, you really, I know, I can tell you that all is well.

It does not really matter whether this person now needs further experiences of identification, in which case this will happen, or whether he's already free of this urge, in which case he will move on and live in a realm that we can't even conceive of from where we are here. I get a sense deep within in the forms of what that is, but we don't need to talk about it here. All we know is nothing, this is the beginning of A Course in Miracles, which is the entire Course in Miracles summarized in two lines.

Nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

That which is real in him is beyond form. Anybody can know that when you see a dead body, you realize that this is no longer whom you knew, this is not the being that you knew, this is only a shell. So nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal ultimately exists. This is why sages from all traditions speak of this realm of form as ultimately illusory. It ultimately, it depends what level you look at.

The important thing is all is well beyond the appearance on the level of form, which is the only level where death exists. It is a transition from one form into another form or from one form into formlessness. That is what death is.

No more than that, nothing real dies. Nothing real dies, which is to say, ultimately, there is no such thing as death. There only seems to be.

It's a transmutation of form. Either form dissolves or seeks some other form, some other identification with form. That, as you know, Buddhists and some others are striving towards the end of reincarnation.

They are striving towards merging with the absolute Buddha nature. And you can find in yourself, perhaps, people sometimes ask, would you like to reincarnate again? Or have you had enough?

And if you looked into yourself, you may find also that depends how fearful you are of death because there's an urge, there's an unconscious urge in humans, and that makes part of the personality and the ego. The urge for sensory experience, the urge for asserting your form identity and to experience more of the sensory realm. So for some people, it would be dreadful not to be able, not to reincarnate again because there's a longing for more, more of that physical sensory experience and the experience of all kinds of things associated with the personal selfhood.

And so there's still the unawakened entity or semi-awakened entity that still is drawn towards reincarnation. So, which means to take form again. And when the urge is not there anymore, you can find in yourself, do I want to reincarnate here again?

Well, I certainly have no urge for further sensory experience. If I reincarnate again, it will be a kind of service to humanity or an offering. But I mean, who would want to go, would you want to go through your childhood again or some other kind of childhood?

My God. And then I hear some people say, I definitely have had enough of this and I do not want to reincarnate again. And then you say, oh, maybe that human being is very advanced, but then it might be the next day that human being is talking to the bank manager on the phone and gets very upset about something.

Now, I thought he or she had said they don't want to reincarnate again, but they are reincarnating again into complete identification with an arising mental emotional reaction. Every time you identify with a thought and emotion completely, you reincarnate, you take form into that. So ultimately the end of the cycle of reincarnation in Buddhism has to take place in your lifetime rather than having an idea that at some point you will reach the end of the cycle of samsara and you will not.

No, the question is, are you still continuously reincarnating into form, which means you're losing completely awareness of yourself as awareness. The essence identity is not lost, but totally covered up. So you don't really know whether or not you are going to reincarnate.

You have to observe yourself in daily life to know whether or not you are ready to go beyond the continuous cycle of reincarnation. The question is how often in the course of one day do you reincarnate? The first thing to discover experientially is, as I've said before, it sounds a little strange, is that you are essentially invisible.

You, not only what I can see of you is the body and sometimes I may be able to see certain things in your mental emotional field. I can hear words that you speak or your facial expressions. I'm talking to everybody, not just to Tina, but I can see facial expressions that kind of give me a hint of what you're feeling or thinking, but anybody who was looking for you in the realm of physicality would not find you.

And if that's too much, let's just go for a moment to, let's talk about this perhaps makes sense to anybody who has a dog or a cat at home. When the dog or cat dies, which can be a very sad thing for people and we come to humans later, it might be a little bit easier to start with the dog or a cat. You may realize in that moment, when suddenly the dog is dead or the cat is dead, but everything is still there, the fur, the body, there may even be some warmth left in the body and there it is, but that which you essentially loved and related to in the dog or the cat isn't there anymore.

So you can still, the touch is still the same, but something essentially is gone and that was always invisible. What you love in the dog is ultimately, or the dog, you might like, love the way the dog looks and what it does, but when you relate to a dog, you essentially love, or nobody might have actually expressed it like that. You love the consciousness of the dog.

That's what you love in the dog. And when you look into the eyes of the dog, what's looking back at you is there's a consciousness of the dog looking back at you. And when that's gone, the dog is, and same with the human, what you love in the human is the consciousness of the other human.

Now, you yourself, all that is invisible because consciousness is the greatest mystery in the universe that science still has no idea what to do with it. Cannot explain consciousness. In most cases, avoids talking about consciousness.

The greatest mystery is the fact that the universe is conscious and that you are conscious. A surgeon looking for you by cutting open your skull and analyzing your brain will not find even a trace of you, will not even find any of your countless hundreds of thousands or million memories that you have somewhere. What, in what form does a memory survive in you?

Is a memory, is the memory of your first teacher at school? I just mentioned the word and suddenly an image of the first teacher you had at school comes to you. The memory of your grandmother who passed away, the memory of the bed that you slept in when you were eight or 10 years old.

I just need to mention it. It was somewhere, but where did that live in you? Was that in a molecule or an atom?

One atom was your bed? Or what is it? Nobody knows and nobody can find even the memories that you make up the person that you are.

The great thing, the vital thing about the book is you receive it as a kind of inspiration. Then your mind has to give it form. So it's again, it's a form and formlessness giving birth.

How do I know if a continuous thought is intuition or ego? I've been thinking about writing a book for a long time. When I sit down to write, there's great resistance in me, but still I cannot seem to drop the idea of writing it.

Now you need to look within to find out whether you have an idea that writing a book would be a good thing to do, or whether there's something in you, perhaps you've not clearly formulated, whether there's something in you that wants to be written or wants to be given birth to. So if it's just an idea in your head that it would be great to be a writer, wouldn't it? Okay, I think I'm going to write a book because it would be so great to be a writer and to have written a book must feel wonderful.

Of course, that's an egoic thought. I asked a 17 year old girl once, what do you want to be? What do you want to do in your life?

She said, oh, what I really want to, I want to become a brain surgeon. Also I said, are you interested in brains or in the human mind or in the body or biology or medicine? No, I just want to, I think brain surgery is the greatest thing.

It must be the most wonderful thing, the most complicated thing. She wasn't interested in any of the things that are the essence of being a brain surgeon, but she had an idea that it would be great to be a brain surgeon. So there was just an idea, there was nothing behind it.

You have to see whether, do you feel that there is something valuable in you which may not yet be formulated very much on the level of form, but whether you can sense something that wants to be born through you that would then become a book. Then it comes from deeper level than the ego. Or whether you just have an idea that it would be great to produce a book.

That's of course an egoic thought and it's not going to be very good. Now, let's say there is something that wants to express itself through you. I don't even know whether this book that you feel you want to write, whether is it fiction, is it nonfiction?

Do you have a story that, do you feel that these characters already exist in embryonic form somewhere in you? Or is there a story, something that already you can feel in embryonic form existing in you? Or do you have something to say to this world?

Maybe it is nonfiction, who knows what it is? Something spiritual, perhaps it's a spiritual book, but is it? And so if let's say there is something that you feel wants to come out through you, and when you sit down, yes, you may, even then you may still find resistance.

Because it's a totally, there's a momentum to your normal life and to bring out into form that which is only still largely exists in the realm of non-expression, halfway between form and formlessness, half, to give birth requires an intensity of focus and to, so you have to first of all, give yourself the space where this intensity of focus can be there, not sit down at a desk or whatever and say, okay, I can't think of any, it's not coming, it's not coming out. I better have a cup of tea first. And then just go back.

Oh, I need to, I need to polish that window. Oh, it's not happening today, I can't do it. It won't happen, you are not creating the space.

You need to, and this is a recommendation, if you do feel you have something within you that wants to be born through you, you need to provide the space for it to happen every day if possible on a regular basis so you have a space of an hour, two hours, three hours that is set aside for this to come out, to come through you and then you sit there and you, let's say no writing happens, at least you give the space of one hour where it may, you honor that space and if you've only write three words, at least that's a start, maybe one sentence within that one hour that comes or two sentences or maybe nothing at all but it's better to write something, see what comes, whether you can give form to that which wants to come through you and then gradually a certain momentum builds up as you write a little bit more. And there needs to be a total presence and total focus on just that and an openness. The great thing, the vital thing about the book is you receive it as a kind of inspiration.

Then your mind has to give it form. So it's again, it's a form and formlessness giving birth and once the momentum is there and the process starts, you may find as I did when I wrote the books that it consumes your whole life and you're not, it's hard to do anything else so it can take up your entire focus of your energy for a while and there's an intensity there of while the creative process happens, there's an intensity of energy that flows into it. When I wrote A New Earth, I noticed I couldn't pay attention to anything else so my place became more and more messy because there was just continuous focus and even now I haven't dealt with the mess that accumulated then, it's still there.

It's creative disorder. Anybody who wants to create also don't fall into the error. It's an excuse of the mind that says, I'm not, I don't have enough space in my life to be, to do this, to write this book, to be creative.

There's too much going on in my life. If it really wants to come through you and you give it, you can, there's always a time you can choose to give it space even if you have to get up two hours earlier and if the momentum does build up, you have to see whether it can be reconciled with other things you still have to do. Many writers find it can be reconciled.

I was lucky I didn't have any children to look after. I didn't have a job as such and so that was very helpful but I know of great writers who have recently had a dialogue here with Stephen Taylor who is quite a prolific writer of spiritual books and he teaches at the university. They have three young children to look after and I believe he told me that he writes mainly early in the morning and late at night when the children are not running around screaming and you'll find if you look at the history of great books, under what circumstances they were written, whether it's fiction or nonfiction, you often find that they were written not in the ideal conditions that one would think for writing a, would be for writing a book but in people who lived under great limitations either financial or living situation or health situation, some great writers were permanently ill, almost permanently ill and they wrote in that state from D.H. Lawrence, some of the post-Nietzsche, very good writers, continuously ill and yet they wrote or they produced their creative work under extreme limitation. It's almost as if the limitation created the pressure for the creation to happen.

[Speaker 5] (4:49:10 - 4:49:33)
Why is this process taking so long for me? I've been listening for years and I feel what you say but sometimes I just lapse into my old self. The answer I know is that I lose the present moment but can you elaborate?

Why is this process taking so long for me?

[Speaker 1] (4:49:38 - 5:27:21)

If you consider that humanity has been in this particular state of consciousness for thousands of years, it's not very long. If you can actually go through the awakening process in one lifetime, it's quite amazing. It's an acceleration of the awakening process going through it in one lifetime.

You are shedding or so to speak, thousands of years of collective conditioning, thousands of years. It's an amazing thing that a human being can, and in the past, it's always been very, very few isolated individuals. Not all of them we know of, we know only of some of them who have kind of created a teaching or spoken about, written about it.

But it's now happening on a somewhat larger scale, still, of course, a minority of humans who are engaged in the awakening process. And that's miraculous. There's a gravitational pull still there of the egoic consciousness, both in its personal and collective aspect.

And this gravitational pull is quite heavy. It will attempt to pull you back. It'll create all kinds of, it'll use situations and everything to pull you.

There's no need to regard it as an enemy, but just to realize that the habitual pull of the egoic consciousness of identification with thought is very, very strong. And of the ego, the ego, personal ego and collective ego. The ego is always identification with form.

Consciousness, which is who or what you essentially are, identifies with form, and then it becomes ego. And ego can take on many different forms. It can take on more subtle and refined forms than in the most basic form.

An ego wants power over others. It wants to be admired. It wants possessions.

It wants to be more special than somebody else. And if you cannot be more special in your power and your victorious pursuits, and then at least perhaps you can be more special in your victimhood. That's another big ego too.

If you can be the victim of others, and then it's, again, it's a mind-created identity, very powerful. The collective ego is even more creative, more insane than the personal ego. The collective ego, once you identify with the collective, has perpetrated unspeakable acts of violence and dreadful things in this world, through warfare and internal mass murder and holocausts and dreadful things in many countries.

So what you are, this awakening process is actually quite miraculous. And don't, it's futile to ask yourself how much longer before I'm completely awake? Oh, that's not a helpful question at all.

Or even the question, am I going to be completely awake in this lifetime? That's not a helpful question either. The only helpful question is, am I awake at this moment?

Am I identified with thinking? Or am I able to think without being identified with the movement of thought? Or am I even able to not think when I don't want to think?

That's an amazing ability. Am I able to stop, not stop, but allow thinking to subside, be just so present that the next thought doesn't come? And you may find that that can get interrupted by the thought that says, oh, look, I'm so present that the next thought is not coming.

But then you can go back to being present again. So don't ask yourself useless questions that actually represent an obstacle on your journey of awakening. Ask yourself the only helpful question this moment, what is my state of consciousness at this moment?

And if it's unpleasant, if you are having anxious thoughts and you can't let go of anxious thoughts, in other words, you are in the grip of anxious thoughts, then if there's a little bit of awareness, then you can know that you're in the grip of anxious thought. Not everybody who is in the grip of anxious thought knows that they are in the grip of anxious thought. They are so much identified with the anxious thought that all they are filled with anxiety.

There's not even a little bit of space that says, oh, look, I'm so identified with anxious thoughts. They are completely possessed by the anxious thought. In other words, the reincarnation, the incarnation of consciousness into the thought form is 100% completely, no awareness left.

In other words, consciousness is completely consumed by the every thought form. Thought gobbles up your consciousness and becomes thought, continuous incarnation and reincarnation. But if there is a little bit of awareness, then you can suddenly realize, oh, this is what's happening.

And that awareness gives you a space of freedom because from that awareness you can say, is this what I want? It's futile, isn't it? That arises, that realization arises out of awareness.

And then you can choose to direct your attention somewhere else instead of following up every thought where it wants to take you. It's to take your attention into your body or to your breathing and then into the body. And then you can notice the pull of thoughts, the gravity, it wants you to reincarnate again into another, into another.

You can feel it's pulling you and you, but you don't exert willpower. You cannot exert willpower against thought. You can only be present so that thought cannot fill your space, but you're present enough.

You're holding thought at bay. Interesting, you're so present that it outshines thought like a sun of awareness. The sun of awareness outshining thought.

And that's amazing thing. You discover that possibility. And once you that, and then very progress is speeded up very closely, very quickly.

And you no longer ask yourself, when is it going to happen? Because it's happening now. And you don't ask yourself, why is it taking so long?

Because it's not taking long, it's happening now. And then the question is, yes, but will I be able to sustain it? I know it's now, but will I?

Okay, it's gone already because you asked that question. You don't need to ask, will I be able to sustain? Now, direct your attention, take responsibility for your state of consciousness in the present moment.

That's enough. And then you look at reality through the lens of the little story. It's not just one story, of course, it comes another one, into another.

And some stories are not little, they may be big stories about yourself. Be aligned with the present moment rather than carry in your head this huge amount of mental content about your past and your future. Because the mind is primarily concerned with past and future.

So while you're walking here, you're already thinking about in a week's time, I'll be home again. And then I'll have to do that and have those phone calls to make, and then I'll have to do that. And then those problems will be, I shouldn't have come here because I've got so much on my plate at home.

Why did I come here? I should have dealt with my things there. I should have waited, gone to next year's retreat.

As I said, that's the self-talk in the head. You may encounter it here too. As you walk from here to there, you will encounter the self-talk in the head.

So how do you get out of the self-talk in the head? One, you need to know that that's self-talk in the head. If you don't know it's self-talk in the head, you become the self-talk in your head.

You become the voice in your head. You don't know it, you are it. So you have to, the vital step, and I cannot tell you how to do that.

That minimum of awareness needs to be there where you know that there's self-talk happening in my head and it's telling you some kind of story. It could be the briefest of stories, like I shouldn't have come here, or I don't fit in here, all these people are too spiritual for me, or I'm so spiritual, these people are not spiritual at all. It's all little stories in the head.

Even every fragment of self-talk is a little story in the head that goes around. And then you look at reality through the lens of the little story. It's not just one story, of course, it comes another one, and another, and some stories are not little, they may be big stories about yourself and your life and what's gone wrong with it, or what's gone right with it.

So even that's a story. More pleasant than if it's gone wrong. So you need to know when the self-talk happens in the head, the knowing is not part of the self-talk.

The knowing is just an awareness that there is self-talk. The moment there is an awareness that there is self-talk, the possibility of freedom from the self-talk opens up. If that awareness is not there, there's nothing you can do.

You have to wait until life knocks you over the head so that finally some awareness comes in and you go, huh. So you might have to sleep on a banana skin or something because you have self-talk, and suddenly you go, huh. Oh, life told you to wake up.

Awakening, which is a term that's been used for thousands of years in the spiritual context, not in the conventional context. To awaken means to come out of sleep in conventional language, terminology. But in spiritual terminology, to awaken means to awaken, one could say, basically to awaken out of the self-talk in the head because the self-talk in the head is a form of hypnosis, self-hypnosis.

You are hypnotized. You have been hypnotized by society, your surroundings, the surrounding culture, even the language that you were taught to use that becomes a large part of the self-talk, although some of the self-talk is also accompanied by images, but a lot of it is language. And all that, you've been conditioned, and this is, you are possessed by that, which is an energy formation, and humans are possessed by that and mistake that conditioned entity, which consists of thoughts.

They're so trapped in it, they're so identified with it, they believe in every thought that comes into your head. It's absurd. It's mad, but normal.

Well, another word, rather than absurd, I could say it's mad, but it's normal. It creates incredible amount of suffering, unnecessary suffering that humans create for themselves and for others. You can't create suffering for yourself without making others suffer who are close to you and whoever comes into contact with you.

An enormous amount of suffering is created by not realizing that large percentage of your problems consist of self-talk in the head. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. That's amazing, and once you see that, you say, okay, and then you can have a little bit of awareness and say, who am I?

Am I that story, or am I the one who sees that, who recognizes that there's self-talk? And in order to recognize that there's self-talk going on in you, that's not a thought, it's just an aware presence that, hmm. And then the compulsive nature of self-talk lessens somewhat because some awareness has come in, the light of awareness has come in, and then you realize you are that light of awareness, you are the awareness.

And there's a shift, the head may not immediately stop, it'll want to carry on, the self-talk wants to carry on, there's a momentum to it. You can observe that momentum, if you can't do it in yourself, you can observe it in others. Once they have a story and they're telling you their story, they can't stop, they want to go on, they don't.

And they don't want an end, if they're talking about their problems, they don't want an end to their problems, they want a continuation of the story, which is the problem. They don't know that, that's why we call it unconscious. They don't know that their primary thing is they want the continuation of the story, because that's a continuation of the fictitious person that cannot live without its story, its storyline.

And so those people, do they want an end to their problems? Of course, they will probably tell you, yeah, I'd love. No, they don't, they don't want an end to their problems, because that would be an end to their story, which is their identity.

They don't want an end to their sense of identity. I need my story. All the things that I've been telling myself in my mind about myself and other people and my parents and my relatives and my coworkers and my ex-wife and my ex-husband and what people did to me or what I did and shouldn't have done, failed to do.

Who am I without, I can't let go of that, I need to think about this more. So it becomes a habitual place, the habitual place of the mental noise where you feel that's me. And so every therapist knows that you always reach a point with your clients, patients, whatever, depending on the school of therapy, depends whatever you call your clients, your patients, whatever, there comes a point when you hit that resistance, they don't want to be free of their problems.

And the big challenge is there, is this person going to overcome that barrier? Because that barrier is not just becoming free of my problems, but also becoming free of a very limited and ultimately fictitious sense of identity, the me. So that is what I've described is the next step, one could say, in the evolution of human consciousness is stepping out of self-talk, which is the conditioned mind and realizing there is much more to who I am than this conditioned content of my mind.

And that is the beginning of awakening. It's not, it's not those words, not that you need to believe that there is much more to who I am than the self-talk in my head, because that is still self-talk in the head. I believe there's more to who I am.

And you better believe it too. No, that needs to be, and most of you are here because you already have had, or not only had a glimpse, many of you have already deeply been able to transcend the person. Because the person, the exclusive personal sense of self wouldn't want to be here.

It would feel threatened by being sitting here. It either would feel threatened or it would feel extremely restless and irritated. I need to get out of here.

Or suddenly your legs start twitching. It is quite normal, by the way, many humans have twitching in their legs all the time, or they go. So if you have somebody here who is going like this, and you know their person, the personal self is becoming uncomfortable with being here, doesn't know it, but goes twitching.

And that kind of twitching is very normal for humans, but if it happened to your dog, you would take your dog to the vet. To see how important it is to go beyond victim identity has nothing to do with denial of what happened. You fully see what happened.

You know that, and you know the emotions that it created. Daily, I keep having the same thought loop in my mind. Oh, we've just been talking about similar things.

I keep having the same thought loop in my mind. The theme is one of feeling betrayed, being mistreated, basically being a victim. With the thoughts and images, there's usually resentment and or anger.

This thought loop has been occurring over a year now. I'm having challenges with being the observer. The story seems to be so mesmerizing.

I'm feeling frustrated that I'm continuing to have these thoughts about the past. As I understand, holding onto the past is preventing a higher energy field to come through me. What recommendations do you have for working this issue?

My suggestions, any suggestions on forgiveness and letting go of the victim role so that I can express more of the deep I. The deep I, you see. I don't know if I actually use this term during our sessions here.

I sometimes use it. The deep I is the awareness deriving your sense of self from the awareness rather than from the surface I, which is the personality. So we have the surface I or the deep I.

So the thought loop here that you are experiencing is to do with feeling betrayed, being mistreated, and being a victim. Now, since I believe Susan is not here because it's a written question from New Mexico, but I assume these thoughts and emotions that are recurring again and again refer to actual events that took place. I assume that here.

So there is a reliving of the events in the mind and the feeling of being mistreated, betrayed, being a victim, and there's resentment and anger with it. Been occurring over a year now. So I assume something happened a little bit before that, perhaps, and people did something to you or somebody, one person.

Now, some people have that not only for a year as in this case, but some people have that kind of thinking, compulsive thinking going on for years and decades, sometimes going back to childhood, being badly treated in childhood or abused in childhood. So you have continuing to think about that. And the more you think about that, of course, the more you feel yourself being a victim of events or usually people, other people who did something to you.

And you dwell on it and you can't stop it because the mind has a momentum. These thoughts refuse to go away. And if there's not sufficient awareness because of the continuously recurring thoughts, they become part of your identity, your sense of self.

And so then you become a victim. To see the necessity and the possibility of going beyond a victim identity does not deny in any way that something painful happened to you in the past, that something was done to you, that some people did something to you. To see how important it is to go beyond victim identity has nothing to do with denial of what happened.

You fully see what happened. You know that and you know the emotions that it created. But the first thing is how does a human being, how is a human being capable of inflicting suffering, for example, on a child or on another human?

And it happens all the time. It happens on an individual level and it happens even more on a collective level. The ego, the human ego is dysfunctional enough in the individual, but it's infinitely more dysfunctional and dangerous and lethal when it operates as a collective ego in a group.

This is why people, warfare, internal conflict, killings, and the humans who participate in these dreadful things, dreadful, the perpetrators, when they operate as a collective ego, not a personal, they are capable of far worse atrocities and acts than they would be as an individual. So in other words, the collective ego is even more unconscious and violent and dangerous than the individual ego. It looks to, sometimes when you identify with a collective, my country, for example, my fighting for my country or the collective might be a political party or it might be a religious group.

And so you, people who belong to these entities, sometimes it seems that they become free of ego because they live completely in the service of these collective entities. I want to sacrifice myself for my country or my religion or whatever. It seems that they are completely free of the personal ego.

And same thing happens in sects, in cults. Often people who live in cults, they're totally selfless. They don't want anything.

They give everything of themselves. They want nothing for themselves. They have identified with the group.

But of course, their ego has actually not diminished. Their ego has become enormously amplified because they now have adopted a group ego and the group ego can only survive and subsist when it has a sufficient number of enemies out there. The group ego needs for its survival and its expansion because it wants to expand and survive, but it needs the other who is the very other.

In other words, the other is the enemy. So that is how humans are drawn into deep unconsciousness by identifying with the collective. It doesn't mean that you cannot, it's nothing to do with, you can belong to a religious group.

You can even love your country without being identified with and then needing others' countries to be the enemy. With awareness, you can appreciate your country and you appreciate other countries too. They are different.

So first you see the need to be a victim. Identity also, unfortunately, is a form of ego because any conceptual identity is a form of ego. And even though you seem to be amply justified in having a victim identity because of the things that other humans did to you, you yourself are finding yourself in a kind of prison that created by your mind.

So there's no denial of that bad things happen to you. Yes. Now, question is, how do you exit this mental prison?

The first step is perhaps to see that unconscious human beings, unconscious human beings in the grip of their own conditioning, their own ego, they have virtually no free will. When you are unconscious, you are controlled by the mind patterns that are lodged in your psyche. You cannot really speak of free will by somebody with zero awareness.

And yet the entire makeup is conditioning from the past. So the famous sentence, phrase used by Jesus in connection with forgiveness on the cross, he said, forgive them for they know not what they do. Now, these two interesting, these points put together, forgive them.

Why forgive them? They know not what they do. In other words, if he had spoken these days using our terminology, he probably would have said, they are completely unconscious because that's what it means.

They know not what they do. They are completely unconscious. So when you see nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness, then you see that it's almost like, it becomes almost like the evil that was perpetrated becomes almost like a natural phenomenon.

That is like you've been hit by lightning or something, or lived in very unpleasant climatic conditions that injured you near volcano. And my dad had problems with anger, huge outbursts of anger quite frequently. It was living like legs to a volcano that could erupt at any moment.

And he could not help it. It was impossible. There was no possibility of being different.

And so these humans are run by unconscious, conditioning usually goes back to their childhood and what happened there. I know why my father was angry. I realized much later that it all originated in his childhood, the reasons why he was so angry.

And also for a while, also I felt a resentment towards that. And only when I was able to awaken out of egoic consciousness, I saw that there's nothing that he could have done differently because there wasn't enough awareness. Now, when you see that, then you don't personalize or you don't create an identity for other humans out of their unconsciousness, because in essence, that's not who they are.

The recognition that there's first recognition, then step one, you recognize that no human can act beyond their conditioning in the absence of awareness. If there's awareness, they can transcend their conditioning. And then they begin to become conscious of their own conditioned, mental, emotional, dysfunctional, mental, emotional patterns.

Yes. So they couldn't, they can't help it. So that's already a useful step in forgiveness, but you may not yet be able to arrive at full forgiveness because of that.

Another, before I continue with that, does that mean then, a question may arise in your mind, does that mean then humans are not really responsible for what they do? If they are unconscious, how are they responsible? And does that mean then that we shouldn't punish them for what they do?

If they commit a crime, are they not guilty? That's an interesting question. The unconsciousness that operates in human, even if you are able to forgive a human, and we'll go more fully into that in a minute, even if you're able to forgive a human for their transgressions or whatever they did, this does not mean, and even though the human is not responsible for their unconsciousness, and yet it is built into the structure of human life, they still need to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness.

[Speaker 5] (5:27:49 - 5:27:56)
Okay. Actually, my question is already being answered.

[Speaker 1] (5:27:56 - 5:27:57)
That often happens.

[Speaker 5] (5:27:58 - 5:28:07)
And I think one day we're all going to come here, and once we're all in presence, we won't have any questions for you.

[Speaker 1] (5:28:08 - 5:28:09)
That's true. That would be wonderful.

[Speaker 5] (5:28:10 - 5:28:12)
You're going to be out of business. Yes.

[Speaker 18] (5:28:14 - 5:28:16)
Yes. Yes. Yes, that would be wonderful.

[Speaker 5] (5:28:17 - 5:28:25)
Actually, my question was, could you elaborate on ego versus healthy self-esteem?

[Speaker 1] (5:28:25 - 5:33:40)
Ah, yes. Eventually, what you would call healthy self-esteem, which is a wonderful thing, eventually that is not enough. And as a human being evolves, that healthy self-esteem is no longer satisfying as you grow older and is transcended.

And what takes its place is healthy, healthy, no hyphen self-esteem. The self-esteem, of course, means that you are reasonably satisfied with who you are as a person and the achievements of the person, what the person can do or what the person knows or what the person possesses. And you compare what the person can do, abilities, what the person knows, knowledge, or what the person has in terms of possessions.

You compare that with others and you come out favorably. So either you can do more than somebody else or others, feel better about yourself. I can do this, but they can't.

I can, but you can't. Or you have more knowledge. Did you know that this and such and such is such and such a case?

You didn't know that? Well, let me tell you. That feels good.

You know, these ignorant people, they don't know anything. Or you have more. How many bedrooms does your house have?

Four? Well, we have 11. Do you have an advanced degree?

No? Well, I have two PhDs. And that's fine.

It starts with a child already. It says, look what I can do. I can jump further than you.

And therefore, the child, it's fine. There's no point in telling a child, don't do that, because your ego is arising. No, the child has to go through that.

And it is better to have healthy self-esteem, as you describe it, as it's usually described, than extremely low self-esteem. I'm no good. Everybody's better than me.

I have nothing. Life has treated me unfairly. There's a self-image there also, as there is a self-image in healthy self-esteem.

One, of course, is much nicer than the other. It's more pleasant to live with healthy self-esteem than with a low self-esteem, or unhealthy self-esteem, one could call it. But they're both identification with some kind of form.

And you compare the form of who I am with the form of others, and you are better, at least in one area, you must be. And that's satisfying. But there's still, you're trapped in form, and you're depending on, for your sense of value or worthiness, you're depending on, ultimately, to put it bluntly, others who have less or know less or can do less than you.

And that's fine. Doesn't mean you shouldn't strive to do great things or to have things or to know things. But the question is, ultimately, is that a satisfying basis for your sense of who you are?

And in the long term, it is not. It is not satisfying. That is why people who are maybe very happy with what they possess, after a while, there's an emptiness that comes, not the spiritual emptiness, the sense of emptiness of what's it all about.

And even things you can do, a time may come when you can't do it anymore. Whatever it is that you do, that's so great. Playing an instrument, the great pianist, wonderful, why not be a great pianist?

But if you derive your sense of who you are from that, then one day you find arthritis in your fingers.

[Speaker 18] (5:33:40 - 5:33:41)
Ugh.

[Speaker 1] (5:33:42 - 5:38:15)
And who are you now? Or they adjust, the agility goes, it's not there anymore. Oh my God, suffering comes.

Or you invent the greatest new computer, some computer, I don't know the expressions, but program or whatever it is. And everybody says, this is the greatest ever. And what, three years later or two years, these things happen very quickly.

Somebody else comes with, makes yours obsolete. And then you have no new ideas. And there you sit, completely devastated because you got from somebody great, you've become nobody, but it was all illusion because you derived your sense of who you are from something in the world of form, which is fleeting, not reliable, not solid, dreamlike.

And so the true self-esteem comes from not identifying with form. Now, whether we even want to call it self-esteem, I don't know. The true sense of worthiness and of power, true power comes when you realize the formless in yourself, that dimension, and that all power comes from that.

But it's not, it goes far beyond the person that you are. And then you are rooted in the formless, so to speak, or you are it. And that there's enormous sense of worthiness in there, but it's not comparative.

It's not more than. You see the same worthiness in everyone, even if they don't know it for themselves yet. So there's power, but not more than.

There's just the power of life itself. And you know everybody is an expression of that, although they may not know it yet. Everybody.

So this is, you transcend conventional self-esteem. And it doesn't mean you lose your sense of worth. It shifts into something much deeper.

So every human really is, there may even be some children these days who don't need to go through the egoic state anymore that is possible. But traditionally, and humans had to go, and some, many probably still have to go through the stage where they identify with form, develop some self-esteem, do something that you feel good about, you can do it. And then comes the time going beyond.

Except perhaps, as I said, some advanced souls who may be coming into this world, already in this world as children who don't need, even need to identify with that anymore. A question that comes from there also is, if a person has low self-esteem, in other words, a mental image of not good enough, then does that person have to go through the stage of healthy self-esteem because he can, before they can transcend it altogether? I don't know.

I haven't tried it enough with enough people. It may well be that the unhealthy self-esteem, if it leads to a state of suffering, great suffering, you may be able to, with the help of a teacher, go from there to no self. Because the way from unhappiness or suffering to transcendence is easier than the way from superficial happiness to transcendence.

Superficial happiness keeps you in the dream world for quite a while. It's not that bad. My life, I can't complain.

It's not that bad.

[Speaker 18] (5:38:15 - 5:38:16)
It's going okay.

[Speaker 1] (5:38:18 - 5:38:29)
I'm quite happy, just got a promotion. Or I'm so happy I just got my annual bonus from my Wall Street bank.

[Speaker 18] (5:38:32 - 5:38:33)
Great, I'm doing great.

[Speaker 1] (5:38:46 - 5:56:30)
So from there, transcendence is not directly from Wall Street, probably not. But if you go from Wall Street to prison, much easier. And as prisons gradually, you realize ultimately the most important part of your life is to embody that dimension of consciousness more and more in your daily life, rather than whatever else is personal, personal goals that you have, personal, whatever you feel you need or want to do on a personal level.

It varies a lot from person to person. There's something more fundamental than the details of your life, which is whatever goals you may have, whatever purpose your life may have on the level of the person. There's a deeper purpose, and that is to embody this dimension of consciousness, which is like, I call it sometimes the next step in the evolution of human consciousness, is the arising of that dimension of consciousness.

The only thing that, this critical point in human history, it's the only thing that will save us is that. So it's very important. Everything else is of secondary importance in your life.

If you look at your personal life, there are many things in your personal life you think are very important. Of course they are. Relationships, your health, your professional work situation, your living situation where you live, your relationship situations, all these things, of course they are important, and you should do your best to do things as well as you can to pursue, to make your life as harmonious as possible.

But ultimately, that's only possible if you realize there's something else that is more important than any of those things, which are important, but there's something more fundamental, that's your state of consciousness, out of which you respond to the situations in your life and to people. So your primary function or purpose is to embody presence, and then it flows into whatever you may be doing in your personal life. Relationships, work situation, the way in which you handle conflicts, the way in which you respond to a difficult person or challenging situation.

Then that becomes your main purpose in any situation to realize what is really important, what is absolutely important to you, and that's your state of consciousness. The second thing is the actual situation itself that you may need to either deal with, or in some cases just accept, because there's nothing much you can do right now in certain cases. There's nothing, all you can do is accept this moment as it is, and that already takes you deeper, this deep acceptance of this moment as it is immediately takes you to a deeper level.

And becoming a teacher of presence means to allow presence to flow into your life, and then gradually, slowly, you detect subtle changes in the way in which you conduct your life, personal relationships, work relationships, responding to challenges, difficulties, those things gradually change, and you notice, for example, that in some cases, people who used to trigger you, just to give an example, people who used to trigger or upset you, suddenly you're able to not be triggered anymore, and in some cases, perhaps, accept their limitations, they can't do otherwise, except for especially family members, except that this is what they say is out of their conditioning, and you can love them anyway, but your ego doesn't react anymore because your ego has subsided, and you don't fuel conflict situations anymore. It doesn't mean you become a doormat, so to speak. In fact, you're able to, in some cases, speak out, you're speaking out of presence, not out of anger or fear, speaking out of, or taking action out of presence.

If you're in a very dysfunctional work situation, you've tried to be present, but the environment is so dysfunctional that there's not much you can do, see, then presence will help you to one day walk away, and you do things that arise out of wisdom. In some cases, it means walking away from a situation or relationship without accusing or complaining or playing scenarios in your mind for years afterwards, just to see this situation is no longer right for me, does not resonate with my state of consciousness, and then you remove yourself, or sometimes the situation itself removes you. If you're in a dysfunctional workplace and you stay present as much as possible in that dysfunctional environment, at some point, they will let you go.

That will be the happiest day of your life. You become a teacher of presence in a wider sense, through every interaction with another human being, your state of consciousness affects another person. So in that sense, teaching and teaching, becoming a teacher of presence, the moment you embody presence, if not fully, at least to some extent, it's there, you are teaching presence, not by telling anybody anything, but by demonstrating that state of consciousness, by demonstrating presence, by, for example, demonstrating non-reactivity when it's totally pointless in traffic, whenever somebody shouts at you, and suddenly, and you don't automatically shout back anymore, it just evaporates what the other person shouted, and there's nobody there to say anything, and the entire energy evaporates.

Whereas before, you would have shouted something back. Unconsciously, the ego trying to defend itself, it's a natural thing for the ego. You shout, somebody shouts at you, you shout back, or you're so fearful that you're totally contracted.

Presence is, you don't amplify anymore very unconscious situations. Unconscious means people are totally trapped in their egos. They produce a lot of conflict.

Unnecessary conflict, because the ego loves conflict. So you come into contact with many humans, they don't, nobody says, I love conflict. They all say, no, no, I don't want conflict.

But their actions say otherwise. Their words say otherwise. Politicians, they all say, we want peace.

So the first level of teaching is just your state of consciousness affects others around you. If not consciously, sometimes unconsciously, they can feel there's something in you that's different. And then you discover that the way in which you experience your life does not so much depend on what's happening to you, because people say, well, that's karma.

Some people say, well, why did these things happen to this person? You think your life is what life does to you. But ultimately, the way you experience your life is not so much determined by what happens to you, but by how you respond to what happens.

Einstein said, I want to know the mind of God. The rest is details. Somebody asked what that means here.

Yeah. And of course, the mind of God is consciousness. Consciousness is the light that emanates from this.

Consciousness is not God in the same way that the light of the sun is not the sun. And yet, on the other hand, the light of the sun is one with the sun. But you couldn't quite say this light, this is the sun.

In the same way, your consciousness, which is not yours, the essence of who you are, the light of the world, is an emanation from the source of all life. I use the analogy of the sun. And there's a good reason why in many ancient civilizations, the sun was regarded as God, because it's a continuous outpouring of life energy.

And so in the sense-perceived universe, the closest analogy one can find is you can point to the sun and say, that is like continuous emanation. All life derives from it. And the life, the consciousness in things is that.

So God realization is the realization of I am that I am, your I am identity. And that's God speaking, but it would also be you speaking. So it doesn't transform the ray of the sun into the sun, but it makes the ray of the sunlight aware of its origin and its home, and what it is still connected with and always remains connected with.

At some point, we need to transcend the naive beliefs in what God is as a controlling figure that created the world a long time ago, and then he walked away and lost interest, or maybe he's still interested, but somehow things are not going well. Or he's condemning people for being dysfunctional. And then, of course, there are many arguments you could raise against that kind of view of God.

And that's the traditional argument of people who don't believe in God, who say, if there were a God who controls everything and supposedly loves people, or maybe not doesn't love, but he's controlling things, then if there is a God, how would he allow all that suffering and evil to happen in this world? Therefore, they say, there is no God. Or they say, therefore, God is morally inferior to us because we can see the injustices and the terrible things that happen in this world, and we are touched by it, but God isn't.

Therefore, God is some inferior creature that created the world out of malevolent intent. That was actually a belief held by many of the Gnostics, ancient Christian and pre-Christian group of people who otherwise had also some interesting teachings, but they believed that the entire physical universe was the creation of a malevolent deity, an inferior deity. I can see why in some way, but it's not the case.

So there isn't a controlling figure there that is. So we need to go beyond that image, that anthropomorphic image of a paternal authority figure and realize that God is the life in all beings. God manifests as the life in all beings.

God is the consciousness in you, is the emanation of God. God lives through you. Everything that happens in humans, God is suffering in humans in a way, you could say.

That's what the Christian teaching means. So it is a gradual emergence of consciousness, and the suffering is more like a dream-like thing to God. It's like a bad dream as in the process of emergence of that God consciousness into this dimension.

So human beings are not autonomous entities. It's not you, your consciousness, his consciousness, her consciousness. Every human is a temporary expression of the one consciousness.

[Speaker 14] (5:56:57 - 5:58:18)
Hello, Eckhart. Hi. A year ago at this time, it was discovered that I had stage three colon cancer.

A four-inch tumor was removed from my colon, half my colon and 16 lymph nodes, and they discovered that cancer was throughout my body. I went through extreme chemotherapy treatments for over six months, and during that time, I became bedridden, and I was in extreme physical pain. It was the best time of my life, spiritually.

During that entire time, I was in a spiritual retreat within myself. It was profound, and I experienced during that time what you have been sharing during this conference, during this retreat, and I thank you. My question to you is, now that I'm healthy, I'm not in chemotherapy, I'm not bedridden, and I'm finding myself adding activities into my life and going back into the busy life that I had before, and I wanted to ask what advice you would give to me or someone else in how to maintain that beautiful inner spiritual retreat of oneness while entering back into the world?

Yeah. Well, thank you. That is an amazing example of the potential transformational value, awakening value that a serious illness can have if you allow it to work in that way.

It's just amazing, and in your case, there has been a kind of healing, perhaps, or probably, because of the shift in consciousness and the deepening. Even if there had been no healing, it would have been worth it, even if you were no longer here in this form, and yet it had taken you into complete surrender. And then an illness like that, actually, as it forces you into presence, burns up the ego in you, fuel for consciousness.

Now you have to be careful. If you do go back into your busy life, don't allow stress to arise, ever. It is possible to be busy without stress.

If you find it's not possible for you, then it's better not to be busy at all. So being busy without stress means just being totally focused on whatever you happen to be doing right now, never focused more on the outcome that you want to achieve through whatever activity you're doing right now than the activity itself. So there can be high energy in the doing.

There needs to be, if there's no stress, there's actually a heightened sense of aliveness as you are active. That heightened sense of aliveness could be called enjoyment of what you're doing. You enjoy not only the outer doing, you enjoy the energy behind the doing.

Even if you might've heard the Zen saying, hurry slowly. So it doesn't necessarily mean that you need to be slow. You can be fast.

The slow is the inner state. The slowness is the stillness and the peace that is still there even while externally, you may be very active. But as you're not focused on the outcome, you're focused on the doing, you enjoy not only the external activity, but more importantly, you enjoy the energy that is behind it, the energy movement.

And then you can be working very fast or doing whatever you're doing very fast. And yet in a state of enjoyment rather than stress. So extreme vigilance is required so that you don't fall back into any kind of stress, which always means you're not fully in the doing.

You're mentally somewhere else. If you find it impossible or if whatever activity you're engaged in, if you cannot perform your function, if you endeavor to be without stress and several, many times you see you can't do it, stress keeps coming back, then you should leave that activity and do something else. So it's because stress will pull you back into the old consciousness, anxiety, stress, thinking that what you're doing is terribly important.

And it's secondary. What's terribly important is your state of consciousness behind the doing. So it's fine to be active again, but not if you don't enjoy it.

So the enjoyment needs to be there. Then you are not going to lose the presence that has already burned up a large part of your ego or the entire ego. Ego simply meaning complete identification with form.

So this is a very inspiring, what you just told us is a very inspiring example of what is possible, how an illness can be the great awakener. And it helps, of course, if before somebody becomes ill, he or she has already had some contact with spirituality, but it doesn't, even that's not necessary. I have seen people that had not the slightest glimpse of spirituality and yet at some point in the illness, the awakening happened.

I've also seen people who shortly before their death through illness became utterly and completely present so that they actually felt joyful. There was no fear anymore. There might've been fear initially, but fear is when you think about what's going to happen to you or the body.

So anything like that, if you allow it to force you almost into utter and complete presence, then what looks as a terrible curse actually is transformed into a blessing. And one more thing for the questioner just now, also not just talk about your activity for a moment, wherever you are at any time, don't ask, don't wait for life to have to force you again into presence. Choose the presence that is already powerfully in you and continuously invite that intense presence that you had when you were facing almost one could say imminent death.

That intense presence that arose there, choose it even when you're not being challenged now so that even when you go from your home to your workplace or drive or go or walk, whenever there's nothing in particular to do or you're waiting, that intense presence can be there now. You don't have to be forced into it any longer. So that's a wonderful thing.

There may be some others of you that are also facing an illness right now. So allow that condition to force you into presence. Healing may happen, but that's not why you do it.

It's not because in itself, that is the purpose of your life is to embody the arising of that consciousness. So anything that happens as a result of that is a by-product of the arising of presence. The arising of presence is not so that you can be healed physically.

You may or you may not. In some cases you are healed physically, but even if you're healed physically, eventually you die anyway. The body goes at some point.

So it's not a means, presence isn't a means to an end. It is the ultimate end, but it has certain side effects which are beneficial. And if you work with people who are seriously ill, you can also teach that.

You can teach presence. You can teach, but not necessarily even by using that word presence. You can start, for example, by teaching somebody to feel the energy field in the body.

And so you can show them what is possible. Never give them more than they can take. And not even then, not everybody, even facing an imminent death, not even then, not everybody will be ready to hear you.

But that's okay. Everybody learns at their own pace. Some are a little slower than others.

But eventually, really every human being is a manifestation of the one consciousness that is awakening. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond yourself.

Your history and your life situation. Is it spiritually hindering to have pride in others and in oneself? Is being glad of one's accomplishments pride?

Is it spiritually hindering to have pride in others and yourself? Well, if you have pride in others, of course, it usually means you have some kind of ego link with them. They may be your children or somebody close to you, family members.

There's a difference between feeling a sense of goodness about something that you have done and the sense of pride. Pride usually is based on the misperception that I did it. I did that.

And not the deeper universal I of which I'm a temporary expression, but the limited sense of I as me, the ego. I did that. Look at me.

Now, when children do that, we have to allow them to do that when the little boy or the little girl says, look at me, what I can do. Or the little girl or boy says to another little girl and boy, you can't do what I can. Look, I can jump higher, much higher than you.

And of course, that's the beginning of ego. But it would be futile to tell a child, this is your ego, stop it. Stop it.

Ego is something that is really a, like, can be and should be like a childhood disease, like measles. And measles is something that children often contract It's something you have to go through. And ego, really, as humans evolve, perhaps will be like that.

It's something that manifests as a childish, childlike state of consciousness while they're growing up. And as a human being reaches maturity, they outgrow the ego. That is where we are going.

It's not yet the case with most humans, they don't outgrow the ego, it gets even bigger. So it's fine for the child to say, look what I can do, and for the parent to be proud and say, oh, isn't that wonderful that you can do that? But then, of course, if the 30-year-old still says, look at me, look what I've done, look at my car, look at my house, or look at what I know, or look how I look, do you like the way I look?

Whatever it is that one identifies with as oneself most strongly, and usually the ego chooses the thing that the most obvious thing in your life, you have the good looks but not much knowledge, then, of course, you focus on the good looks and everything else unimportant. Or you have bad looks, then perhaps you can acquire a lot of knowledge and hit others over the head with your knowledge. Or you can acquire possessions, and then you have more than powers, worldly power.

Look at me. Sometimes it's very kind of rudimentary ego, you can immediately wreck, it's almost a physical ego moving about across the room. Pride then usually is something to do with, I did that, and often it usually really implies other people didn't achieve what I achieved.

Pride, I would say, usually implies a comparison with myself with others, and I come out on top when there's pride and I compare myself with others, I must have, or can do, or know more than the other that brings up pride. So it's ego. But there's something else that is a sense of satisfaction with something that happened through you rather than something that you did.

And I get that, for example, when people come up to me and say, you or your book changed my life. That feels good. But I know that I didn't write this, not this entity wrote the book, the book, consciousness wrote the book.

Obviously the one consciousness wrote the book, and it changed people's lives. I don't get the sense of, oh, a bigger sense of identity suddenly. It's something when I travel to the most unlikely places, people say, I was going through the airline, going, boarding a plane, I showed my passport and the ticket to board, to go onto the plane, and the man who took the ticket and passport, he looked at me and said, you changed my life.

And that's, I don't feel pride about that because I didn't do it, not the little I. Only the little I can feel pride. But it felt good.

There's a feeling of rightness and goodness that there's an awakening, and it happened through that. But so really it's not, if you have a sense of a separate doer, that is the illusion. If you don't recognize your connectedness with the totality, and it's the totality, the consciousness acting through you, if you don't recognize that, then you're in the illusion of separateness, and when the illusion of separateness is there, pride can come in, and the opposite of pride, a detection that you haven't achieved what you wanted to achieve, or the world isn't recognizing your achievements, then the opposite, this detection comes in, and you feel unworthy because something in this world of form hasn't happened to give you a sense of worthiness.

So you have pride, and the opposite of pride when there's the illusion of separateness, the separate doer, me, that's the iceberg who doesn't know, who only knows itself as the tip that's above water. So yes, feeling good about it, about something that happened through you, that's not very different from pride, and that's fine, so it could be anything, when people may love to come to you, let's say you have a business, let's say people come to you for haircuts or whatever, and they feel, and they love being there, and you know they love, not only because you're a good hairdresser, they love being in your presence because you acknowledge their being, you don't feel pride anymore, you feel a goodness about that, the totality of what's happening, but you don't take yourself out of the totality and say, me, I did that. That also takes power away from you, the more you get trapped in the illusion of separateness, the less power, the less consciousness can flow through you into this world.

And again, similar, you can have pride in your child, because that's the developing stage of consciousness, but my mother had a, her generation perhaps even more than now had a very highly developed ego, and she was very, she had great pride in me, well, only after I published The Power of Now, but I could see how much it was her ego, and she talked about, she never read the whole book, but she talked, I loved her dearly, so that I completely accepted that it wasn't, she couldn't understand it, but what she did understand was that there was worldly success. And so she kept telling people, my son's a famous author, and of course, that's complete ego, and that's pride, but that's fine, I didn't tell her you shouldn't do that, I just, there was an acceptance of that's her evolutionary stage, and that's what she does, it's fine. And so, that's, you can have pride in your six-year-old who can do something, that's fine, but it's not really pride, it's your, you've completely recognized that there's a developing ego, and you have to allow that ego to develop.

But when your child becomes an adult child, it's a different matter. If you then have, you feel, oh, you keep talking about my son, my daughter, what he can do, what he has, what he has achieved, to their friends and others, then you haven't outgrown the ego, so it's just a secondary ego, many, many parents have that, so you, some people even have, I have observed in a few cases, you can have an ego, ego identification with a family member at one moment, and an ego, competing ego with the same family member another moment. For example, a mother, when talking to her friends, can talk with pride about her daughter's position, or achievements, or possessions, implying, of course, that my daughter has more than your daughter, or is better than your daughter, but when the mother meets the daughter, she resents her success, and so suddenly the ego identification is dropped, and the ego is fighting somebody.

So the ego can shift, it can shift from one moment it identifies with, when it's convenient, and the next moment it's competing. And they're all states of unconsciousness, of course. So ego is always identification with form, mental idea of who I am, or who somebody close to me is, so close that it becomes part of my ego, and that's how it is, you allow people their ego identifications, and you can see it, when you see it, it's not, it's just, there may be a little inner smile when they do it, although I must admit some egos can be pretty obnoxious.

But that's just how it is. These things do not like the light of consciousness on them, even the pain body, your pain body does not like to be recognized. Yes, we haven't spoken about the pain body yet, so, well, you all know what this term refers to, accumulated emotional pain that you carry forward from your childhood, usually, perhaps also from past lifetimes, if you believe in past lifetimes, if you don't like past lifetimes, forget about it, carried over in from childhood, and it is partly personal, because it's to do with your life, early life experience, which for everybody is somewhat painful, and for some much more than for others, and you also absorb pain body from the collective into which you're born, which could be the country, or the energy field, or a particular area in your country, whatever it may be, you also absorb that, so there's a personal aspect to the emotional pain that lives in you, and there's a collective aspect.

And the pain body, just a very, very brief summary, the pain body is not necessarily, in most cases, always active, it has a dormant stage and an active stage, when it's dormant, you may not even know it's there, and periodically, the tendency is for the pain body to need to feed on further experience of something emotionally painful, because that is what corresponds to the vibrational frequency of this energetic entity, because that's what it is, emotion is an energy form, it's consciousness, everything is consciousness, consciousness is taken on a particular form, an emotion is a form, a temporary form that consciousness is born into, assumes, and what childhood pain, emotional pain, usually leaves behind remnants of that particular emotion, it's not completely released, so by the time you are 18 or 20 years old, you have, you carry a pain body, and for some humans it's a very heavy thing, for others it's not too bad, the pain body periodically needs to feed on the experience of emotional pain, in other words, primarily in two ways, either it creates drama with people close to you, so that they get, you get negativity coming back at you, and then you can have the drama in relationships, favorite place for pain body to renew itself is intimate relationships, that's the best, you get the best food in intimate relationships, and it will create drama, and push the buttons, it has a borrowed intelligence, it has its own little intelligence, and it is cunning, it's a little, like a gremlin kind of, and it knows your partner's weak points, and it will touch upon them in order to provoke them into responding, reacting with drama, and usually it works, because then you press the correct buttons, you awaken the other person's pain body, it goes, oh, great, I'm here too, and so at that moment you don't want to let go, and if somebody, if your therapist at that moment rang you and said, do you want to be in this drama, or do you want to be free, you would get very angry, because you wouldn't be talking, the pain body would be talking through you, and you'd be saying, get away from me, this is, I don't, this is not about pain bodies, this is serious stuff, I don't want to hear what you have to say, leave me alone with that nonsense pain body, the pain body does not like to be recognized, because that means the light of consciousness is shining on it, now what do you do if you don't have an intimate relationship, it gets a bit more difficult, how can you, oh, the pain body says, okay, I have the perfect solution, when I need to feed, I will rise up into your mind, and I will control your thinking, and every thought will be a negative thought about yourself, about other people, about life in general, or about politics, a deeply negative thought, and then it becomes, the thought is not just one thought, it's addictive thinking, addicted to negative thinking, my life is so awful, or this person is so awful, or this is absolutely, whether it's predominantly anger, predominantly self-pity, or whining, or shouting, whatever it is, you are trapped in a cycle of negative thinking, continuously feeds, because thought is energy too, everything is, thought again is a form, every thought is a form that consciousness has taken, temporary form, it's a little entity, every thought, and that gives energy, the pain body gobbles it up, it loves your negative thinking, because the more negative thinking, the stronger it gets again, but after a while, it's had enough, it's like a big meal, then you can't eat anymore, and then suddenly it goes back to sleep, and you feel, oh, what was all that about? And sometimes, if it's in a relationship, you make up, so then suddenly everything is fine again, and it's like you both wake up out of some kind of weird nightmare, but the strange thing is, this weird nightmare happens every two weeks, or three, or every once a week, who knows, maybe once a month, or every three months, it varies a lot, but it comes again and again, and until you begin to recognize it for what it is, then the awareness comes in, once you recognize it, it can no longer, first of all, it can no longer use your mind to renew itself, because you recognize it directly, say, there it is, I can feel the emotional pain, and then you may be able not to be totally controlled by it when it tries to create new drama in the relationship again, or your partner, it arises in your partner, and you can clearly see that some dark energy comes into him or her, and suddenly, if you see it for the first time after getting married, you start living together, and then for the first time you see in your partner the pain body, for many people that is the first time when they question whether they've chosen the right person, whoa.

Now, another strange thing about the pain body, it is a vibrational entity, it can sometimes attract, because there are entities floating around in this universe that we cannot see, there's a vast amount of things that we cannot see, our senses are very limited, so there are entities whose vibrational frequency corresponds to the frequency of the pain body. A bit like what you can see, it's like in the reality that you can see with your senses, it could be compared to perhaps vermin, as we call it, rats, a rat infestation in your house, or cockroaches, so there are psychic correspondents, a bit like cockroaches or rats in the unseen realms that can sometimes be attracted by strong pain bodies, and when that happens, the pain body gets, so they cling to your pain when you almost merge with it, and then the pain body can be incredibly heavy and can become really dangerous, and usually it happens to people who are either very, very unconscious, or people who are addicted to drugs, which lowers very much your consciousness, or alcoholics, lowers very much your consciousness, or have some deficiency in their mind, so it happens to them that their pain body attracts other entities to them, and then they could perpetrate the most dreadful crimes, and often it's sometimes, again, they're not always in the grip of it, but it's there, it's latent, it's waiting, and sometimes people who know these people, they say, how could he have done this, I know him, he's a nice guy, how could he have killed and dismembered six people, what, he was such a nice person, I was at school with him, what they didn't see was his pain body, and when it, his wife might have seen it, I don't know if she's still alive, but the, so it is possible that some entities cling to your pain body, and as you bring more consciousness to it, which simply means to be aware of it, then whether or not your pain body can, whether there are other entities that have come, and they might be not as bad as those entities that lead somebody to commit dreadful crimes, but little things, little bugs, unseen bugs can come in, and it is quite possible in your case, now we finally come to your question, that as you become more conscious and direct consciousness, then the pain body, it would be hard for these entities to continue to cling to your pain body, especially if they're not overpowering, which in your case, this is not, I can see that it's not, you're not going to call a kill and dismember a few people, so these are not overpowering entities, they are little things that cling to your pain body, but if left unattended, it could get worse, but it's because you're growing in awareness, you could, I believe that's the explanation, but I don't know if that is the explanation, but it seems to me that it is, that these things do not like the light of consciousness on them, even the pain body, your pain body does not like to be recognized, because it knows when you identify it and you can feel it, you put your attention on it, it doesn't like your attention, because it cannot use your mind anymore, so if you put your attention on it, there may be things that suddenly, oh, I can't stand this anymore, this person is becoming too conscious, things leave, the pain body becomes lighter, so the pain body can even, I told a story, and I believe in New Earth, when I saw somebody for counseling session, and we had a wonderful release of this person's pain body, it was like a big chunk went, and I don't know where it went, but it went up into the air, there's similar stories in the gospels too, it's not called pain body in the gospels, of course, that sounds more ominous, he was carrying an evil spirit, and then when Jesus came and said, what is this, the evil spirit fled, and says, leave me alone, I can't stand your presence anymore, this is my paraphrase, so the pain body transmutation then happens, because pain body is energy, is trapped energy, that by focusing on it, the energy becomes freed, and I compare it to, you could say the flame of awareness, or the flame of consciousness, this energy becomes then part of your presence, it's transmuted into presence, it assumes a higher frequency, it's consciousness too, and it becomes presence, it's a bit like you could say, if you have a piece of ice, and the ice is very hard, and you could kill somebody with a piece of ice, but when it gets transmuted, it becomes soft and fluid, and when it gets transmuted even more, it becomes vapor, you can't even see it anymore, and that's a bit like consciousness manifesting in different forms, so-called inanimate matter would be a consciousness that is totally asleep, or almost totally asleep, and then gradually you have different degrees of awakening of consciousness in different life forms, plant life, animal life, human life, and then awakened human life, so all you need to continue to do is to be aware of it, especially when it arises, and be aware of it when it's there in relationship, does it use your mind still, be very alert so that the emotion does not rise up into your mind, and you start thinking negative thoughts, when this happens, immediately know what's happening, when you get, when you love your negativity, then you don't really love it, but your pain body loves it, so it's a wonderful, pain body is a great teaching, and it's a great thing for, it's often people with heavier pain bodies that have a more powerful incentive to awaken spiritually than people with a relatively mild pain body, however, one cannot generalize too much, but there's a tendency for people, it's like you're in a nightmare, if you're in a nightmare, your motivation to awaken is greater than if you're in a relatively pleasant dream, it's not that great, but it's okay, but if you're facing a monster, then you really want to awaken.

[Speaker 6] (6:38:35 - 6:39:08)
Well, first I have to say you are so very cute.

[Speaker 1] (6:39:11 - 6:39:12)
Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (6:39:18 - 6:39:24)
And then also, as I told Kim in the morning, I so wanted you to come to China.

[Speaker 1] (6:39:25 - 6:39:27)
Oh yes, I want to go too.

[Speaker 6] (6:39:28 - 6:39:29)
Okay, okay, let's go.

[Speaker 1] (6:39:29 - 6:39:47)
I have been to Hong Kong, a couple of days, done retreats in Hong Kong, but not for some years. Mainland China, do you think they would be okay with me? I mean the government, the government.

[Speaker 6] (6:39:47 - 6:39:53)
The government should be okay, you haven't done anything terribly wrong there before, right?

[Speaker 1] (6:39:53 - 6:39:54)
No.

[Speaker 6] (6:39:54 - 6:40:12)
So it should be okay, because you're already so very popular in China, your books are very widely read, and so many of my friends in the spiritual community, or even outside of this community, everybody just tells me how much they are expecting your visit.

[Speaker 18] (6:40:13 - 6:40:14)
Oh, okay.

[Speaker 1] (6:40:14 - 6:40:16)
Well, thank you, I will come.

[Speaker 6] (6:40:16 - 6:40:35)
Oh, that's great, that's great. Oh here, finally comes my question. Okay, so how can we truly accept and surrender and be present without having to go through a lot of sufferings, or intense sufferings, to the point that you have no other choice but to give up your ego?

[Speaker 1] (6:40:36 - 6:40:36)
Right.

[Speaker 6] (6:40:36 - 6:41:04)
And for instance, when I hear certain statements like, you must not reject your rejection, or you must not judge your judgments, well that made me feel even more painful, because that's exactly what I'm doing. So sometimes, most of the times, I am aware that I'm judging this or that, but how to proceed further to really accept, but not just accepting in my mind.

[Speaker 1] (6:41:04 - 6:48:57)
Ah, yes, yes. Now, as you mentioned, it is true that for some people, some people are forced into surrender because they cannot stand the suffering anymore, and sometimes life does that to you, to a person. So the suffering becomes so intense that, that was the case with me.

Suffering became so intense, I couldn't stand it anymore. I couldn't stand myself anymore. On some level, there must have been a realization that I was generating the suffering.

I didn't really consciously know that, but I could not live with myself anymore, as it was the phrase that came into my head before I was disidentified from the egoic self, the mind-made, unhappy me. And then there are those people who are sufficiently conscious, like all of you here, yet they are sufficiently conscious to be able to surrender or accept voluntarily without being forced into it by life. So it's a voluntary decision to come to an acceptance of what arises in this moment, but the acceptance needs to be deep enough so that it's not just on a conceptual level, but also on a deeper level.

So the emotional level, for example. Otherwise you would be lying to yourself when you say, let's say you are in a situation that generates an irritation in you. Let's say a relatively small situation.

There's a long delay somewhere. You're waiting for something. There's a long delay.

You can find irritation beginning to build up. At some point you realize that irritation is beginning to build up. Then your mind says, I need to surrender.

I should surrender to this situation. I need to accept it the way it is. Okay.

And then the mind says, okay, I accept this situation the way it is. The question is, does it remain a statement in the mind? Because the true acceptance needs to go into every cell of your body.

You need to be in touch. This is why as a practice, body awareness is very helpful when you're not being challenged, just as to feel the inner body. So that habitually you're able to place attention into the inner energy field of your body, which also helps you to know what's going on in the emotional field of your body.

So let's say you get irritated at the airport. The flight is canceled. Now you're lining up.

Hypothetical situation. Many situations like that happen all the time. Your flight is canceled.

Now you're lining up again to book another, get on another flight. But there's 20 people ahead of you. Here in China, they're often, the airline industry is not very...

The long waiting periods and people get very upset at airports because they have to wait a long time. They suddenly start shouting, can't take anymore. So I accept this moment as it is.

And then you need to detect within yourself whether you have really accepted it because are you still feeling irritated or not? To be able to know if you're irritated or not, you need to know both whether your mind is continuing to produce thoughts of irritation. And maybe it is not because you have mentally decided you're not going to have any more thoughts.

But in the emotional field, you may still be angry and irritated. So your attention needs to move into the body so that you're aware, is there still irritation in here? While my mind is saying, I completely accept this moment.

Or you could say another example of that would be, I forgive you. I forgive you. But there's something in you that hasn't forgiven.

So you have forgiven on a superficial mental level. So you need to get your attention in there to actually feel what... It's not only what your mind is saying at this moment.

What does it feel like to be in this moment? What is the feeling of it? And that will tell you when you ask them, what's the feeling of this moment?

That directs your attention into the body. And then you'll notice whether there's still, or whether there's a contraction still. And if there is, you can notice it.

You say, oh, there's still irritation there. And then what you can do, for example, is accept whatever you feel. Acceptance, surprisingly, changes it most.

It's the greatest agent for change, accepting whatever you feel. Because whatever you feel is non-acceptance. So you bring acceptance into the non-acceptance, which is in the contraction or the vibrational frequency of anger or irritation.

You say, oh, this is, it's okay to feel that. And sometimes it's possible to just drop it too. Sometimes it's a, I don't really want that.

So you take one or two deep breaths and release it from the body. And then you have released it both mentally, because the irritation usually starts in the mind, the mind making judgments about the situation you find yourself in. The body then reacts to the judgment and creates an emotion that reflects the mental judgment.

So it's always good to start with the mind and realizing I am not irritated because of this situation. I'm irritated because what your mind is commenting on this situation. That's an enormous insight.

And that applies to so many instances in your life when you feel any kind of unhappiness being seemingly being caused by the situation you find yourself in, by people, circumstances, and so on. Seemingly caused, but 95% of the unhappiness to use a generic term in whatever form it arises, a 95% of the unhappiness is generated surprisingly by your mind, but their mind is saying about the situations that you find yourself in. Once you realize that, you realize that you can be free of that because you don't have to do it.

It's the egoic mind, the unconsciousness, the unobserved mind is generating it. So there, that's the first, there you stop. Then you look at the most, then also you have enough consciousness left when it's not continuously absorbed by agitated thought processes.

Then you have enough consciousness left to direct it into the body and examine what it is that you feel. So the two levels. So let me know how it goes next time you're at an airport in China, for example, or many, do you live, what city do you live in?

[Speaker 18] (6:48:58 - 6:48:58)
Shanghai.

[Speaker 1] (6:48:59 - 6:49:24)
Oh yeah. Well, that's where it's all happening. It must be a very dynamic place, I imagine.

And high energy. Everybody's active and doing things. And that's a wonderful place to practice presence.

It's ideal. And of course you're challenged all the time, but Shanghai needs you and people like you who bring consciousness there.

[Speaker 6] (6:49:24 - 6:49:26)
To bring you there.

[Speaker 1] (6:49:26 - 6:49:29)
Yes. Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (6:49:30 - 6:49:31)
Thank you. Thanks.

[Speaker 1] (6:49:39 - 7:11:07)
This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. I'm aware of fear that is almost continual in me.

My parents were Holocaust survivors, and in spite of my awareness of the anxiety and fear, it does not seem to lessen. Lessen. I know you talk about in any given moment, there's never a problem, but when you're terrified all the time, there is a problem because you are afraid.

This happens to be here. And of course it's connected to what we've just been saying. Now, this is somebody here who a lot of the time is in a state of fear or anxiety.

It could be related to something in his past or his parents or perhaps other generations too. And what to do? You can't get rid of being terrified except being in a state of fear most of the time.

What you can do is not to allow the fear to rise up into your mind and control your thought processes. Because then there would be a normal thing when you are identified. The emotion that's there rises into your mind and then it causes you to think thoughts that correspond to the emotion, fearful thoughts in this case.

And then you would get a vicious circle building up between the emotion of fear, the thoughts you think, which are fearful thoughts, which give more energy to the emotion. So the more fearful thoughts you think, the more it perpetuates the fear that you feel. So to cut, to sever the link between the emotion that you feel and your thought processes, what you do is, and this is not pleasant, but it's possible, you place your attention on the emotion.

You feel it. It's unpleasant, but it's not going to kill you. A child would probably not be able to do that if it's intense.

It might have to escape into some, through dissociation or whatever, possibly. But an adult, it's not going to kill you. It might kill you if you allow it to rise into your mind, because you might even commit suicide if you can't stand this anymore, but it will not kill you in itself.

So feel it. And then you shine the light of awareness on it. And you may have to do that a lot.

And at first it's not pleasant, but it's a burning up of the old emotion. And the only way to get rid of it is to accept it as it is right now. If you want to get rid of it, you can't.

But that complete acceptance of what is, is actually the doorway through it. It's a transformation of it. And if it's extreme, that can become your main meditation in life.

And that will become your main teacher. And that will bring about your transformation. In some people's lives, there is one huge disability, one huge source of suffering or pain that it could be a physical disability.

It could be a situation like being in prison. It could be an emotion like that, that you carry inside that doesn't need to go, doesn't want to go away. So in certain people's lives, there is one major thing that seems to color your entire life and make your entire life seemingly makes it impossible for you to ever be free or happy or joyful.

But if that one thing, if you surrender to it, allow it to be and make it as a continuous spiritual practice, you need nothing else. That one thing will transform you if you surrender to it. And there will come a point when you are grateful that you had to go through that because it will have taken you, it will be the greatest spiritual teacher.

So there was, I believe, if I remember correctly, even Epictetus, that philosopher who said, it's not the situation that makes you unhappy, it's the thought that makes you unhappy. If I remember correctly, he was also crippled. He couldn't walk properly and he was a slave until he became freed.

So it's often humans who have one major disability or some huge, huge difficulty in life. And that becomes their catalyst for spiritual transformation. If they can surrender to it, allow it to be acceptance.

I call it acceptance of the seemingly unacceptable. Stephen Hawking's case, for example, I don't know to what extent he awakened spiritually, but he accepted the unacceptable. And so certain miracles happened.

He survived. Nobody would have thought it possible. And his life became fruitful on one level, at least.

Acceptance of the unacceptable is a great source of grace in this world. It's just a miracle. But it's an arduous, it can be an arduous process, especially for this questioner here who is here.

It may take a while. You have to endure it and be with it and surrender to it a lot of the time. And that's your meditation.

You don't need transcendental meditation. Your pain, your fear is enough. Be with it.

Allow it to be there. And gradually you will notice the transformation. That's the alchemy of transformation, the alchemy of suffering into...

The old meaning of alchemy is base metal. There comes this guy who experiments in the chemical kitchen and he transforms base metal into gold. So there've been medieval times, there was a lot of interest in alchemy.

So that would be the material level of alchemy. But on a spiritual level, alchemy is the transformation of suffering into consciousness. And that only happens if you bring surrender to the suffering.

This is how the reason why in India, for example, you have holy men or also, I suppose, holy women who inflict the most incredible suffering on themselves for years. There's a man who stands on one leg continuously, he even sleeps on one leg. Or you might sleep, on the famous example, on a bed of nails.

Can't think of other examples, but it's incredible. And the idea behind it is voluntarily embrace suffering so that it brings about a transformation of consciousness by surrendering to it. I would not recommend that that is the way for you to go.

Life has enough. What life gives you is just right for you and enough. And some of you might say more than enough.

My prostate was cancerous and I had surgery on it. I had been cancer free or so I thought, but after seven years, cancer has once again reared its ugly presence in the region. I'm having difficulty coping with this plus type two diabetes.

Well, it seems the destiny of many humans to be confronted with something like that. At some point or something similar. So I will just explain what I have addressed before a few times with regard to serious illness.

And that is not to, as much as possible, avoid the mental, I'm not saying don't recognize reality like in the previous question, but what I'm saying is avoid an excessive mental dwelling on either the condition that has a name or me as the one who suffers from that condition. So that your mind does not continuously strengthen that mind form of the illness mind form or me as my identity as a sufferer from that illness by thinking about it, which of course creates a lot of fear and won't make you feel good. In other words, in order to become free, now, it is a secondary thing, what kind of treatment you go in for, whether it's conventional treatment, whether it's alternative treatment, whether it's no treatment at all, all that only you can know.

But what is your state of consciousness? And it's a wonderful, it sounds strange for me to say that it is a great opportunity to have an illness like that. And this has been confirmed to me by a number of people that I've known who have had similar illnesses.

One or two seem to get cured, others did not, but that was secondary. They said that it forced them into a very intense presence because they noticed when they were not present, they were very unhappy. So the illness forced them into just living more and more in the present moment.

An extreme example of that was I read last year, I sent it to, I read it on the BBC News, my app, there was a musician in England, popular music, I had never heard of him, but apparently he was quite well known in England who got diagnosed with cancer. And he reports in an interview that when he left the doctor's office, he felt ecstatic. This is very rare.

He felt ecstatically happy and he couldn't quite figure out why. And now he says, I now realize all the problems that I thought I had are completely meaningless and he lives completely in the now. And the rare thing with him was that that happened immediately as he left the doctor's office.

I've never heard that before, that somebody, so can you be, allow the illness to push you into the awakened state. Their motivation is very strong now. And it could happen to anybody who is Luganti.

I have not had a serious illness my whole life. I haven't even seen the inside of a hospital, but who can say that it's not going to happen? Everybody is one heartbeat away from death.

Well, the death of the physical body. And most, if you don't die in an accident, if you die, you might die of old age, if you're lucky or unlucky, depending what your old age looks like. Or as somebody once said, old age isn't so bad if you consider the alternative.

So it's either that, most people here, including myself, will probably die of something, which would be heart attack, cancer, stroke. Well, I think those are the main things. Could be an accident too, of course, or something more rare.

Something eventually comes. So ultimately how long your life is, although I must admit, if it comes to a very young person, it may be more difficult. One person hasn't lived completely, but even there, the shift is possible so that you allow the condition, the illness to force you into just absolute present moment awareness in which you do not suffer.

A lot of the suffering of the illness arises from what your mind is saying. Of course, with some illnesses, pain eventually comes. That is pain.

When I use the word suffering, I really refer to psychological suffering. If there's pain, then perhaps something is done to alleviate the pain and you also need to surrender. But there may be many conditions where there is actually no pain for quite a long time, but you know there is that illness.

So go away from focusing excessively on the idea of illness in the mind and in order to get out of the idea of illness, which is not a denial that, it's not saying I don't have it. No, you're just not going there. You're just being in the present moment.

And several people that were part of, came to me over the years, especially at a time when I still had more personal contact with people who would come to me. I've seen several who had developed fatal illnesses and in the last months of their lives became quite radiant, quite awakened really. The flowering that is meant to be the purpose of human life, the flowering of consciousness happened.

They didn't need another 25 years of life, which means 25 years of eating, 25 years of taking the dog for a walk, going on vacation, seeing a few more sunsets and adding more life experiences. And you can add more and more, but is that the real purpose of your life? To add more and they're good, but then you need more and more and more life experiences and add more.

No, there's something else that is more vital, more important. And that's the flowering, the shift in consciousness. Then time becomes immaterial, whether you have a few more months or another 20 years or 30 years.

So it was wonderful to see those people becoming radiant and becoming in a way like little children because the whole personality collapsed. The ego could not survive. Knowing that it had no future.

If the ego really knows it has no future, either it goes into intense suffering and complaining and victim identity. Why did this happen to me? To me?

Or it dissolves.

[Speaker 3] (7:12:06 - 7:18:39)
It's our intention. Our intention is everything. Nothing happens on this planet without it.

Not one single thing has ever been accomplished without intention. So I started thinking about my life and I started thinking about this conference and what we're about. And I looked back and I thought, well, I was two people my whole life.

I was in the living room, entertaining people, being a monkey, you know, doing my thing for the company and trying to relieve my mother who was suffering. She had rheumatoid arthritis and phlebitis and everything, everything under the sun that was nagging at her. And she was depressed and I wanted her to be free.

And I wanted her to realize that her life was worth something because she gave birth to someone who was worth something. And then I would go into my room and I would sit with a legal pad. I was a little kid.

And I would sit there and I would try to figure out what it meant, what it was all about. Why are we here? What is this?

And one day I read something from Buddha that said that all spirituality is about relieving suffering. And I suddenly realized that's what I'm doing in the other room. And I'm aligned you know this, my purpose is aligned with this.

So I felt incredibly lucky. I lose sight of that all the time. I get caught up in different concerns and ego concerns.

But I'm so lucky to be a part of this community and to do something that is of value. And I really cherish that. And we are all one thing.

It really is true. Can I speak to the person in the last row, in the very last seat against the wall? Is there someone back there that can say hello?

What's your name? Andrea, are you aware that do you have the distinct palpable feeling that your intention created this evening as well as Melissa's? Do you understand that all of this, this entire event is happening inside you?

We'll just try to feel it for a second because it's a trip, man. Some people go to the Super Bowl. I am the Super Bowl, man.

I swear. My friends are all going to see that play. That was great.

I'm like, yeah, but the energy coming out of me right now, man, is unbelievable. I'm just sitting there. I'm the stadium.

I'm the vendors outside. I'm the crack dealer on the corner. I'm everything, man.

There's no end to it and it's so much fun. It's so much fun. So I hope you can feel that and I hope you understand that you are one of the creators of this evening, that your intentions and your desires created this evening as well.

And then I hope you are able to ask yourself, why did I get such a crappy seat and be okay with it? I mean, you're in the last row in the last seat. And yet you created this.

That's got to be. It's a really selfless thing to do. A few months ago, after knowing Eckhart Tolle for a while and studying the books, I woke up and I suddenly got it.

I understood suddenly how thought was just an illusory thing. And how thought is responsible for, if not all, most of the suffering we experience. And then I suddenly felt like I was looking at these thoughts from another perspective and I wondered, who is it that's aware that I'm thinking?

And suddenly I was thrown into this expansive, amazing feeling of freedom from myself, from my problems. I saw that I was bigger than what I do. I was bigger than my body.

I was everything and everyone. I was no longer a fragment of the universe. I was the universe.

And ever since that day, I've been trying to get back there. It comes and it goes. It's like riding a wave.

Sometimes I'm on, sometimes I'm off, but at least I know where I want to go and that I want to take as many people with me as I possibly can because the feeling is amazing.

[Speaker 1] (7:19:14 - 7:44:24)
Thank you, wonderful. Welcome. My first time here, up north.

And it is perhaps not mere coincidence but synchronistic that we are coming together here at a time of crisis, politically. And it is significant that a group of people are gathering here who are focused on spiritual awakening and of course, the inevitable thing that comes with spiritual awakening, that's inner peace. And that's what needed, not only here, but in the rest of the world too.

Most of you are here because you're already undergoing what I call the awakening process. And I'm sure some of you are here who are already awake and just enjoy listening to me. Don't need to be here anymore, but that's fine.

And one or two may be here against their free will because your partner or a relative or a good friend told you that you really need to come here. And it is a sad fact that the people who really need to be here are not going to be here, mostly. But that's fine.

Awakening eventually will come to the whole of humanity. But right now, at this time, a certain segment of humanity is beginning to go through this evolutionary shift, which I sometimes call the awakening of consciousness. And I guess, although

I have no plans, particular plans for this evening, but my feeling is that it's going to be about awakening, the awakening of human consciousness.

And not only about the awakening of human consciousness, I have a feeling that this evening is going to be an essential part of the awakening that's happening on the planet here and there. So I'd like this evening to be not only interesting for you on a conceptual level or entertaining, because that wouldn't be quite enough and you might get bored after half an hour or so. But more importantly, I'd like this evening to be experiential for you.

Something that goes beyond conceptual understanding or taking in new ideas, interesting ideas, and then you can go home afterwards and say, oh, that was interesting what he talked about. I don't remember everything, but that was an interesting idea. There may be one or two interesting ideas, but this is not what this evening is about.

It's something deeper, a shift in consciousness. So I'd like you to experience as we spend this evening together, to experience or to deepen, because many of you have already, are already going through this shift. Then this evening is a deepening for you of this shift in consciousness.

And for one or two of you, it may be the first time and that may be one or two of those of you who didn't really want to come here, but were dragged here by someone else. And you may get suddenly, have your first glimpse of what is meant by awakening. And what in Zen they called Satori.

And you suddenly go, oh, now I know what he's talking about. That's what it is. And then you talk to a friend about it tomorrow and say, well, what is it?

And say, well, I can't explain it, but I realized something. Humanity is going through a very, what has been until now, a very slow evolutionary progression, human consciousness. So slow that you would hardly notice it.

Humans are slow learners. They repeat the same mistake again and again. The same thing that causes them suffering, they do it again and again and again, both personal on this personal level and on a collective level.

The same mistakes politicians make and so on, until a point comes when they can't stand the suffering anymore. And that's always a good point to reach. And then suddenly an inner opening happens.

Suffering has its purpose. And many of you would not be here. I would even say most, perhaps even all of you would not be here if you had not had your share of human suffering.

So retrospectively, we can be grateful for the suffering that we as individuals have gone through, because it has taken us to this point of the awakening of consciousness. This also applies to the whole of humanity. Humanity is an, you can consider it as an organism that is gradually evolving, the collective consciousness of humanity.

Each individual is an expression of the collective consciousness of humanity. And the collective consciousness of humanity is an expression of the one universal consciousness. The greatest mystery of the universe, and perhaps this is a good starting point for our evening.

The greatest mystery of the universe is not out in outer space, the mysteries of the galaxies, the mysteries of the black holes, the billions of galaxies that exist, that it is phenomenal, it's unbelievable. And the greatest mystery is not on the atomic level, which is also unbelievable. The world that is there, the atomic and subatomic level that scientists explore, which we only understand a tiny fragment of, just as we only understand the tiniest of fragments of what is out there.

So you have the two realms, the two mysteries, the outer space, and then the macrocosm, and you have the microcosm. And people write books, great scientists write books about the mysteries of the universe. And the amazing thing is, many of these books, very good books, fail to mention one word.

They explore the mysteries of the universe, but there's one word, you can have a whole book on the mysteries of the universe, either the macrocosm or the microcosm or the two together. The one word that's not mentioned is consciousness. Which is the foremost fundamental mystery, the fact that the universe is conscious.

That is the most amazing miracle. How do I know that the universe is conscious? Well, I am conscious.

You are conscious. The universe is conscious in us. The universe is experiencing itself for a brief moment as a human being.

It's also experiencing itself for brief moments as a plant or an animal. And that's an amazing thing. Now, scientists are probably never going to figure out what consciousness is.

If it's even possible to figure out what consciousness is, because scientists is concerned with looking out there. You can either look out into outer space or you look into the most, the innermost of matter. But what scientists don't look at is their own consciousness.

Which is the universe looking at itself. So the awakening of human consciousness is, and I'll give you now the answer in case you have better things to do. So I'll tell you the secret of the universe now.

And so if you want to have a pint after this, it's okay. At least you know the secret of the universe. And let's just settle into the present moment.

Which is not something perhaps that you would normally do because there's always something else that's more important or pretends to be more important. And then you forget that the only important, the only really important thing in your life is the present moment. Because there is nothing else, ever.

You have to really realize that fully to see the implications of that. And how one could almost say devastating it is to realize that there's only ever this moment. But most people live as if other things, past and future, were more important than this moment.

It's an unconscious pattern. So meditation is about becoming present and the word itself implies, of course, now, present moment. So we sometimes speak of present moment awareness.

I sometimes call it presence. And that is what meditation is all about. Discovering that dimension of consciousness in yourself and usually meditation techniques are designed to get you there.

But our meditation is a meditation that does not really have any particular techniques. I'm just inviting you to come into this present moment with your attention directly. Just drop into the now.

This is something you can only verify or realize for yourself that you can actually almost sense, one could say, the presence of the present moment. Well, it has no shape or form. So you can become conscious of the present moment itself.

What does that mean? First of all, you become more conscious of sensory perceptions. An alertness arises that normally is not there when you are trapped in the continuous stream of thinking.

Then that alertness that is synonymous with presence or awareness is just not there. So the normal state of consciousness is to be trapped in this continuous stream of thinking, a lot of it quite useless and repetitive. Thinking can be a powerful thing, but most people's thinking, 99% of it is repetitive, useless, often negative.

It's mental noise. And when you're identified with that, when there's that voice in your head that never stops speaking and you don't even know that you are not that voice, so you think you are the voice, you become the voice, that is a dreamlike state. And you can observe people around you often who are in that dreamlike state.

You can see it in their eyes. They're not here. All their attention is absorbed by their thinking.

They're just a little bit left, just that they know where they are going and not bump into furniture. But so you can see how many people are most of the time not really present because almost all their attention is absorbed by this continuous noise of thinking. And so they go, and when they look at you, they don't really see you.

At best, they see you through the screen of thinking, which is judgments that they may have about you. So there's never a clear perception of anything. Everything is filtered through the thinking, through the judgments of the mind.

And that's traditionally in spirituality, that's called being asleep. And that's why the term that is used in various ancient spiritual traditions for enlightenment or whatever you want to call it is awakening. So there's an alertness that is suddenly there when you become conscious of the present moment.

At first, you might notice it as suddenly becoming more aware of your sense perceptions, listening, looking, seeing, hearing. You might also find that alertness is there when something new suddenly arises in your field of vision, somebody comes into the, something appears, or in your hearing, a sudden noise, and when a sudden noise appears, and or suddenly somebody comes in or comes around the corner, and you suddenly look or listen, and there's an alertness behind the looking and listening. And for those few seconds, when that new thing arises and you give it your full attention, for those few seconds, three, four, five, maybe two, there's not a thought in your head.

Thought then comes in and after a few seconds, and it may for some people only be a couple of seconds, and then immediately interprets what it is there. But there is always, there's a moment when something new arises, when there is clear perception and just an alertness in the background. And that's an interesting moment because that is a natural way of presence arising in you, but usually it's so short-lived that people miss it.

So it's a good thing to discover that you're actually already meditating for brief moments. You are in the state that we call meditation and perhaps didn't even know it. And sometimes there may be moments when you just sit somewhere and you suddenly become completely comfortable with that moment as it is.

And an inner peace arises and you feel there's nothing missing here. And this can suddenly can happen where before your mind said, why am I still waiting here in this waiting room? I've been sitting here for an hour and why are they keeping me waiting?

And so on the mind, and suddenly there may be a shift and you say, well, I'm here this moment, I might as well be here fully. And suddenly all that noise of thinking subsides and you realize actually there's nothing really missing in this moment. I'm breathing, looking, listening, feeling alive.

And it's fine when the mind is not telling me that it's not fine. And you'll be surprised how often the present moment is fine when you really check it out. Whereas the mind would habitually tell you that it's not fine.

It's not good enough. Something is missing. Something shouldn't be there.

But of course it is. And when you argue with what is in your mind that's called unhappiness in whatever form it comes. Irritation, impatience anger, sadness.

So meditation is learning to align yourself internally with the present moment and become aware of the present moment. So first of all, through sensory perceptions. So I just said that sometimes those things arise naturally.

You suddenly either something new comes into your field of vision or your hearing and an alertness is there for a few seconds. Or there may be a moment when you are relaxing into the present moment. And I'm not talking about becoming tired because that's not where we are going.

We are not going towards sleep. We are going towards a heightened sense of alertness which is what the meditative state is. Or let's do away with the term meditation altogether and just call it presence.

There's a heightened state of alertness is very different from the lowered alertness that when you are moving towards sleep. So that is not meditation. And even when people talk about relaxation usually often it's associated in people's minds with kind of you're gradually moving towards sleep.

I'm so relaxed now. Or if you go to a hypnotist, you might say and your eyes are becoming heavier and heavier and we are not going that way. That's nice.

It gives you a little bit of relief from your mind. But here we are exploring the possibility of a higher state of consciousness, heightened alertness.

[Speaker 10] (7:44:51 - 7:46:54)
So the question I wanted to ask you is could you comment on the relationship of chi which is the relationship of chi to Tao which is Buddhist I think. I know it is. How do you experience it?

I'm not crying. This is just water. Yeah, tears are usually water.

I experience chi energy like I feel like a lot of energy. So I think of energy as formed, as something that's formed. It can be kind of gross like the energy I feel now.

I feel it's very gross. Or it can be very fine, but it's all energy. And I feel that Tao, if it's what I think it means, is more like God which is not energy.

That's my opinion. And I really was... But what makes you think that energy is not God?

Well, it is, of course. Everything is part of that, but... So may I ask you, are you trying to separate the two?

I'm sorry?

[Speaker 2] (7:46:54 - 7:47:00)
May I ask, are you trying to separate the two? Like there's Tao here, there's God here, and there's energy here?

[Speaker 10] (7:47:01 - 7:47:05)
Well, I'm not trying, but maybe that's what I'm doing. It's possible.

[Speaker 18] (7:47:05 - 7:47:06)
Yeah. Hello.

[Speaker 9] (7:47:29 - 7:49:21)
It's the first time that I stand in front of so many people, so I'm a bit nervous. I guess I represent one of those, I suppose, many women who hold trauma from their childhood and have a pain body and have experienced how beautiful the connection with Source can be and how healing it can be. And so at the moment, I am going to...

Well, I've been contemplating a lot on the different energies that we hold, so two of them, so the Divine Feminine and the Divine Masculine, and also how much separation it really causes in this world and how much conditioning there is on what is feminine and what is masculine. And so Eckhart and also you talk about the one consciousness, the oneness, the one universal energy that we draw from, and yet still we also talk about yin and yang. And so I am just a little bit confused about...

So I am a woman, also the label says, and in my form. And so I'm asking myself, when I draw from Source, is it that I draw from the yin as a woman or is it that I draw from yin and yang? Is there no difference?

Is it just a difference in the form, how I express it? So I'm really kind of fascinated by this question of what is the unconditioned yin and what is the unconditioned yang?

[Speaker 2] (7:49:24 - 7:55:04)
The Source is neither yin or yang. Your being is neither female or male. The Source, you can say, is a nothingness, it's nothing.

Yet it's potential of everything. So the yin and the yang is the manifestation of form. So form is dual.

The non-dual, the unmanifested, is formless. Absolutely formless. Yet manifests itself as duality, as form.

So when we draw from the Source, we don't draw a yin and we don't draw a yang. We draw from the vastness of the Tao that cannot be named, cannot be described. But yet we use pointers and we have these words, these limited words, that we can point to this Source and point to who we are.

That is beyond the form. And I may use the words like yin, all the yin qualities, in order to be able to access stillness. So the spiritual words to use are like yin qualities.

So we have yin, yin is the female, which is always... And you can imagine the mountains all around and we have a mountain and you have a valley. And the feminine represents that valley, which is not the form here, but just the space here.

And the yang, the masculine, represents that which exists. So we need, it's almost like we need this duality in order to be able to see ourselves. So in other words, and I've said this before, if the whole world were the color green, we wouldn't know what green was.

We just wouldn't know it. But we have these differences. The opposites.

And everything in this manifested world is opposite. We have male trees, we have female trees, although I can't tell the difference, but there are, you know. So it's all opposite.

We just wouldn't know it. We wouldn't know this flower from a different flower. We wouldn't know this flower from a different flower.

You from me if we just all look the same. If we were all green. So the source that we draw, you go beyond any concepts, any words.

Because really there are no words to truly describe the unmanifested, the formless dimension. Of the source of stillness. But yet all this describes it all too at the same time.

And the beauty behind that, so the beauty is that this stillness coming through that form, the energy, which is the purest. You can say it's still form, energy is still form. So our life energy is still form, but it's the purest life form arising from the source of emptiness, nothingness, sometimes it's called.

And that's where we go to. We go to that source of no words, no description, no form. Yet it's here within.

It's here outside, it's neither in or out. But we sense it. Without our forms we probably would not even be able to sense it.

Because we are it. But we get a chance, an opportunity to sense with our human bodies. Not only here, but inside.

That space inside us senses the space, the bigger space.

[Speaker 9] (7:55:12 - 7:55:13)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (7:56:15 - 7:56:29)
All the things that I was so anxious about, that were created, what was it that was so unnecessary and pointless? All the things that I've been striving for were ultimately pointless.

[Speaker 17] (7:56:34 - 7:57:00)
So suffering in your life, if it still arises, it's used so that the ego gets burned up by the suffering, so to speak. The ego gets burned up in this fire of suffering.

[Speaker 1] (7:57:01 - 7:57:57)
Now we can call this conscious suffering. That's a very interesting concept, conscious suffering. When suffering arises, become aware of it, and accept that it's there.

In the form of fear, anxiety, regret, you have self-pity, you have unhappy sense of self, complaining about your life, many forms of suffering. You've lost things you don't know. Things that you had identified with are taken away from you.

Who am I now? I'm nobody. I'm nobody.

Well, that's great. Be nobody more completely.

[Speaker 17] (7:58:00 - 7:58:06)
Realize fully you're nobody-less. You're nobody-ness.

[Speaker 1] (7:58:13 - 8:07:45)
I don't know who I am anymore. I've lost everything. All the things I've worked for have gone.

Everything is so pointless. Their mind is still talking. It's all been for nothing.

It's all meaningless, meaningless. This is your mind talking. Don't believe in the things it says, but it continues talking.

Many humans in this world are suffering from what we could call nihilism. I don't know if you know that word, nihilism. Nihilism means the belief that everything is absolutely and utterly pointless.

That's a deep form of suffering, nihilism. It doesn't make what's the point of it, or just this awful life of mine. The whole world is pointless.

It's so awful. That's a very deep suffering, the total lack of meaning. Everything is arbitrary, random, and meaninglessness is a mental disease that is afflicting millions of humans.

Because everybody, the mainstream culture still believes, it goes back to the 19th century, it goes back to Darwin, Origin of Species, and said life evolved, which undoubtedly is true. But he said life evolved, but the evolution of life on this planet is an arbitrary, random course of events. Molecules and atoms at random coming together and forming life forms over millions of years.

Random, the idea of randomness in the theory of evolution put forward by Darwin and others, the idea of randomness means there's no purpose or intelligence behind it whatsoever. It's a random process. In other words, it's the belief that everything, that all life on this planet has no meaning.

It just is a meaningless conglomeration of atoms and molecules. It's ultimately meaningless. That basically is the underlying assumption behind the theory of evolution that many people still believe.

It has seeped into mainstream culture, and even people who have never even heard of Darwin, it has seeped into their belief system that we live in a meaningless universe. Before that happened, we had certain religious beliefs, so there was some meaning. And all those, a lot of that perhaps was ideological and ego-driven.

Nevertheless, in the ancient religion, there is the access to the transcendent is still there here and there. So there were still little openings into the transcendent, even though many forms of religion developed into ideological belief systems that strengthened the ego. Nevertheless, religion still carried, or still carry, the secret of transcendence is still there hiding within the religions.

And that became inaccessible to many humans. So now we have the pandemic of nihilism. This is one of the pandemics far worse than any physical pandemic.

That everything, the belief that everything is meaningless. So, and you can have a meaning in your life that is very limited. Like for many people, the meaning, okay, I want to have a career that gives you limited meaning in your personal life.

I'm working for a career, nothing wrong with that. I'm working to create a better life for myself and my family. That's also wonderful and great.

I'm working to achieve recognition in this world, et cetera, et cetera. That's fine too. But at some point, a meaning that is purely personal may begin to lose its power.

So that, let's say you've spent two or three decades working for your career, which is nothing wrong with it. At some point, you may arrive at a point where your career doesn't mean anything anymore, or you lose it. That you lose your career and your status, or it consumes you so completely that you become ill with stress.

Or in some other way, you turn into something that's not satisfying at all. It actually creates suffering. So something can give you limited meaning for a while, for years, and then suddenly turn out to be ultimately meaningless.

So some people suddenly wake up and say, all my life, some people fall ill, seriously ill. And then they look back on their life and say, all this was so pointless, accumulating possessions. Why did I do that?

What was the point in that? All the things that I was so anxious about, when they're, now they're, let's say they're seriously ill now. All the things that I was so anxious about, that were created, what was, it was so unnecessary and pointless.

All the things that I'd been striving for were ultimately pointless. That can be an opening. Suddenly, wow, the limited personal meaning, which was fine.

It's better than no meaning at all. To have a personal meaning in your life, better than no meaning at all. But ultimately, that's not satisfying in the long term.

You have to go deeper, to a deeper meaning that transcends who you are as a person. And that is, am I aligned with the purpose of the universe? That is the ultimate true meaning.

Am I aligned with a purpose? And what is the purpose of the universe? The purpose of the universe is consciousness, bringing more consciousness into this dimension.

That's the purpose of the universe. Bringing more consciousness into this dimension. Am I aligned with that?

And then, if that is the case, if you're aligned with that, you are a bringer of consciousness, a bringer of light. That is the ultimate true purpose. And it could be that your personal purpose and the deeper purpose can go together.

That's fine. So you can have a career, and yet it's not totally ego-dominated while you are active working. You bring in the light of consciousness.

You do things in your work that bring more consciousness into this dimension. That's wonderful. So you can have, it is not necessarily a case of either having a career or being aligned with universal purpose, which is you can bring the two together.

That's perfectly, that's the balance between, the balance between being and doing, as I sometimes call it, the balance between being and doing, bringing those two together. But so the purpose, there's only one true purpose in your life, and that you have to discover that, and that is, am I aligned with the consciousness? Am I a bringer of consciousness?

So that's the end of nihilism, is that, and it no longer matters. Your entire past becomes relatively unimportant when you realize the meaning of life is to be a bringer of consciousness. Let's say your entire past was one disaster after another.

It happens, some people's life is like, unfortunately, it was like that. Let's say you've ended up in prison because you did one wrong and bad thing after another. And, but then you look back in your so-called life and say, my God, that was a disaster.

My entire life was just a disaster.

[Speaker 17] (8:07:47 - 8:07:55)
Okay, but at this moment, I realize the consciousness that I am.

[Speaker 1] (8:07:58 - 8:11:01)
And I've, all the suffering that I have created for myself and others, all the suffering I've created for myself and others was part of the egoic dream, the delusion, the egoic delusion and the conditioning that I came into this world with. And then you awaken at this moment. If a totally disastrous life brings you to a point of awakening now, the whole thing was great because it suddenly has a purpose.

Retrospectively, all the disasters brought you to this moment of awakening. So in retrospect, what was totally absurd and meaningless, suddenly it fulfilled a purpose. The past can suddenly be realized as having fulfilled its purpose by creating the suffering that led to your awakening.

So there's no regret anymore about the past. It all made sense. So it's, the meaning arises retrospectively.

It only remains absurd and disastrous if the awakening doesn't happen. Then you're trapped in the dreadful dream, continue to be trapped in it. Well, so be aligned with universal purpose.

That is the ultimate purpose. No matter what you do, no matter how it expresses itself through you, that doesn't matter. But realize that as, and if you want to look at your life in terms of failure and success, as many people do, is my life a failure?

Is my life a success? How do you, what criterion do you use for failure or success? Do you allow this world to tell you whether you're a failure or success?

To a large extent, this world is insane. So are you allowing an insane world to tell you whether your life is a failure or success? Well, no, if this world cannot tell you, then what is it?

Obviously, the only true criterion is whether you are conscious or not in this moment. If you're conscious in this moment, instead of being totally immersed in the dream of your conditioned unawareness, the fictitious person, if you are conscious in this moment, then that is the greatest and only true success there could be in this life.

[Speaker 5] (8:11:28 - 8:12:50)
As we search to focus on our true self, our true I, and we look at the various types of attachments, status, materialism, body image, I specifically have a problem with letting go of the concept of relationship and roles, and specifically the role of mother. And although I see the agonic risk in hanging on to the role of mother and have no problem with the challenge of trying to let go of that, it's the concept of letting go of, and having motivation to let go of the bond between mother and child that I struggle with. How old is your child?

My children are adults. I have two living and one that I have buried. So I embrace and fully accept the opportunity that they all may go at any time.

It's not that, but I'm talking about the emotional bond. So I'd like your comment on how we accept and embrace the concept of a letting go of the emotional bond. Can I ask, I'm gonna stay there.

[Speaker 2] (8:12:51 - 8:12:56)
Can I ask you whether you have fully grieved the one that you have lost?

[Speaker 5] (8:12:56 - 8:13:39)
I feel that we have. It's been 30 years, and my belief in the spirituality that we speak of has assisted me in incorporating that into our lives. Are you afraid your other children may die before you pass?

No, I have no fear of that. I have no fear of death for any of us. Okay.

But you have a fear of letting go. I have no motivation to let go of the attachment between any one of the three living or dead. I'm asking for your feedback on how to let go of the attachment.

[Speaker 2] (8:13:42 - 8:15:36)
Well, what's coming through is that it's not the bond so much that you have to let go of. It's the mother role to let go of. And begin, when you let go of that, you are able to then begin a new sort of relationship, a more perhaps adult to adult relationship, a friendship to friendship relationship, rather than the mother-daughter, mother-son relationship.

Now, usually when we hang onto our roles, it gives the ego a sense of something, gives the mind something. Because after all, you know, we've been mothers for a very long time. But there comes a point where if you don't let go, then a new relationship cannot form, a different type of relationship, a more adult relationship.

Because mother relationship, let's face it, mother's, you know, concept of mother could be telling your child what to do or having your child being able to come to you. But if we don't let go of that, the result then for your child is also not being able to be fully themselves. And you know that because you're shaking your head.

And in turn, you are not able to be fully yourself. So, do you want to be fully yourself? Of course.

Then let go.

[Speaker 5] (8:15:38 - 8:15:50)
So am I understanding correctly that letting go of the attachment of roles and relationships is not literally letting go of valuing that, but rather letting go of that identifying you?

[Speaker 2] (8:15:51 - 8:17:34)
Exactly. When we have an expectation of something, so when I realized in my relationship with Eckhart early on, I had a lot of expectations. A lot of expectations.

Things that I didn't want in a relationship anymore, things that I wanted in a relationship. And he's like, no. So, when I suddenly saw that, oh my God, it was like this aha moment.

Oh my God, I'm not having a real relationship with my man here. I'm having a relationship with the idea in my head. So you won't be able to have a full relationship with your children until you let go of the role.

Because you don't need to be a mother anymore. They're not little. So, but mothers are okay.

They're wonderful. But when they get to be, you know, like older, it's no longer wonderful. It blocks them from growing and being who they are and blocks you from growing and being who you are.

The question is, are you willing to discover who you really are? And have them discover who they really are and see them who they really are.

[Speaker 5] (8:17:34 - 8:17:37)
Thank you for the clarification. Great.

[Speaker 1] (8:18:18 - 9:24:50)
Once you become aware, do you have to have a plan of where you're going? Or do you leave that up to the universe to bring that to you for you then to make the choice? That's, many people have been asking that question.

Do you have a plan to where you're going? Or does that just happen when you are in touch with the creative power within you? Either way may be the case.

For some people, something just spontaneously and organically grows. And before they know it, they are engaged in some inspired and empowered activity. It may start very small and they may not even know that how it's going to grow and develop.

It's just the consciousness takes over and they didn't plan it. Sometimes, just an example, you could have a musician who just loves playing this instrument and then he is at a street corner playing his instrument. And then somebody comes and says, oh, this is great.

Why don't you try come to a studio? And it can develop from there without him having had any plan, just enjoying the doing. For others, something may come to them suddenly, a mental, an image of something that wants to, I put it that way, I say that wants to be created.

It's not so much I want to create this. When something comes to you from a deeper level, it feels more like that this wants to be created. So it comes, an image or a thought even comes to you and then you suddenly know what it is that wants to be created through you.

And then one could say that you have a plan, but the plan is very different from the plans that the ego had when you were still trapped in ego structures because whatever plan the ego has is very limited by its needs. The ego really seeks itself through its plans. It seeks an enhancement of itself.

So those are the plans that the ego creates and they are flawed, deeply flawed. And whatever action you take in order to carry out the ego's plans is also going to be deeply flawed and will bring about a lot of heartache and problems and creates problems more and more for yourself and others. And you get, it's hard, it's a struggle.

That's always a sign that there's the ego somewhere, that you're struggling. I'm not talking about intensity. Things that, plans, so you have ego plans.

They are really, there's always a hidden self-seeking in whatever the plan might be. The ego, when it comes through the ego, there's a hidden, it's a hidden form of self-seeking. But the plans that I'm talking about here come from a deeper level within yourself.

That's why I usually say not that you want to create this or that, but it wants to be created through you. And so there is a, the deeper, the unconditioned wants to create form through you because it loves the creation of form. How do I know that?

Well, just look around and you see that the universe loves to create multiplicity, an incredible multiplicity of life forms everywhere throughout the cosmos. Just planet Earth alone, just look at the billions of life forms. So obviously the universe enjoys the creation of form and it has some purpose that we cannot conceptually, rationally, intellectually, fully understand, although we can have an inkling of why.

But we cannot fully understand what the ultimate purpose of the creation of forms is. Yes, we have an inkling, I sometimes talk of it, but one thing is certain, that the universe enjoys that. Consciousness enjoys the play of form and it can happen through you and it's deeply enjoyable.

So something may come to you, then that something that, and then you can say, oh, I have a plan and it'll be inspired and there's no self-seeking in it. In other words, you're not looking to whatever it is that wants to be created through you. You're not looking to it for happiness or self-enhancement or fame or wealth, that those things may come.

You may get fame, you may get wealth, you may get those things as by-products, but that's not the reason why this creation happens through you. There is no self-seeking and yet, whatever the ego would have sought for itself may come to you as the adding on, as Jesus puts it. Things may be added on.

If there's an enormous energy output from you into the world, it's not yours, of course, there's no personal energy, it would be a misperception. But if you become a channel for that universal energy, then, of course, things will come back to you, usually also in material forms. So there will be, if there's an enormous outflow, an enormous giving, not yours, but as a channel, things will come back to you because if you give out to the universe, the universe gives back.

So you may enjoy wealth, but it would be just an adding on to, or you might give part of it away, or all of it, whatever it is, that you feel is right for you. Just so you can, to summarize, for some, there's just a spontaneous evolution of the creative impulse into the external, and it happens through them without any prior plan. For others, something arises in their minds and they, yes, this is what I need to do.

This is what wants to come into being through me. I feel that very strongly. And then you take action.

And important is not, be aware of the energy field behind the action that you take so that you don't lose the presence because the ego, even there, can still take over. If any action you take in order to achieve something, if stress and negativity come in when you find obstacles, because there's always some obstacle that you encounter when you begin to create something new, there will be some obstacles. There will also be enormous help coming, not necessarily immediately, perhaps immediately, but at some point you will notice an influx of supportive energy.

But you may also encounter obstacles in the form of people who don't want you to create something new. People who are so stuck in their mind patterns, they resist anything new. So that's a very common thing.

Or obstacle in some other form. So if then, if you encounter an obstacle and there's negativity or attack, you're attacking, then you're quickly losing power. The ego is attempting to take over.

So whenever you are trying hard or struggling or stress arises, stress is another indicator that you are no longer fully aligned with the power within. Then you become stressed, upset, anxious, complaining, attacking somebody, you're losing power quickly. So that's a good indicator.

Whenever you engage in creative action, manifesting this or that, is stress arising. Now, I'm not saying that there cannot, there's not going to be an intense energy behind when you're engaged in creative activity. There is intense energy behind it, which from an external viewpoint can sometimes be misinterpreted almost as stress, but it's not stress at all.

It's just intensity of energy behind creation. It is, but it's joyful, it's intense, but joyful. And you can feel that intensity when you're in the midst of some creation happening through you, enormous intensity of energy.

And that's, but very different from stress. Stress is always, there's a, it's not flowing, but this intensity is flowing. And it deals with, the intensity deals with obstacles in a very different way from the ego.

The intensity can sweep away obstacles or it can transform obstacles into something helpful. Even humans, it doesn't attack. Another thing to be, yes, you find obstacles when you create something, but as I just mentioned, also you encounter the phenomenon of being supported.

If your creation is aligned with what the universe wants, then you, it becomes enormously empowered. It's like riding on a huge wave. Somebody wrote a poem or something about it.

Was it Shakespeare? It starts with, there is a tide in the affairs of men. And if, can't remember the rest, but so if you catch that tide, which is the tide of something wanting to be created through you and that movement, and then you're riding on this enormous wave.

And at some point the creation then happens. And so then that wave comes to an end. And then there may be a time period when there's more of a withdrawal before new creation happens.

So that varies from person to person. And it's exciting to, it's wonderful to be part of that because it's something, an entirely new way of being coming to this planet. Because happiness does not ultimately derive from this world.

This world is not designed to make you happy. It is designed to challenge you. And if you believe that this world is designed to make you happy, then you're going to get very angry because as the years pass in your life, you realize, why isn't my life working?

Why is this reality seems to be always throwing obstacles in my path? The moment I say, oh, it's okay now, this problem has been solved, another one pops up from behind you. And so you have these areas of your life, the main areas being your physical health, your financial situation, your living situation, your professional situation, your relationship situation.

And one of these areas usually develops problems. So you solve a problem in your financial area and then props up a relationship problem. You solve the relationship problem, suddenly you have a health problem.

It's interesting that you're constantly being challenged and you might have noticed, one of the greatest sources of challenges are human beings. Because humans are incredibly challenging. And although humans look to other humans often for some ultimate fulfillment through other humans, more often what they find through other humans is that other humans turn out to be a source of suffering.

And that is because you're stuck in the egoic mind and you have the egoic mind has certain expectations of the world, which includes whatever you experience in this world, has certain expectations that the world cannot meet. But if you believe that the world should, then that is a delusional reality that you will be continuously unhappy. The world continues to challenge you, but you believe the world is here to make you happy.

That's a terrible dilemma. So it means all your expectations are delusory, but you don't know it. And that creates an enormous amount of suffering because then every challenge that you encounter in this world, and they come one after another, every challenge that you encounter in this world, you then, because of that underlying expectation that something is wrong when you're being challenged, every challenge is then turned into unhappiness.

There's a big difference between a challenge and unhappiness. So when you have delusory expectations of the world, then the world will make you unhappy and not happy, but you continue to believe that something has gone fundamentally wrong in your life because life does not leave you alone. Or do you want some peace?

You want some, ah, you want the sense of, I've arrived, this is it. And occasionally it comes, but it never lasts so very long. So that's the dilemma.

There's the underlying state of ignorance, not knowing that the function of this world is to challenge you because only by challenging you does it provide the necessary incentive to awaken you. And it is, you notice after a while that as you gradually begin to awaken out of the unconsciousness, which is the complete identification with the conceptual egoic mind, you begin to realize that, oh, a lot of the unhappiness that you experience, and unhappiness is a generic term that could be many, many things. Even a state of irritation is already unhappiness.

Sadness is unhappiness. Anger is, any state that doesn't feel good is unhappiness. Any state of unhappiness, you begin to realize that a greater part of it is not derived from the situations in your life.

And when you realize that, that's the beginning of an awakening, let's say 90% of the unhappiness that you encounter is actually produced by your mind. And that's an amazing realization. There remain the 10% unhappiness.

You might be very, somebody, a loved one dies close to you. Of course, you experience, you weep. That is, of course, normal.

But if you observe the various forms of unhappiness in your life, from the very, the mildest forms of unhappiness to the more extreme forms of unhappiness, let's say, just two brief examples, a mild, very, very small, little bit of unhappiness arises many times when things happen in daily life and you can't immediately get what you want. You're on the phone, trying to get talk to your bank, but of course, there's no human being there. And even that is a, it's a minor form of unhappiness, but it is, you get very irritated and you don't, you think, well, this is caused by this dreadful bank that has no longer human beings that you can speak to.

Or you're lining up, airports are a great place to observe small forms of unhappiness because often so many things go wrong and you're lining up and this lineup is not moving and just, and of course, these people are just so inefficient and never going to fly with them again. And so, and you feel more and more, and in any of these situations, if you observe, okay, unhappiness is arising, is it really coming from the situation or is it coming from the way in which I speak to myself about the situation? Does it derive from the mental commentary about the situation or is it the situation?

And in most cases, you actually find, and you begin, I suggest you start with little, small forms of unhappiness, you will find that the unhappiness is derived from the narrative, is derived from your self-talk in the head. And because the self-talk just happens to you, you're not doing it, it's like the heartbeat, it happens to thinking, the reactive thinking happens to you and you mistake it for who you are and then you become an unhappy human being. Welcome to our live meditation.

Are you conscious at this moment? Of course you're conscious because you see me on the screen, you're aware of the place where you are, the room, the doors, you're aware of other things, my voice, other noises perhaps. So you know that you're conscious because you're aware of these things.

If you were not conscious, you would not see me or hear my voice. So that is kind of secondary evidence that you are conscious, but it's not primary evidence. So secondary evidence, you're conscious of things, you're conscious of sense perceptions, you're conscious of thoughts or emotions.

And those things together, sense perceptions, thoughts, other mental activities, mental images and emotions, those things make up your life, a mixture of things, but those are the ingredients that make up what you call your life. Sense perceptions, thoughts or mental images and feelings, emotions. Now the way in which these are mixed differs from person to person, but those are the ingredients that make up what you call your life.

So you must be conscious for these to arise. They appear in the light of consciousness or the space of consciousness. And then there's something else, there's primary evidence, and that's what one may call spiritual awakening, when you're no longer totally drawn into, identified with, reacting to, sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions.

And without primary evidence, which we could call spiritual awakening, you are actually unconscious, spiritually speaking. Consciousness only reveals itself to you in disguise, assuming a certain form of sense perceptions, thought, emotion. And that draws you in, gives you your sense of who you are, your sense of identity, which is derived from your life, your life situation.

That gives you your sense of identity, which includes the past, the things you have experienced, which means perceived, thought about, felt. And these leave traces, so in the present moment, you still remember these things, re-experience them in your mind. That's you.

But you're not really awake, spiritually speaking, unless or until you're not only conscious of those things that I mentioned, but you're also conscious that you are conscious, conscious or aware of awareness, aware of yourself as awareness, aware of yourself as consciousness, aware of that formless dimension within yourself in which, for a moment, thought or thinking has subsided and you can sense an underlying presence, the beingness, the liveness, the loveness. These are all just pointers.

Stillness. Right now, I'm not asking you to become still, but to realize that dimension of consciousness that we call stillness that's always already there. Underneath all the thinking, but you didn't know it.

So stillness is actually a beautiful pointer. If you haven't read my little book, Stillness Speaks, or haven't looked at it in a long time, go back to it, read a page or two, and see if it enables you to enter that dimension of stillness, to find that dimension of stillness within you. That's what the book is for, not to give you more information.

But it gives you pointers, signposts. If I remember correctly, the first entry, the first sentence in the book is, you're never more essentially yourself than when you are still. That feeling of being you, of identity, that comes out of that stillness, that is the stillness, that is more essentially who you are than your historical person.

The identity that depends on your life situation and your past. So we have two, so to speak, identities. One is time-based, thought-based, and the other is formless.

And that consciousness, to be aware of that, is the aim of meditation. And here we are not even using any techniques. I'm just giving you pointers.

But also, I'm conveying to you the reality of consciousness itself. That's what the stillness is, the stillness that is also primordial intelligence. So the mastery of life consists in being able to operate on the level of form thinking and doing, and at the same time, not losing touch with the awareness, the stillness.

At first, it appears as two things that you consciously, during the day, become aware of yourself as awareness, become aware of the little spaces between thoughts, develop the ability to relinquish thinking if only for a few seconds, either by choice or by realizing that sometimes thinking subsides laterally. For example, when you look at something beautiful in nature, the sky, or the sunset, or the ocean, or the river, or the sound of the rain, the sound of the wind, there's an appreciation of what you perceive. You give it your fullest attention, and there's a little space in which the perception happens without any conceptualization.

In other words, the mind does not comment on it in the first moment of perceiving it, when you feel an inner connectedness with what you're perceiving. You just look, or you just listen. The realization of beauty arises in that moment of non-conceptual thinking, non-thinking.

And when that arises naturally, as it sometimes does, it doesn't even necessarily have to be when you look at something beautiful. It could happen at any moment. All the natural things are more conducive to that state of consciousness.

Then you suddenly become aware of why this moment feels so alive, so good, so peaceful. Because you're in touch with the dimension of consciousness itself. Not just the form that consciousness has taken, but consciousness itself.

There's an underlying alert stillness. In that sense, nature can reconnect you with the deeper dimension of yourself. It's sometimes called the essence identity, as opposed to the form identity.

So the mastery of life is moving in the two dimensions, so to speak. Not losing yourself in the form identity with millions and millions of people all over the world. Undoing that without knowing it, completely absorbed in their mind, sense perceptions, but it all basically happens in their mind, of course.

Completely identified with that. That's the unconscious state. The strange thing is it almost seems like a paradox.

Although there are moments when beauty, you become aware of beauty, that are portals into the unconditioned, pure consciousness awareness that you are. That is true. But as far as your life situation is concerned, the strange thing is, it's often when things are not going well on the level of form, that you're more likely to discover the dimension of essence in yourself, the formless, the stillness.

And by not going well, I mean when there's a disruption of your normal life, pattern of your normal life, so accident, illness, loss, some disruption. So on the level of form, things don't go well anymore. You can become very unhappy, that's usually the case.

But there's also the possibility that it increases your motivation to go deeper. But you don't have to wait for that here, because as you begin to awaken spiritually, you consciously choose to go to that dimension, to discover that dimension in yourself. So you don't have to wait for things to break down.

The present moment gives you access to the deeper dimension within yourself. And that starts with a little thing like, let's come back to folding the clothes. Why does that feel so wonderful and peaceful?

Because the task itself doesn't really require that much attention. You can do it, you don't have to work out mentally, how am I going to fold these pants or trousers? Or how exactly am I going to hang this shirt up?

No, you just do it, it's simple and it's easy. So a lot of your attention is left to spare. Now, most people with all that attention to spare, they go into all kinds of mind stuff.

So they're not fully conscious of what they're doing, they're just elsewhere. So I could have been here already giving a talk in my head. What am I going to say?

Well, I fold, and I wonder what's going to happen tonight. And then, when is our flight back home? Or did I let go of the menu?

What's for lunch today? What did he say to me yesterday that wasn't very kind, was it? And I really should have replied.

What should I have? I should have said this and this. That's right.

And so it's a kind of sleepwalking existence. So you're folding, okay. You're not here.

So all that attention that was to spare is absorbed by unconscious thinking. And that's normal, very normal. But it's a pity, because all that attention that is spare attention, you could have used to become aware of the fact that you are conscious.

In fact, so you become very still, and you realize that stillness is your consciousness. And then as you fold, whatever it is you're doing, your clothes, you feel this undercurrent of still, alert attention. ♪♪♪ Life without love is no life at all.

But life without love means you have not realized life, what life truly is. This questioner has a, it must be a quote from someone, but he doesn't say who, or maybe it's his own. Life without love is no life at all.

Please comment on this statement. Well, I like that statement. Life without love is no life at all.

Now, what does that mean, life without love? Love can only be there when you are connected to the source of life, who you are beyond form, stillness, spaciousness. And then from there, you perceive, you relate, you operate, you do what you do.

And there's a sense of oneness, no longer a sense of separation. You're one with the present moment. You're one with whoever you meet because the separation comes through mental concepts.

And that sense of oneness is love. It's a recognition that you share with every life form, you share the same consciousness. So it's always a self-recognition.

You see, you sense rather than see yourself in the other. That is love. And then of course you treat the other as yourself.

You love your neighbor as yourself. And you don't do to anybody what you don't want to be done to yourself. It's natural that comes out of the state of love.

And then, yes, you're not really truly alive or we could also say you're not fully human unless that dimension is there in you. So on some level, we could say human creation, the creation of the human has not yet been completed because many humans are not yet fully human. There is no love.

And why is there no love? Because they're disconnected from who they truly are because who they truly are merges with the universal divinity or the one. Who they truly are, who you truly are, who I truly am is one with the one, universal consciousness or the divine.

That's where you and the divine merge. Another way you could say it is the ray of sunlight realizes suddenly that it's not separate but realizes its source as the sun. And the ray of sunlight is not separate from the sun.

It emanates from the sun. It's not separate, but it could, let's to use this analogy, you could conceivably imagine the ray of sunlight being deluded into believing it's a separate entity and every other ray of sunlight is a separate entity with its own life because you're not in touch with the one life. So you believe that every life form has its own life.

But no life form has its own life. That's why I sometimes say, I don't have a life. You don't have a life because if you have a life, then there's you and life.

But how could you be there without life? You are life. I don't have a life because if I say my life, then I must be separate from life.

If I have life, then there's two here. There's life and there's me and I have it. It's absurd.

But that's the delusion that arises with separation when you don't realize that all life forms are expressions, manifestations of the one. And then every life form has its separate life. That's the absurdity, the delusion.

And then you create a world based on that delusion. And the kind of world you create on that delusion of separation is the world that you can read about in history books or listen to the news or look around. And so according to this quote, then that's no life at all.

That's one way of putting it, yes. It's no, life without love is no life at all. But life without love means you have not realized life, what life truly is.

All you know is separate life forms and you attribute a separate life to each life form. But they're all manifestations of the one. And you are a manifestation of the one which has no form, is beyond time.

And you can sense the one within you. And then there's love. And then you're truly alive and you're fully human.

It's only through the spaciousness that opens up that the true recognition of being in whatever life form appears in front of you, that recognition of being is there. Being recognizes itself. It disguises itself in millions of life forms, temporary disguises.

And you recognize, you look through the disguise and sometimes the disguise is very strong. That's the play of the universe. Let's really disguise ourselves.

And some humans are heavily disguised. God disguising him, her, itself very well. And with others, the disguise is not so heavy.

But the heavy disguise is more challenging. It's more fun in a way. I'm talking about, of course, difficult humans.

To recognize shared being as in a flower is of course much easier because the disguise is far, far, far less. Much easier than to recognize the shared being as when confronted with an angry human, it says, you. But there's a space for that also.

And you look, oh, give him or her the space to do their act. And you don't need to react. Let them do their act, but you don't need compulsively to react because if compulsively you react, you adopt your own, your disguise again.

And you play your part in the drama or the dream of existence. All the world's a stage. And all the men and women merely play as, or however else Shakespeare's phrase goes.

So to recognize your essential beingness is such a simple, it's so simple that it becomes difficult for the complicated humans. It's so, such a primordial fact. And then consciousness recognizes itself really.

That's what it is. And that is joyful or blissful. And so the Indian teachers, masters, they string together three words and make it into one, satitananda, being, consciousness, bliss, to describe that state of connectedness, of oneness with being.

It's very simple, too simple. And what do you access? Access also is intelligence itself, the unconditioned out of which anything new arises, an insight, an idea.

That is the place of true intelligence. I call it sometimes non-conceptual intelligence or the unconditioned consciousness. And that's where suddenly creativity opens up in your life.

Because the person is not creative. The mind is not creative, but it can be an instrument of true intelligence. And the mind has no intelligence of its own.

It borrows its intelligence from universal intelligence. So the secret then is to not lose touch with who you truly are as you go about this world, seemingly participating in the play, but knowing at the same time, not conceptually, being the space and then pretending also to be the person while you do things. So you are the space while you talk to someone, listen to someone in spacious awareness.

So you bring that dimension into the interaction. If you only did that, listening whenever other humans are talking to you, if you only did that, if you are able to use every opportunity whenever any human being talks to you, listen in spacious awareness instead of listening through mentally, immediately agreeing or disagreeing or thinking of the next thing you are going to say, or I know exactly what you need. Let me tell you what you need.

I know that already. But be there as an open field of aware presence. If you only did that, it would be enough to transform your life, your relationships with every human, because the old patterns would no longer be operating through you, would transform your relationships with all human beings.

And of course, will also help others without you feeling that you are helping, you're not doing anything, but it is an invitation to others if there's a slightest openness in the other to join you in that field of aware presence. And if they don't join you in that field of aware presence, it's fine too. But if that were your only spiritual practice, listening in that way to other, you would be enough to transform your life.

And if enough humans transform their lives in that way, then of course the world gets transformed. It's only a collective expression of the collective consciousness. So unless you live as a hermit, in other words, you never listen to anybody except your mind.

And most of you are not hermits, so you interact with people and every day you listen to people on the phone. Well, unless you get so much into texting that you don't talk to them anymore. For teenagers, I may have to think of some other way of being if they only, if they don't talk anymore.

No, no, it goes with your thumbs. You can see I haven't only had a phone for a few months of that kind, so I do like. So if that's your only spiritual practice, quite enough, just the listening.

Because whenever you listen, you are not there as an egoic entity. You're not bringing in your past. You're not even there as a person anymore.

The person recedes and you are there as awareness. And it doesn't mean that now you have to be, you can't talk anymore, no. It means then as you talk or reply or give your viewpoint, you very clearly realize that what you are giving is your viewpoint.

You don't merge with your viewpoint. And then anybody who questions or attacks your viewpoint is considered a mortal enemy because you have confused who you are with the thought in your head, which is your viewpoint, which is insane. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. I thought my childhood was difficult, but yours, I think, was more difficult. You had a very violent father, and so that was your primary challenge in childhood.

And without that primary challenge, you probably wouldn't be here now.

[Speaker 11] (9:24:50 - 9:26:23)
I wouldn't, and we all, you know, there were four boys in my family, and we all used different strategies to deal with the pain because he was an abusive and violent person and a wife batterer and all these things, and very unpredictable. And sometimes among us, we'd get depressed or try to use humor or whatever. I became the family peacemaker, which became my profession later on.

Anyway, but it's partly what took me to the monastery. I had a lot of suffering. And as you said earlier on, our education system focuses outwardly on reading and mathematics and science, but it doesn't focus on the heart.

It doesn't teach us either to ask who are we or what do we do with the suffering of life or the mystery of aging, none of it. And I needed something desperately. So it was really that calling inside to find some help.

And then I read these amazing books about Zen masters and I said, okay, I wanna find one and see if, you know, that can help. And fortunate, fortunately, I was actually able to find some good teachers. And you had this remarkable experience of really doing it on your own, which is both unusual.

I mean, a lot of people try, but also, you know, in many ways, much more difficult because you didn't have anybody to talk to to say, well, what happened?

[Speaker 1] (9:26:24 - 9:34:13)
Yes, this is why I had to seek people out after that shift to understand it. So I went to Buddhist monasteries. I talked to some monks and sought other places.

I went to investigating, trying to understand. And it's through Buddhism that I understood or began to understand a lot that had happened to me, which otherwise I wouldn't have been able to understand at all. But of course, when you have a shortage of money that restricts your life, you kind of can't live where you would like to live, or there's not enough freedom of movement because there's not enough money.

There is a sense of something missing. And you see, it's not just in your mind. It's also here when you look at your bank statement, you see it's not very much there.

Going beyond the sense of lack that is an inseparable part of the ego, you need to, I believe the questioner to some extent has already done that. You need to discover the fullness of life to use Jesus' expression, which is the fullness of being, which is inseparable from the present moment. So when you go there, you can sense that abundant, another expression is abundant life that Jesus used.

You can sense this abundant life in the present moment regardless of whether there is actual abundance In this manifested dimension, you feel the abundance of life and you see, and then when you appreciate all the countless manifestations of life that are around you that you perceive with your senses, and you acknowledge the abundance of life, that's no matter whether you go out into nature, you see the abundance of nature, the abundance of brain right now that's coming down here that I can hear, there's an acknowledgement and appreciation that even a potted plant, I have a potted plant there and there's another one here, to appreciate their manifestations of the aliveness of the universe. And there's an abundance in everything.

If you live in a city, there's abundance everywhere. You can look into a shop window and you see abundance of goods there. Oh, you don't even need to go and buy them, you just appreciate it.

You go past a flower shop and you see abundance of plants and flowers and you appreciate it and you feel abundant already. But the deepest abundance is the feeling of the fullness of life. And then I believe what the questioner is asking, at times when he looks at his bank statements, the sense of lack comes back because then you see, oh, I have very little, there's not much left.

And then the mind will start creating a narrative of lack and will tell you that you've been wronged, that actually you don't have much. And that can be a great hindrance and it will diminish your power of manifestation. So what do you do when you look at your bank statement or you go to the ATM machine and you want to get out $300 or whatever it is, and it says, you put it in, it says insufficient funds.

And that's the time of, I'm not talking about right now what you can do on a practical level. The question is, as much as possible, do not succumb to the feeling of financial lack, even if there is financial lack in your life, do not succumb to the feeling of lack. And that is whatever you can do to generate a sense of abundance.

And the main thing, of course, is going within and sensing the fullness of life. Even when you look at your bank statement, you look at it, okay, that's what I, don't personalize it, don't have any kind of projection, just, this is just factually, these are the figures of what I have. And then perhaps you have a certain course of action in order to, in addition to feeling the sense of abundance, you may have to work out a certain goal that you have that may give you more abundance.

So perhaps you have something that you want to do to create more abundance. And then your manifestation can flow into that so that the sense of abundance flows into the, whatever it is that you are wanting to manifest in your life, you have to combine action and whatever technique you use or whatever method you use with relation. It is to be recommended that you combine it with some kind of action so that you can generate abundance even on this outer level.

[Speaker 13] (9:34:22 - 9:35:46)
Many of us here, and I personally feel very lucky to be able to be here, but I work, and I come from a country which is in close proximity with a lot of chaos, death and destruction, man-made, and my line of work is to do with responding to that in a humanitarian sense. So the question about access, which is basically those who have experienced such immeasurable suffering, such immeasurable loss, who have lost everything that they ever knew or had and have actually found themselves displaced across the world, they say it's the largest displacement since World War II, who could never dream of attending such a place and how to make you more accessible to people who are going through such suffering to prevent this suffering from becoming a prolonged victim identity or a prolongation of suffering but a transformation through conscious to, well, I can hardly articulate, but I think maybe you understood.

[Speaker 1] (9:35:46 - 9:49:59)
Oh, yes, yes, thank you very much. Thank you, I understand. Thank you.

Thank you. Yes, so the, as we are, as you know, the, we are attempting to reach more people through the foundation to distribute teaching material to places where otherwise it would not get to. At the moment, we have not yet succeeded in bringing it to certain areas of the world where a lot of suffering and violence is happening, but we will attempt to do so.

But another question is how many people are actually ready for it? Because although it seems so obvious to everybody here, you might think, well, everybody must be ready for this, but the case is not everybody is ready. There will be people in those suffering countries who are ready and who have been made ready by their suffering.

Many are being made ready by their suffering. Everybody, I said it a few times, everybody in this world has a spiritual teacher. A few have an actual spiritual teacher that it might be a person or a teaching or a book.

It could be, you could be a Buddhist and you are, then the Buddhism is your teacher, or you could be a Christian and have access to the deeper dimension within the Christian teaching, then that's your teacher, or you could be a Muslim and have access to the deeper dimension that's there. My favorite, of course, being Sufism, but that's, those who have actual teachings or teachers and all the others that unfortunately their teacher is suffering. And the one tries to, you can, it's only those who are ready to go beyond suffering who are then open to the teaching.

The suffering is to a large extent self-produced by humans. That's the weird things. The humans produce their own suffering.

And it's, what is needed is a raising in the state of consciousness in certain areas of the world, but it's a refugee problem is something that is, I do not know how many of those humans who are, have been, they have been deprived of their home and all their usual surroundings. They no longer belong anywhere. They are, some of those will experience a spiritual awakening through their suffering.

Some will and others will not. And some may, if we are able to get the teaching to places like that, that may help. And perhaps you can give us some ideas too.

We might talk to you. And if you can give us some ideas of how to get it there, I think that would be extremely helpful. And I thank you for asking that question.

So let's try and see if we can do that. Now, as you probably know, one of the most challenging things in your life is other people, because they're so difficult. People are so challenging.

And for many people, one of their greatest sources of suffering or unhappiness, strangely enough, is other people. Sometimes, of course, it might be a situation, but just usually every situation is associated with certain people. But of course, another source of unhappiness, of course, could be your physical body, which might become ill.

That's a different matter. But yes, people are difficult. It's not surprising that Jean-Paul Sartre, the French philosopher, said, "'Hell is other people.'" That's the ego talking, of course. Life could be so much nicer with all these dreadful people around. And of course, these are judgments. These are judgments of the mind.

And the moment you encounter another human being, the moment you meet another human being, if you are trapped in the conditioned mind, you will very quickly have things to say about him or her. And the moment you have thought arising, you're imposing judgment, you can't really experience that human being anymore. And so that happens all the time when people meet others.

But what would it be if I could meet another human being and just look into his or her eyes without making it too obvious? Even in ordinary situations, you go to a restaurant, you go to a shop, you buy something, you pay for it. There's a brief interaction with the person you give the money to.

And in that, are you able to just look at this person for a few seconds while the transaction happens and be free of thinking? And there's suddenly a connection. There's no need to make it obvious.

You don't go like, and you don't have to tell them, I'm connecting with you on a spiritual level because they'll go, what? But it's a beautiful thing to be able to just be spacious with another human being. It's easier with a dog, obviously, because the dog does not have the screen of mind that obscures that sense of presence or beingness in the dog, the consciousness of the dog.

Humans usually have this screen of mental stuff. So it's not as easy to relate deeply. You have to penetrate the level of mind, which sometimes is not all that pleasant either.

It can be very difficult conditioning of this personality. Some personalities are very difficult and might be aggressive or whatever, but it's looking at another human being and just like this, no thought. And it's always pleasant.

It's a pleasant, suddenly you sense a connection and it's pleasant, but don't try that too soon. Start with a tree because there's nothing in the way with a tree. There's no mind.

The tree is an expression of consciousness, but the tree is very still. It's even stiller than the dog. The tree is just, it might have been there for 100 years, 200 years, 300 years.

Some trees have been there for 1,000 years. And so you can look at a tree, and by looking means, we'll do more of that after the break, but just when you look at something, you give it your attention, and there's a tree. And you give it your complete attention.

Just look at the totality of it, and then occasionally you look at little details and just be with it and the totality of the tree without needing to impose any thought on it. You don't need to call it anything. You don't need to know the name in order to experience the tree.

You don't need to know the name of the tree. That's fine. There's nothing wrong with knowing the name of the tree, but the name of the tree can, if you are too attached to the name of the tree, can prevent you from experiencing the tree, and that is a very common thing, how the moment you name something, you think that's it, and then you don't realize there is a depth to that which the name obscures.

The spiritual teacher Krishnamurti said to somebody, the moment you teach a child the name of the bird, he or she will never see that bird again. Slight exaggeration. Of course, he'll see that bird again, but what he means is the child will lose the deeper connectedness with the bird because the label, the mental label will be in the way, and the child will mistake the mental label for it, and so the mental label keeps you trapped on the surface of reality, and so very knowledgeable people, and there's nothing wrong with knowledge, but people, let's say people are very knowledgeable about nature sometimes are so trapped in their knowledge, all they know is mental stuff about things, so they know a lot about the tree, but they never know the tree. You have two kinds of knowing. One is conceptual knowing through labels, and one is a deeper knowing through immediate perception through awareness, and then you sense something deeper in the tree that can never be known through conceptual knowledge.

You connect with the tree in a deeper level, it becomes almost what I'm saying now. Conventionally, one would say that's just a mystical thing to say or it's a poetic thing to say, but there's a real, there's a reality behind this, and if that dimension is missing from your life, you run around the surface of reality, never connecting with anything or anybody really deeply, never sensing your connectedness with other life forms, nature, animals, humans, so it's important to develop this ability to experience without imposing labels, so you can just be with a tree and look at it.

You don't have to hug it, you can, but it's not necessary. If you will have to want to hug it, it's fine, because the touch can free you also from thinking to take your attention into the sense of touch, yes, but all the senses are involved in that experience, and then you, the trees can then teach you stillness, because the tree is so still, but you have to tune in. You can't tune in with mental labels.

You have to be there, and then there's an alertness there, and with that alertness, you not only perceive the tree, you sense the underlying consciousness of the tree, because ultimately, it's the same consciousness that is the essence of who you are, but in a different manifestation, a different frequency level, so to speak, but, and then the tree can teach you to be still, and you become, but it's not the same stillness in you as the stillness of the tree, because the tree is a long way below thought. The stillness in you is above thought, but in there, you meet the tree.

You are above thought in presence, and the tree is long below thought in beingness, and you meet the tree, and then the tree can teach you to be still, and you can actually sense that the tree is just, oh, that's the tree, the tree would be saying, oh, if it could speak, or continuously, because that's the rootedness of, the tree is not only rooted in the soil, the tree is rooted in being, and beingness, the source of life.

[Speaker 17] (9:49:59 - 9:50:00)
It hasn't.[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 1:19)
Come out that far yet. So it's, it just is. Your latest book, this Lost and Found.

This is a very interesting challenge that came into your life not that long ago. The challenge was mercifully provided by one of your, or perhaps your most important spiritual teacher whose name is Bhagavan Bernie Madoff. And you, he mercifully took away from you 30 years of savings, all their life's savings to help you experience the essence of who you are.

Yeah. However, you did not immediately experience the essence of who you are.

[Speaker 4] (1:20 - 1:22)
I'd say that was an understatement.

[Speaker 1] (1:22 - 1:53)
And you describe it in the book, how it starts, and that's wonderful, I believe it's chapter one or two, beginning the incredible amount of the reaction and the fear that comes when you lose all your life's savings and you describe what it did to your state of consciousness, wonderfully explained and illustrated. I don't know if you want to talk briefly about it. And then something happened.

[Speaker 4] (1:54 - 8:04)
Yes, for those of you, those few of you who might not know who Bernie Madoff is, he ran a Ponzi scheme and actually all over the world and ended up stealing $65 billion of people's money. And as my husband is very fond of saying when he tells his stories, and not all of it is mine. So we had our, we did have our life savings in there.

And we got a phone call, or I got a phone call one day. My husband was away. We believed it was very safe.

A friend of ours was friends with Bernie Madoff, whose father was friends with Bernie Madoff. And anybody could put, in our particular fund, anybody could put anywhere from $600 or $1,000 to whatever amount you had in this fund. And we just kept on putting all of our money in there because our friend had been in it for 30 years.

And also, as my husband says, that you start believing in gravity when every time you throw a ball up in the air, it comes down every time for 30 years. So we absolutely believed it was safe. And then it wasn't.

And then we got the phone call saying it was gone. And I was shocked and in terror, I think. First I was shocked and then hysterical.

And then in terror. And then I called a couple of very dear friends and teachers who I would say, we've lost all our money. And this was very soon after the phone call.

And two of them said to me, you've lost your money, but nothing of any value is gone. And I said in that moment to both of them, now is not the time to be spiritual. Farewell.

I was convinced, I was like, don't give me that. We've lost our money. What are we gonna do?

We're gonna be homeless. We're gonna be out on the street. And what are we gonna eat?

And it was such a panic. And I started very soon realizing that it was going to be unbearable to live inside my mind. That I could not, absolutely could not live inside the mind that was telling me, what did you do?

I can't believe you did that. What's the matter with you? How come you didn't diversify?

Even a four-year-old knows to diversify. And I started blaming, of course, everybody and then myself. And the ranting and the raving was so intense that I understood pretty immediately within a day that unless I brought myself back to what I had, not what I had lost, to what I could find instead of the money that I couldn't, what was already here, which is that animating aliveness or that indwelling aliveness that I've heard you speak of, unless I could bring myself back moment to moment to moment every single time my mind wandered, then I was gonna be lost.

I was going to be living in abject terror. When I wrote Lost and Found and when I traveled around and went on tour about it, I found that talking about money was very difficult, not for me at that point, because I became so interested in money after this that I would talk to people in the grocery store. So, what do you think about money?

And tell me about your relationship with money and how much money do you make? And do you and your spouse talk about? I just became fascinated with it like I became fascinated with food, as a point of departure, so to speak, or as a doorway into what we believe about scarcity and deprivation and what we're allowed to have and be.

And when I first started talking about food, which was in 1978, people didn't wanna talk to me except for those people who were willing to talk to me. With the rollers in my hair, they were willing to talk to me, but most people when I would say, it's not about willpower and it's not about force and deprivation, it's about using it as a doorway into who you are really there was a, no, it's about willpower and it's about calories. And with money, I found that I was almost had turned back the clock 30 years and so that it was a similar, no, I'm not talking about money, sort of like with me, there's spirituality and then there's money.

So I'm wondering what you think about that just in terms of why money is such a difficult subject really to bring, why people are more willing to talk about their sex lives and in great detail, mind you, and what they've eaten and not eaten and binged and not beaten and including things like stealing food and all of that rather than talk about money. So I'm curious about what you think about that.

[Speaker 1] (8:05 - 9:24)
Well, it is true that in for many people, the mention of it can bring about an immediate loss of awareness, even in people who otherwise have already embraced awareness in many aspects of their lives. And still there remains that there's a fear that coagulates around that money idea and that's the fear, I would say, of survival. Yeah.

And there is also an egoic trait that's one of the most essential traits of the ego, not enough. Not enough is one of the most deep seated ego traits. Every ego has that.

And for many people, the not enough refers to money. It could refer to many other things, not enough food, not enough whatever. The ego never feels it has enough.

And that's particularly manifests in the area of money because money is neutral, but it can become anything in the world of form almost. And so it triggers the insufficiency, the feeling of not enough of the ego.

[Speaker 4] (9:25 - 9:28)
Spirituality is fine. And then there's money.

[Speaker 1] (9:29 - 9:29)
Yes.

[Speaker 4] (9:29 - 11:44)
Yes. And also that awakening, so to speak, becoming fully alive to the aliveness was not possible for me in this lifetime. That's what I believed.

Yes. I believed I could work at, that I would always be sort of like a little busy beaver. I would be working at it and efforting at it and I would be meditating.

And even though I didn't really like meditating very much, I still wanted to be a good spiritual student. And so I'd keep on trying and trying, but that it wasn't, even though intellectually I heard, yes, of course, it's your true nature. I still believed, well, maybe it's not my true nature.

Maybe it's everybody else's true nature, but it's not true, true nature because it's not really mine. And I think it took this to experience that that aliveness, that indwelling aliveness is, if I'm not aware of it, it's just a bat of an eyelash away. And that it is possible for every human being.

I always feel like if it's possible for me, it's possible for anybody because I feel like I've just about been as crazy as any of the people I've met who have come to my retreats and workshops for 30 years. I mean, I've done it all. And so I feel like, okay then, all right then.

What Eckhart has been saying is true. It's not just a line. It doesn't just sound pretty.

It's true because here it is in this moment with no money, not a penny, here it is.

[Speaker 1] (11:45 - 24:27)
Yes, I experienced that on the park bench often. The intense happiness of simply the joy of being in that moment where the mind, if it had come in, and occasionally it did just briefly, it said, what are you doing? And shouldn't you be looking for some work or do something?

But the thought didn't have any force behind it anymore. So I don't know, it just didn't come. I could have remained that, in which case I would have become quite dysfunctional and still be happy.

But after a while, then doing happened again. I was able to do and initiate things and respond to whatever the present moment brought. And then I became a normal person again, at least on the surface, on the outside.

Oh yes, can you speak about how to be in this world with this constant push for connectivity? How did we get to the most profound things from a relatively simple question? Oh, yes, we talked about doing and being without feeling that being present is another thing to do.

How do you be in this world without this constant push for connectivity? Well, the first thing is you turn off your push notifications. That's already a big step forward.

And you need to be disciplined in the use of your device, your phone, whatever, tablets, phone, so that it doesn't take you over because it's simply an extension of your life. It's an extension of the mind. And if it wasn't enough before we invented these devices, humans had already been taken over by their minds.

Even 2000 years ago, not as much as now, but even 2000 years ago, Jesus said, why are you always thinking about tomorrow? Why are you always worried about the next thing? Look at the flower, look how it lives.

In total alignment with the present moment. And it's being sustained by the one consciousness. That's my translation of it.

So already then, humans had been taken over by mind, but even more so since then, mind has proliferated. And then the clever human mind came up with these devices. It said, let's extend ourselves into the realm of things.

And then we can create this, which is an extension of the human mind. So when you, you might have noticed when you're with yourself, you have the voice in the head, unless you begin to awaken, in which case you're able to experience spaces of alert, still presence. It's beautiful.

But otherwise you have this thing, commenting, talking, arguing. And then this becomes a burden for many people. Of course it is a burden because a lot of the stuff it says is actually not pleasant.

And so you experience it as a burden. And since you derive your sense of identity from it, it becomes yourself. This talking voice, you think that's you.

It becomes the self. And you walk around with this burden of the self. And in order to unburden yourself, one thing you can do, you think you can do, is you can watch the television or you can go on, there are countless things that you can watch on the little screen.

The entire world's knowledge at your fingertips. And the moment you watch the screen, whether it's television or whatever screen, you might have noticed that your own, your so-called own thought processes come to a stop. So to some extent, you're free of the self.

This is why people sometimes find watching television relaxing. Say, okay, I just need to relax now, just turn it on. By this they mean, while they watch the television screen, they are not burdened by their self-induced thought processes.

What they do, however, they replace their own thoughts with the collective thoughts. So they just, you're in a state, you're not in a state of thoughtless awareness when you watch television or you watch something on the screen. You absorb the thoughts from there into your mind and you link into, so for people often in a state of semi or hypnosis when they watch, it kind of paralyzes you.

It can also happen with the screen, with television already started, of course. I don't know when, whenever, 60 years ago, whenever television started and you go. And so your mind is just absorbing whatever is playing.

It's the TV mind, which is receiving stuff from wherever it comes from, is going into your mind and you become no longer thinking your own thoughts. Occasionally you might, you say, oh, this guy is so stupid. And then you're watching again.

And then another thought, why am I watching this rubbish? Half an hour later, this is so awful. But you can't turn it off.

Here's the remote. Let's just try one more channel. There might be something else there.

Oh no, that's stupid. Try one more. This is how an addict behaves.

And the device is even more addictive. You carry them with you and you have to admit, you may have to admit that there is an addiction in you. Not everybody here, but quite a few.

It would be almost normal to feel this draw towards it and you use it even when you don't need to use it. That's the amazing thing. When you're standing at the elevator waiting, so another person is standing next to you and he or she is pulling out the phone and then you pull out yours.

You don't know why. You don't know why. Or anywhere you're in a, you're waiting, you're ordering a tea or coffee somewhere and you're standing in line.

And if you look around, there's almost nobody and probably nobody who is not looking at this little thing. This is scary, zombie-like. Now, if somebody from the past, the so-called past, time traveler from the past came here and even not the distant past, let's just say even 20 years ago, and he arrived and would see in the streets, in restaurants, in cafes, everywhere, public transport, people walk around with these things, staring at these things.

Say, what's that? Something has happened to humanity. They've all become zombies.

Something terrible must have happened. What was that? These are wonderful devices, the incredible possibilities of having access to all kinds of knowledge, but there's always the downside.

There's a huge, huge downside to it. They are addictive. They stimulate the mind.

The thing you want to become free from, you want to become free of mind, and this will prevent you from becoming free of mind. So you need to be disciplined enough to not automatically look at it whenever there's a moment and you're waiting for something or whatever it is. There's no need to check these things.

I don't even know what they are, but I just know that Facebook is the biggest thing, and then there's Instagram and Snapchat and countless names, and some people have all of them on their phones, and you need to know the latest thing. Crazy. But if you detect the addiction in yourself, then you have to, first of all, admit that you are addicted.

Don't deny it. You know, Alcoholics Anonymous, the first thing when you go there, you have to say, I am an alcoholic. Now, some people say, well, that's not a good thing because your identity is not being an alcoholic.

Of course not. So it could be misunderstood, but your nature is not being an alcoholic. It is your present condition is that, but to recognize the problem, the difficulty, the challenge is just you stated, yes, I'm addicted to this phone, and I choose not to be addicted, and then you can be the only one in many places who is not looking in waiting rooms, waiting in line, whatever it is, waiting on the phone for somebody to talk to you, and in the meantime, but you use this beautiful thing of just being, just being present, and you look around and you step out of thinking, and all the others are still in the hypnotic state. So practice not to use it unless there is a true purpose. If you want the answer to something in a conversation, there's a what is what, then you can get the knowledge.

You have the world's encyclopedia there, then you can look it up. Okay, that's how it is. And then you put it away again.

There are some apps that are meditation apps. I want to check them out a bit more. I have a few on my phone, but I haven't tried them yet.

They've been there for a year or two. And that would be something great. It transformed something that otherwise would amplify your mind.

It transforms it into its opposite.

[Speaker 6] (24:54 - 25:03)
Do you believe in the law of attraction and manifestation? Where is this coming from?

[Speaker 3] (25:07 - 27:24)
Do I believe in the law of attraction and manifestation? I want to say yes, and I want to say no, because on the no level, it is the mind can want something, and you can also get it, but it's not coming from your true self. So there is a law that our thoughts can be projected and then manifested.

Yes, I do see that, and that's not a belief. It's actual, I see that. There are many things that I have wanted in my life and in growing up that I have received because I wanted it so badly.

But going through that, some of those things, I saw that they weren't such good experiences. So we can attract something through the mind, and it won't be really what our heart, our consciousness really desires and wants. And usually that consciousness that really desires and wants is not a selfish desire, but is a desire that would be not of and for ourself.

And then in that sense, that manifestation is a sacred manifestation. It's a holy manifestation. Have you ever heard of the saying, be careful what you wish for?

[Speaker 6] (27:27 - 27:30)

I think I know what it means, but I've not really like heard it.

[Speaker 3] (27:31 - 27:33)
Okay, so what do you think it means?

[Speaker 6] (27:34 - 27:35)
Can you say it again?

[Speaker 3] (27:38 - 27:39)
Be careful what you wish for.

[Speaker 6] (27:41 - 27:46)
To be exact of what you want, or I'm not sure.

[Speaker 3] (27:47 - 28:13)
Okay, so the saying, be careful what you wish for means that you could want something. I'm just trying to find an example that you could maybe relate to. I want 10 chocolate ice creams.

Oh boy, I really want that.

[Speaker 10] (28:13 - 28:14)
So do I.

[Speaker 3] (28:15 - 30:36)
Okay, so it was a good one. Must have been channeling you. So I want 10 chocolate ice creams, and I get 10 chocolate ice creams.

So I'm eating 10 chocolate ice creams, and then suddenly I get sick and I throw up. So it means sometimes our mind, we think we might want something, and then we can get it, so we can manifest it, but then it's not really good for us. However, if you were really connected to the being instead of the desire of what the mind and maybe the ego desires, then you might have said, oh, I'll have one chocolate ice cream.

And you may eat the whole chocolate ice cream, that one, or you might just have three bites and say, that's enough. I don't want any more, because you've been fulfilled. Manifesting from consciousness rather than from the mind is completely different, and the experience will be completely different.

Your will is completely different, because it is no longer, when you're manifesting from consciousness, it's not your will, but thy will. Thy will be done. You know that saying from the Bible, thy will be done?

So it means it's God, it's consciousness, it's Christ, it's the Buddha, your Buddha nature that is wanting this. And it's not even so much of a want, because it won't be a want in the same way. There may be a want because we are a human being, so just example of that ice cream, if you're from consciousness and we have a human being, so we have these little human cravings, chocolate ice cream, but it won't be 10, it'll be one or a half or just a bite.

So does that help you?

[Speaker 6] (30:37 - 30:37)
Yes.

[Speaker 3] (30:37 - 30:39)
What do you wanna manifest, by the way?

[Speaker 6] (30:39 - 30:53)
Well, I play tennis, and I have a vision board, and I even make little trophies made from paper, just using staplers and crayons.

[Speaker 3] (30:54 - 35:31)
So you wanna become a tennis pro? Yes. Ah, well, you know, that's not a bad thing to wanna manifest.

I mean, this is something that, a desire that you have. So I would say go for it, you know? Just don't think that when you get it, it's going to make you completely happy.

You'll receive and get some happiness from it, especially say if you win, you go, ah, yeah, right, I won. But life is about challenges, and it's about learning, so there'll be times that maybe you won't win, and you'll have to learn from that. So when you do your vision board, it's best when you make these vision boards that you also leave it open to the universe.

Okay, I'll give you an example. When I was kind of through the different men, I decided to make a list of what I wanted in a man, and I actually got it, and I got Eckhart. But, you know, what we try to manifest and what we try to think we want is never complete, because I forgot to put, I want somebody who cooks.

I'm serious. I mean, after, when you're in a relationship, you're thinking, if you don't wanna do all the cooking yourself, at least I didn't, and I want, you know, I didn't put down I wanted a man to clean. I listed other aspects, which I got.

So we're always, on a human level, going to forget something. So this is what I mean by, it won't quite make you completely happy, but you can receive and get happiness from it. Just, you know, leave it also open to the universe.

When we make goals, it's okay to make a goal, but then leave it open, because maybe life knows better than we do. Hmm. So we make a goal, but we kind of just leave it open-ended.

Many years ago, as Eckhart was growing in his talks, there was an organizer, and he said to me, he rented a, I can't remember, I think it was like a 2,000 venue size that held 2,000 people. And I was talking to him on the phone, and he said, I'd be happy if I got 1,000 people. I didn't say anything, but I thought, well, why did he rent a 2,000 venue if he'd be happy with 1,000?

I didn't say anything. I just went, oh, okay. Anyways, we got 1,000 people.

He got his 1,000 people. But what would happen if he said, I'd like to fill this venue, but then just leave it, leave it to the universe, whether it filled or whether it didn't fill. It didn't matter.

It's the universe that is in action when we want the will of the universe. Have that. Make that your primary focus.

So you can have this wish and desire to be a pro tennis player. It's wonderful. I used to love tennis myself.

So that's wonderful, and you make that vision board. But then, in your own mind's eye, also leave it open. Leave yourself open.

And just say, you know, I want this, but I'm also okay with having more, and I'm also okay with having less. I want the will of what's best for me as consciousness. Coming through this form, this body, this mind.

Because maybe there's something even greater for you. And we just don't, you just don't know that yet. We can't foresee that.

So you just make those goals, but leave it open to the will of God. And that God is you. It's within you.

[Speaker 6] (35:33 - 35:36)
Thank you. Did that help you? Yes.

Okay.

[Speaker 1] (36:01 - 43:42)
This table doesn't mean anything. This flower doesn't mean anything. This room doesn't mean anything.

What does all that mean? Well, let's see, cause and miracles. And the purpose of the cause and miracles Miracles is to bring you to a place where the words are not needed anymore.

It meets you, or not you personally, but the human being. It meets the human being where the human being is in the realm of thought. The Course in Miracles would say that otherwise there's no meeting at all.

It has to first of all meet the human being where it can be reached, and that is in the realm of thought. In the same way that a psychiatrist, in order to reach a deluded patient, there's no point in the psychiatrist telling the patient, I am telling you, you are not Napoleon. That will only strengthen the delusion of the patient that he is Napoleon.

He will never reach the patient. But if the psychiatrist for a little while enters the mind of the patient and says, okay, so you are Napoleon, suddenly there's a meeting. Once they have met, because the psychiatrist has entered the delusional system of the patient, once they have met, there's a possibility for him to take him out of the delusion.

If they never meet, nothing can be done. In the same way, the Course in Miracles is attempting to reach people where they are in the realm of thought, and gradually take you out of thought. But throughout the Course, thought is still used, but more and more in the later lessons, it points to the stillness.

And towards the end, the final lessons, it says, the use for words is almost over now, towards the end of the Course in Miracles. So it takes you, it's designed to take you into presence or stillness. So if you can enter presence or stillness right now, or wherever you are, if you already have presence and stillness, spacious awareness in the background of your life when you deal with people and situations, you don't need the Course in Miracles.

If you can enter stillness when you're not being disturbed, but as soon as you interact with people, you lose presence, awareness, or stillness, then the Course in Miracles may still be useful, because it has certain lessons that can be used as pointers. For example, one lesson, I remember, it says, in a situation where you feel upset or angry or irritated, it says, you can say, I could see peace instead of this. I could see peace instead of this.

It's a pointer. The words don't miraculously produce peace, but the words are pointing to the possibility of approaching that situation in a different state of consciousness. So really, the words are pointing to a different state of consciousness.

It's not in the words, it's that to which the words point. And as the Buddhists tell us correctly, the finger pointing to the moon is not the moon. Only the dog might think that the finger pointing to the moon is the moon, because if you tell the dog, go there, most dogs will look at your finger.

So it's not the...the words are pointers. And particularly useful, Course in Miracles, for human interaction, it really uses relationships as spiritual practice, and that's a good thing. So many lessons can be applied to relationships, and you need it, or if the course is right for you, it's definitely not for everybody, but it might be useful for some people who still find that they have a lot of conflict with other people, and a lot of upset with other people.

So you can bring the lesson into relationships. If you don't have that anymore, of course you don't need the Course in Miracles. And even if you...if you understood deeply, or could practice deeply, just Lesson 1 of the Course, it has 365 lessons, just do Lesson 1, nothing that I see here means anything. That's what the lesson tells you. So, this table doesn't mean anything, this flower doesn't mean anything, this room doesn't mean anything, what does all that mean? It means you're giving up all your interpretations and judgments, you're approaching, you're cleaning the blackboard of your mind, erasing all the scribbles on it, or let's say, or let's call it deleting all the noise on the tape, no they don't have tapes anymore, they delete all the digital signals, whatever they have in your mind, nothing that I see here means anything, takes you to a place of not knowing anymore, and what's left when nothing means anything? You're not thinking anymore.

Now, if you deeply, could do deeply Lesson 1, you don't need anything else, because it would stop your mind from its useless interpreting and judging and so on. So in your own life, if you feel, have you already practiced the Course in Miracles lesson? If you still find difficulties in relationships with other people, you can still use it, then it can take you, it can eliminate, help you to become more conscious there.

In the end, it takes you to the essence of this teaching, which is awareness, pure awareness or stillness, and that's the end of, and also by the way, the Course says, this Course is the beginning, not the end. So it takes you to that place where you open yourself up to awareness, which can then flower through you. If it's for you, it's definitely not for everybody.

[Speaker 8] (43:43 - 43:50)
I use these sentences when I feel I'm getting angry now, so I say some sentence and push it down.

[Speaker 1] (43:51 - 44:37)
Yes, but don't push it down, don't push it down, just, you can say the sentence and then allow it to dissolve, if that's what it wants, because if you get upset or angry and try to hold it down, it'll build up. Don't hold it down, just allow it to dissolve, different approach, never attack an inner state, never attack any emotion that arises, because it creates resistance again. Allow it to be, and then if it's not resisted, it dissolves, lovely practice.

Now you asked something else about prayer, the Indian man behind you.

[Speaker 8] (44:38 - 44:45)
And in general, prayers, is this talking to me, or how do you explain prayers?

[Speaker 1] (44:52 - 54:38)
That's a huge topic, of course, prayer, in the way this, he uses prayer as a kind of repetition, a kind of mantra perhaps. The good thing about it, of course, is that it stops your mind from doing other things, like indulging in fear-producing thoughts, or negativity-producing thoughts, so it stops your mind from that, but ultimately, that kind of thing, for us, for anybody, has to be left behind. When Jesus said, pray unceasingly, or pray without ceasing, that does not mean, because it would be absurd, that he's telling you to continuously pray, pray without, he's using prayer in a very different sense, but it's possible that people who wrote down what he said misunderstood, because they didn't realize the truth in themselves.

Jesus teaches presence, teaches, points continuously to the present moment, the importance of the present moment, and the importance of staying awake. There are parables about going to sleep, not going to sleep, but staying awake. Jesus says, the truth will make you free, which implies that right the way you are, you are not free, because you are run by the conditioning of your mind.

So, all the basic teaching is there, you just have to see it. Repetitive prayer, if you need it, that's what you will practice. And a time will come when it's no longer right for you.

Any meditation method can be helpful, let's talk about meditation, you have a method, some people count while they meditate, from one to nine, from nine to one, from one to six, from six to one, they count their breaths, or they do this or that, have a mantra that they repeat in their minds, which keeps out other kinds of thinking. Now the purpose of a mantra is not to be stuck with a mantra, but to eventually let go of the mantra. The mantra reduces all thinking to just one thought movement, so you can focus on that, and then it's meant to be dropped.

When you drop the one thought that was left, first your mind was full of all kinds of thoughts, then the guru comes and says, I will give you a mantra, you repeat every day 500 times, and if you do that, it brings your mind to a one-pointedness. Some people then get attached to the mantra, my mantra, no, then you are meant to, at some point, the guru will point out, it's time for you to let go, because what is left when all your thoughts have flown into one thought form, and then that one thought form is dropped, just awareness is left. So it can be, take you there, if you don't get stuck on the way.

If you get stuck on the way, then you're stuck until you suffer a bit more again. So let's leave it at that. It's knowing when to let go of something that is helpful for a while, like a ladder, you climb up a ladder, and then you don't need it anymore.

Or the Buddha has a famous example of a raft you use to cross a river. The raft in the Buddha's, when the Buddha uses the parable of the raft, he's talking about the teaching, Buddhist teaching and Buddhist practice. So you use the raft to cross the river.

When you have crossed the river, you don't carry the raft around with you, it's heavy, that there's the point where you let go of the raft, and there's complete freedom then. Whether you still call that Buddhism, or whether you still call yourself a Buddhist, it's up to you. But suddenly, there's freedom.

That something is helpful for a while until it's a hindrance, any kind of practice. And in the end, there's just awareness, presence, consciousness. And some gurus teach that directly.

They don't give you, they hardly give you any technique. And that's for certain people who are ready for that, that's fine. So it's what you feel drawn to is what is right for you.

And then know when it's time to let go. So on the level of doing or becoming, there are certain things still perhaps that you want to achieve. There are maybe certain things that you want to become.

You might be at right now, you might be engaged in learning this or that. Music or some whatever, some science, some skills, whatever it is, dance, engineering, astronomy, astrology. You can't immediately be a master at that.

That involves becoming, and it involves doing. So you're not complete on the level of becoming yet. And that level of doing and becoming is one part of life.

The emphasis in this teaching is not on becoming, not because I reject becoming, but because what the world needs more at this time, because the balance is totally lost, what the world needs more is the awareness of being, the being awareness, so that a balance can happen in the world, whereas most of the world is lost in becoming and doing. Go to any big city, and they're all running around. And they're all becoming.

Now it might be for a few years, it might be exhilarating, but then the frustration sets in and your body begins to suffer and become ill. We are constantly achieve the next thing. Part of becoming is what I often describe as always the next thing, never this.

This is never fully acknowledged because the full acknowledgement of the present moment belongs to the being realm. So a person who is constantly engaged in becoming can never fully acknowledge the present moment, because he or she is always running away from the present moment. And there is, of course, there needs to be the balance between, yes, you're going somewhere, you have a life goal, or either a huge life goal or a limited life goal, like you want to learn this or that subject.

You have that life goal, but as you pursue that goal, whatever it is, are you losing continuously the present moment? So you're no longer, you're never comfortable with the is-ness of the present moment. You never see the, except perhaps for brief glances, you never see the beauty around you and the aliveness.

There's never a full appreciation of the miraculous nature of life that is always around you. That's because you're too absorbed in becoming.

[Speaker 2] (55:47 - 1:16:23)
Let's come into the present moment, accept what is, whether it's sunny or bright or dark, it is what it is. And entering the meditative state, which is a state of presence, all you have to do, and it's not even doing, is to become aware of yourself. Now there are different levels to that awareness.

So what does it mean, becoming aware of yourself, and what are the levels? Of awareness? Well, first you're aware of your body, the external body, that's yourself, one level of yourself.

And then you notice you may already have an opinion about your body. Like it or dislike it. And that's already the next level of awareness, which is awareness of your thoughts.

So you have certain thoughts that tell you something about your body. So there's already interpretation, which is in the mind. And that level of thought very often complicates what essentially is very simple out here in external reality.

It interprets, it objects, it likes and dislikes, it says, I want, I should, you should, you should not have, I should not have. And many other things. An entire sense of identity builds up around your thought patterns.

Habitual thoughts, reactions, and so on. Leading to another level of awareness, which is the emotional level, which is linked to the level of thinking. There's an enormous difference, whether you're aware of your thoughts and emotions, or whether the thoughts and emotions just appear and take you over so completely.

And that's all there is of you. So to become self-aware, first of all, means to become aware of, yes, your self as the physical body, of yourself as habitual, or whatever, thinking, emotions. And that's already a great game, to become aware of those things, rather than to completely be those things.

And then at the deepest level, you are aware of your own awareness. You're aware of yourself as a presence with no particular form. And that really is the essence of meditation.

You can be aware of yourself as I speak, and as you listen. Be aware of yourself as the presence that makes the visual and auditory perception possible. There's a presence there.

You may be dreaming up this very thing. And yet, even if you're dreaming right now, what's happening right now, there is still, there has to be a consciousness, a presence, in which the dream, in the light of which the dream appears. It doesn't really make any difference whether it's all a dream, or whether it's all real, or something in between.

What matters is that you are aware of the essence of yourself. Otherwise, you mistake many things that are not the essence of yourself, which is who you really are. You mistake those things for who you are.

And then you're totally in the grip of whatever arises in your mind, in your mental and emotional field. Because that's what ego means, to be totally in the grip, totally identified with whatever arises in your mental and emotional field. That's the ego, a misperception of who you are that needs to defend itself, and enhance itself, and protect itself continuously.

Reaffirm its identity through continuous thinking, very often, despite, you know, very often, unpleasant and negative. And yet, you're stuck with it, defending your mental positions all the time, fighting for your life, your psychological survival, survival of your ego entity, which is made out of thought, and just being wrong in an argument, it's a terrible defeat. It's an injury to your sense of self.

So, living like that, you can call unconscious, not knowing who you are. You could even say it's being deluded. And it leads to an enormous amount of problems that are generated by the egoic entity.

An enormous amount of misery, of unhappiness, drama. It's all unnecessary. Life is challenging enough as it is, without adding all that unnecessary reactivity to it.

Every challenge that life presents you with, and it does that, you get challenged through situations, and through people. You get challenged the moment you are born. And not only humans, every life form gets challenged.

And survival of the physical form is always precarious. But you amplify the life challenges enormously through unconscious thinking and reactivity. A small challenge becomes a huge one.

And it creates additional, your, the way in which you respond or react to a situation, determines subsequent events. So, if you amplify through your reactivity, you amplify a challenge that leads to further challenges. So, one small thing can then grow and proliferate into something big.

So, your degree of awareness, you can easily measure it, get a sense of where you are at, by becoming aware how you react to everyday situations. Especially challenging ones. Small challenges, mostly small challenges, occasionally a big one.

Small challenges mean challenge. It means something doesn't go the way you would have expected or wanted it to go. Somebody doesn't do what you expected him or her to do or say, expected, should have said, omitted this or that.

You're waiting too long on the phone, trying to talk to your bank. All little challenges. People are not, people who are supposed to do work for you, don't do it the way they should be doing it.

They're unreliable. Hundreds of little things continuously arise. So, the question is, can you deal with a situation in a way that is free of reactivity, so you remain peaceful and can still deal with it.

If there's something to do, something, there's nothing to do, just isn't, nothing you can do about it. Any reactivity or complaining mentally or out loud is unnecessary baggage that you carry around. So, as you know, continuously, but people don't do or say what you're supposed, they're supposed to do and say, according to your mind.

And then the complaining starts in your mind. And then it goes, might become verbal complaining. All that is unconscious living.

Awareness becomes obscured. The moment you get challenged, that can happen to people who are meditators, to meditate for half an hour a day or whatever. And yet, the moment you get challenged by life, awareness is completely obscured.

So, the question is, in daily life, not just here, but this is a kind of training ground for daily life, where do you sense your identity, who you are, where do you sense that? Do you sense that on the level of thinking and opinions, likes and dislikes, and memories and expectations, as most egos do? Or do you sense a deeper identity, a deeper sense of who you are, deeper than anything that arises in the field of thought, a presence.

That presence is not threatened by all those things that the ego cell is threatened by. So, the practice, the spiritual practice is really a continuous one. And the greatest practice is daily life.

The greatest spiritual practice is not when you sit in meditation. One could almost say it's a preparation for the spiritual practice.

[Speaker 1] (1:16:50 - 1:56:43)
Okay, I have so much to deal with here. I need to do that first, and then I can, when my plate is empty, because you have so much on your plate now, as the expression goes, and of course, the plate is never empty. Before they came up with all the digital devices, there was only the human, the busy mind.

So, creating one thought after another, keeping you trapped in content, the content of the mind, so that your entire life was content-based, no spaciousness. Of course, there was already television, has been around for a long time. And when I talked to Arianna Huffington last week, she said what she used to do for many years, the moment she opened her door, the door to her apartment, she would turn on the TV news.

So, come in the door, news. So, that's one way of filling up your mind continuously, avoiding any moment of stillness, presence. And now, of course, the television has been around for a while, radio.

And then came all the devices that we have now, that can amplify the tendency of the human mind to live exclusively in the realm of content. So, you get continuous input of stuff, in other words, for content, so that you get the input from your emails and text messages, each one very, very important. And I'm sure much more important than this talk, according to the mind, more pressing than a talk about waking up.

All the mind is, I can do both things. I can do, I have developed the ability to text and email, and at the same time, I know exactly what you're talking about. I could repeat, if you ask me afterwards, although I have been texting, I could repeat to you what you've been talking about.

And this may be true. Maybe you could repeat what I was talking about, and on that level, you took it in, but you would have missed a much more important level, which is not the words, but an energy field that comes with the words. It is behind the words and in between the words.

That's really it. And so you, unfortunately, you would miss that. So, you would take only in the teaching on the level of stuff, because the words are also stuff, but it's a particular kind of stuff that points beyond stuff, not self-serving stuff.

But if you only take it in as stuff, then it's just more stuff, interesting perhaps, or not that interesting. I've heard that before. So, I might as well send another email.

And you wrote that in your book, didn't you? The now is very important. I read that years ago.

What else can you tell us? So, I have plenty of time for more text messages, because I've heard all that before. Okay.

So, that's one level of being here or not being here. So, you would miss the more important dimension, because the words are secondary. And all the words really point to is a particular inner state.

So, while you listen, if it works for you, that inner state of spaciousness arises. But you have to be really there with your attention, because it is the state of that spaciousness is the attention. It is the alert presence.

So, as you sit here, the alert presence needs to be there. This cannot be there if you are texting, then you're only taking in the words, the information. So, the most essential thing here is the alert presence.

So, all the words point to the alert presence. Sometimes the words point to obstacles that may arise to prevent you from being in the alert presence, so that when they arise, you recognize them. That's fine.

But the very essence of being here is a deepening of that state of consciousness. And the mind, the egoic mind can very easily convince you that it has more important things to think about than presence. I've got so much on my plate.

Interesting expression. I've got so much on my plate. I can't deal with all this now, present.

Maybe when I've sorted out all the stuff that's going on when my plate is empty, then I can deal with it. It's a very common mind pattern. Jesus already talked about it.

He had these stories of a man who was invited to a wedding feast and he comes up with excuses why he can't go to the wedding feast. And always what he says, or different people are invited and different people are asked and each person has a different excuse. And the excuse always starts with the words, it's in the gospels.

The excuse always starts with the words, let me first, I have to sell my cows and my oxen. Let me first sell my cows. Let me first, even one second, let me first bury my father.

But there's always, let me first do this before I can do, before I can accept your invitation. The mind always can set, okay, yeah, but let me first, and that is the mind pattern, which says, okay, I have so much to deal with here. I need to do that first.

And then I can, when my plate is empty, because you have so much on your plate now, as the expression goes. And of course, the plate is never empty. As you might have found, life gives you one thing after another.

In that sense, the plate is never empty, but the emptiness can only be accessed within, in the present moment. As long as you get hypnotized by the excuses of the mind, then you can never access that dimension. So quite amazing how the gadgets can amplify the tendency of the human mind to be continuously trapped in stuff.

So before it was just, well, before radio and television, you just, you just had your mind and you could talk to other people. And then came the beginning of devices. And now the digital devices, of course, you get bombarded.

Most of humans, especially younger generation, some of the older generation too, get continuously bombarded with things that require your immediate attention. With, it comes through your phone, your smartphone in the form of, well, phone calls, but even more frequently, probably text messages, bing, bing, bong, bing. And they come in all the time and immediately go, and then it requires a reply.

And then emails, they can come in through all kinds of devices too. And then the latest postings on Facebook, your friends, very important, what they're doing right now. You need to know that.

And they need to know what you are doing right now. It's so important. Oh, and Twitter.

Tweets coming in all the time from all kinds of people. And if you're connected to these people, the youngsters get famous pop stars, you get their tweets, continuously things coming in. Or Justin Bieber is tweeting me, he says, the little girl, the girl, oh, wow.

And that's becomes a continuously filled with, there's never a moment of spaciousness because these devices amplify the tendency of the human mind to be reborn. The tendency of consciousness, one could say, to continuously be reborn into some new mental formation. And then sleep, people sleep at night.

I hear with many sleep, even with their phone on the pillow next to them or right next to the bed. And I read that when people wake up in the night or the last thing before they go to sleep, they're still sending emails and receiving emails. And, but there's a little bit, there is some hope on the horizon.

I was told I was, when I was at the conference last week in Wisdom Conference, where there are many people attending who are, who work for these companies that engaged in digital producing or digital devices. I don't know how it all functions, but, and we were told that some companies now each, for example, even in Germany, WVW, motor cars, Volkswagen, they give you company phones, which are programmed to turn off at 6 p.m. and to turn on again at 8 a.m. That's a wonderful, that's progress. That means there's some awareness here that the continuous engagement with these devices can be very harmful.

And even companies are discovering that these things can be very harmful. So our alertness really needs to be there and some discipline so that we do not become the slaves of our gadgets. There are wonderful possibilities that are opening up through these.

They're neither good nor bad in themselves. They're wonderful possibilities of connecting with people on a certain level. It's not necessarily the real connection, but on a certain level, and consciousness, news are no longer the exclusive, no longer can just big corporations disseminate news, which used to be the case.

Anybody can now disseminate news, which is good and bad. It can be a wonderful thing. You can reach, if you have something important to say, you can put it on the net.

It could go, as the expression goes, viral. And a few days later, millions of people, you've reached millions of people. It can happen.

Now, in many cases, those things may not be very helpful that go viral. Often things that are particularly unhelpful for awakening go viral, but it could be something helpful. So we need to be very careful when we use these, have some discipline also, especially at night, so that we don't get this continuous input of stuff.

Welcome to our meditation. An interesting question to ask yourself, and you can find out the answer right now, is whether you're able to stop thinking for a few seconds or so, or whether it's impossible to find any gap in the stream of thinking. And you don't stop thinking by exercising willpower that would not be helpful.

For example, holding your breath, I don't recommend that because you, yes, you could stop thinking by holding your breath and getting very tense. And then you're feeling you're holding thought at bay like this. But the moment you start breathing again, thought will rush back in even more strongly than before.

So it's holding your breath I don't recommend. But if you're not able to just stop thinking, not that many people can do that, you may want to use something to help you to not think. And that is, for example, not holding your breath, but being aware that you're breathing, observing that you're breathing, observing the in-breath, feeling it, sensing it, and the out-breath.

And even being aware of a short gap at the end of each in and out-breath. You breathe in, hold for two seconds or so, but don't even have to do that. And out.

And there's a cessation at the end of the out-breath, a natural cessation. And then you breathe in again, and you continue to be aware of your breathing. And when you do that, you're not thinking.

That's why breath awareness is an ancient meditation method. It's also very pleasant. And then after a while, you may notice there's a sense of aliveness behind the breath, so to speak.

So if you're looking for a very simple meditation technique, observing your breath is a good one, just as inner body awareness that I've written and spoken about. They are related. If you're observing your breath, you're also becoming aware of the energy field inside your body.

It's all very pleasant, very simple, peaceful. Sometimes thinking may come back in, and if that happens, you just return your attention to your breathing. And in daily life, when you want a moment of no thought, which is extremely important to get into the habit of cultivating the state of not thinking, when you don't actually need to think, so that when you do need to think, your thinking is actually more effective, more powerful, more intelligent.

When you are connected with a deeper realm of not thinking, which is the unconditioned consciousness. So in daily life, you cultivate as much as possible, just finding brief moments of no thought throughout your daily life. You could associate it with the breath.

I call it, the briefest one is one conscious breath, as I call it, which is you breathe in, you breathe out, and while you breathe in and out, just one in breath, one out breath. And while you do that, you're just very much aware of the air flowing into the body, the air flowing out of the body. Conscious, one conscious breath, means you're not thinking during that brief moment.

And that's very significant. When you're not thinking without losing consciousness, in fact, being more alert than when you are thinking, that is finding a new dimension of consciousness within yourself. We're entering the now with our attention.

That's all there ever is. You might as well be there fully, because that's your life. Don't fall into the trap that some spiritual seekers have fallen into, who are telling themselves, if I only had a life that's more undisturbed, that I could really practice being present and practice meditation, preferably in a lovely climate, so that I'm not disturbed by unfavorable weather.

So it's, let's tell you, the tropics, there's a warm breeze, then I could really practice and become present. And especially if I get massages every day. Oh, and the purest of foods, cooked for me, or not cooked, better not cooked.

Then I could really, but life, why doesn't life give me an opportunity to, well, if you have it, it's good to be on a retreat, it's a wonderful thing. But to always look for some situation that's ideal for your spiritual practice, no. What works much better is to say this moment is ideal for my spiritual practice.

And my spiritual practice, whatever it is that I'm facing at this moment, what is the state of consciousness that I'm bringing to this moment, which ultimately is all that ever is. There is nothing else other than your experience of this moment. There never has been anything else.

Isn't that weird? And there never will be anything else. People think the future is incredibly important, and of course, on a practical level, it has its place.

You can't do without it. But on a deeper level, the future, of course, you might have noticed, you have never yet experienced the future, but you've thought about it a lot, for years, thinking about the future, but never arrived. You cannot arrive at the future because ultimately, on a deeper level, because it doesn't exist.

Is that true? Let me think. Well, that's easy.

If the future existed, you could have experienced it. When it comes, it's the present. The past, nothing happened.

I said in The Power of Now, nothing ever happened in the past. It happened in the now. And when you remember the past, you remember it now.

There is only now. Now, The Power of Now came out for the first time 20 years ago. How is that?

Well, that was the now. Paradoxical. But in your time is something so weird.

On one level, it's everywhere. It's all consuming. It ultimately eats you up.

It burns you up. The fire of time burns you up. The body burns you up.

If you haven't noticed it already, you will in a few years. One morning, you look in the mirror. You say, what's this?

Who's this? And then you remember the apple you left on the windowsill three weeks ago. That's what happened to the apple in three weeks.

Happens to you in 30 years. Oh, shrink. Time does that to you.

Everything is consumed by time. Everything is consumed by time, Jesus calls it, where moth and rust consume. Now, he uses that as an analogy for time.

Rust, even the hardest of substances, metal, is ultimately consumed by rust. Moths, they eat up your clothes. But really, it means time is eating up everything in this material universe is being eaten up by time.

So it's everywhere. Time is, you can't get away from it. And yet, you have never experienced time.

You can only experience this moment, but you can think about time. So future exists as a thought in your head. The past exists as a thought in your head.

So future and past are necessary in order to cope with life in this dimension, undoubtedly. We could not have met here without future, where it said, at such and such a time, on such and such a day, Eckhart is going to talk here. It would have been difficult to say, one day in the now, Eckhart is going to talk in Calgary.

Let's hope you'll be there. So you need time on the practical level also. But losing yourself on that level is losing yourself on the level of the mind, the thinking mind.

To be able to use time doesn't matter that you have to be used by time. And so the transcendent dimension of consciousness that I started with when I talked is encountered when you enter the now with your attention. And okay, the now means now.

So as I'm speaking, we're entering the now with our attention. That's all there ever is. You might as well be there fully, because that's your life.

So you might as well. And here we are in this moment. You are perceiving visually, you're perceiving auditory perception, visual perception, perhaps other senses involved.

And you're perceiving the totality of this room. When this is the beginning of becoming more conscious of the present moment is to come to your senses. In order to come to your senses, you have to take some attention away from this stream of thinking.

A lot of that is useless anyway. You have to take some attention away from the stream of, you cannot be totally absorbed in your mind, as many people are throughout the day. They go through their day like sleepwalking.

They are so absorbed in their minds, which means they are not present. And they go through like, when you look at them, you can see they're not there. They might see a vague outline of you.

Or when they talk to you, they talk through the screen of their, what they think of you in the mind. So to come to your senses, take attention away from, you have to take attention away from thinking. You then become more aware of your surroundings, visual, auditory.

You might breathe, scent might be in the air or feel the breeze on your skin, this tactile, but the predominant senses are listening, hearing, and seeing. And that already takes you out of your, the trap of your mind. And then there is a moment right now when you are aware of your surroundings, or one single, sometimes it's a single thing, like a flower, the table, your hand, or it's the totality of your surroundings at any given time.

You're aware of your surroundings, and you might notice when you come to your senses, there's a momentary cessation of mental noise, which means thinking. There's a momentary cessation. It could just be for a few seconds at first.

For a moment, you are aware, you're perceiving, you're aware, but you're not thinking. You're not labeling your perceptions. That's an amazing way, an amazing shift in consciousness.

Another way of putting it is you become still, and then the perception happens against the background of stillness. It's a beautiful way to perceive things. There's a background of, and that stillness, that, in other words, is spaciousness, is not the stillness that you find when you are moving, when you get tired, and you're moving towards sleep, and then you're halfway asleep, but you're too tired to do any more thinking.

That can be a beautiful moment when you catch it. You're half asleep, and it feels so good. You're moving now towards sleep.

It feels so good, and you can't remember your problems anymore, can't think about your problems anymore. You don't remember anything anymore, and there's a moment of deliciousness, and then you're going to sleep, but this is not it. That has its place.

Of course, you go to sleep. Nor is it what you encounter when you have a few drinks. This is empty.

I'm just demonstrating. So you go. You're unhappy.

Your mind, the torture of your mind. Then you wait a few moments. You feel a little bit better.

Why? Because probably your mind slows down a bit. I have another one, and gradually you go, life is great, isn't it?

You're not thinking that much anymore. Isn't that great? So for a little while you get free of the torture, the daily torture of your mind, which is useless, but then you're moving towards eventual collapse.

That's another matter. We're not going that way here, because that way, what I just described, going towards sleep, taking alcohol or some other substance. I don't totally condemn anything.

I love a glass of wine or two occasionally. It's nice. No, but to desensitize yourself, you are falling below thought when you do that.

And that's okay. When you're going to sleep, you fall below thought. When you take excess alcohol, you begin to fall below thought.

But here, the practice of being able to come to your senses, to look around, to listen, to sense, to feel, perhaps to be aware of your breathing, perhaps to be aware of the aliveness in your body. Every cell is alive, but your attention is never there because you live in the upper part of the building of your body. You live under the roof, not unaware of what's going on in the rest of the building.

So your attention goes into, you might feel the body at the same time. It's all part of becoming present. You look around and there is a stillness arising that is not the stillness that is the stillness below thought.

It is the stillness that is above thought. And that is spiritual awakening, to encounter in yourself right now. I'm not just talking about it right now.

Encounter in yourself the possibility of accessing that dimension where for initially brief moments, you are free of thinking, but totally conscious. That's delicious. And at first it may not last for very long, but that doesn't matter.

And you may find that even without practicing it consciously as a spiritual practice, you may find that it can also happen spontaneously in your life. For example, during certain activities that require your total presence, because these activities have a certain element of danger to them, such as climbing up a rock wall, or race driving, racing car, or surfing, probably skiing downhill. All these kinds of things require your complete presence.

So they stop the mind and you're totally there and you go. In other words, the unenlightened, so to speak, partner becomes your teacher. That is sometimes the case.

And surprisingly, often says or does exactly what you need to become conscious in yourself.

[Speaker 7] (1:56:47 - 1:58:38)
The question I have is along that process over the last couple of years, almost every one of my relationships is gone, including my relationship, my marriage of 25 years. It's like hanging by a thread at the moment. And I can't tell if it's judgment or it's discernment, because it feels like I can no longer engage in some of the behavior.

And so I'm with a crowd of people that I no longer relate to. And so what has happened is my partners, our friends have become my partner's friends where I no longer kind of engage. And so it's caused a lot of distance.

And early on in my personal growth, somewhere along the line, I had heard the line, only someone with low self-esteem stays in a relationship that doesn't meet their needs. But it's now come to the point where it feels like any need that I think this egoic identity has is going to cause suffering if I try to, even as something simple as what you're saying is offensive, it's hurting, can you please rephrase it? Even something like that seems like it's going to be misinterpreted.

It's going to feel like an attack. And maybe it's riding on judgment that's just slightly beneath my consciousness. I suspect that's probably true.

Like there's some, whenever you speak about spiritual superiority, it brings some kind of, it's like, oh, you better pay attention there. So I don't know how much of that over the course of our lifetime, trying to get my partner to do some kind of spiritual growth work has had the exact opposite effect or anyway, that's where I'm at. She actually was coming.

I finally got her to come and it didn't happen. It blew up before. Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (1:58:40 - 1:58:42)
So, but you are still together.

[Speaker 7] (1:58:43 - 1:59:00)
Um, we're, we, in the last year we had a big windfall. I did some, one of your manifestation processes, a big house just showed up and we're in two different houses now. I'm in a big house by myself.

I don't want it. I don't want the house. I bought the house for her basically anyway.

[Speaker 1] (1:59:02 - 1:59:04)
Well, yes, that's an interesting story.

[Speaker 7] (1:59:05 - 1:59:08)
The emphasis on the word story though.

[Speaker 1] (1:59:13 - 1:59:22)
So could you, um, before I speak, have you already asked a question or not yet?

[Speaker 7] (1:59:22 - 1:59:48)
Uh, I think the question is maybe, well, number one, how do I know when it's time? If it was up to me, I would never throw in the towel for me. What's coming up is supposed to come up.

It's an opportunity for us to heal. And so I'll, I'll plant my feet, but the other person doesn't seem like that's their agenda. So when do you say it's time to let go?

I guess is the question.

[Speaker 1] (1:59:49 - 1:59:53)
And other relationships have already come to an end.

[Speaker 7] (1:59:53 - 2:00:15)
There was no formal end, just growing away, like not a drawer or a lack of connection, lack of ground to connect on, I guess. And at the same time, I feel more connected to everything. So it's like the farms are going away, but the connection to energy, it's like, I just see waves of energy.

[Speaker 1] (2:00:16 - 2:03:04)
Right. Right. Thank you.

Often that question is one form or another is often asked, when is it time to let go of a relationship or is it possible to continue in a relationship, even if there's a huge gap in the level of awareness, for example, in the two partners, there's a huge gap. Usually the best answer comes not through the decision-making process of the mind, trying to figure out what's the best thing to do. The best answer comes as a sudden realization that this is the thing to do.

Either you leave or you stay. If you live in two separate houses, of course, then it makes it a little easier to be in a relationship because you have a lot of space to yourself. And she has a lot of, he or she has a lot of space also.

So it often happens that one person, let's say two people meet, they come together, married or not married, they'll start living together. And at some point, one of them begins to grow spiritually. For some reason, there's a spiritual growth happening, the arising of awareness, some transcendence of ego.

And the other person, let's say, is staying behind. So the communication becomes a little bit more difficult. Also, as far as pain body is concerned, because the pain body in couples, for example, pain body needs the other person's pain body in order for the ultimately dysfunctional relationship to work.

The other already has gone beyond the pain body. I don't know whether you are still engaged in emotional.

[Speaker 7] (2:03:05 - 2:03:13)
I get hooked after I feel like I'm verbally attacked. If you keep misinterpreting, I'll get hooked. So there's still places where I need to work.

[Speaker 1] (2:03:14 - 2:03:29)
Yes. So it could be that the other person can provide people the training ground for you. That's what it feels like to be non-reactive.

[Speaker 7] (2:03:29 - 2:03:30)
That's what it feels like.

[Speaker 1] (2:03:30 - 2:04:20)
In other words, the unenlightened, so to speak, partner becomes your teacher. That is sometimes the case. And surprisingly, often says or does exactly what you need to become conscious in yourself.

So there's a reflection. And this can be highly, very useful. It might even ultimately, at some point, the other person may experience also the beginning of an awakening, but not necessarily.

But in the meantime, a relatively unconscious partner can teach you a lot about yourself when you observe the reactivity within yourself.

[Speaker 7] (2:04:20 - 2:04:20)
Great.

[Speaker 1] (2:04:26 - 2:05:54)
So unless something else comes to you that is beyond any doubt, and I very rarely make recommendations as far as people's personal lives are concerned, but I'll make one now. So I would continue for a while and allow the person to reflect back to you the things that you need to still become conscious of by provoking you. And often that is the case.

And you have some space. If you can't take any more, you go to a house. The comfort zone is not conducive to any kind of deepening.

Through resistance you suffer, or your presence deepens, because it has to. Many of these things are regarded as negative, but they're actually exactly what you need.

[Speaker 13] (2:05:58 - 2:06:15)
My question is, how does one remain centered in stillness when we might be surrounded by and asked to engage mentally and emotionally with others who are not?

[Speaker 1] (2:06:16 - 2:12:20)
I assume that this situation happens to you quite often, because you're asking the question. And of course, it's a very common thing for people to find themselves in such situations. Let's assume then it's, these are human beings that you cannot easily, or you don't want to, to separate yourself from, like could be family members, or it could be people you work with.

Those two situations are often situations where you feel you want to continue to interact with these people, or you have to interact with these people, but it's getting difficult, because you can, there's toxicity, or there's a lot of unconsciousness, egos, fight against other egos, and so on. Let's just for a moment put aside the more extreme manifestations of such situations. There are situations, whether it's family members or at work, there's some extreme situations that are so destructive and toxic that you, the only healthy and sane course of action would be to remove yourself.

So, if it's an extreme situation, let's say you're in a relationship, the relationship is sometimes violent, there's physical violence, or there's repeated emotional violence, that's an extreme situation, or you are at work, the company that you work for is, the environment, the energy is so toxic and negative, that just going into that office, you feel the weight of it, and the pull of that negativity, and it's full of ego battling each other.

So, in certain extreme situations, I would recommend that you remove yourself from this, because I mentioned that at first, because I want to put that aside, we need to know extreme situations involving emotional violence, physical violence, whatever it may be, you have to take responsibility and remove yourself from that situation. But many situations, and I assume in your case, perhaps it's not that extreme. So, what remains is normal human unconsciousness, not the extreme forms of unconsciousness.

So, to deal with normal human unconsciousness, again, be aware when you are interacting with people, realize that you may not always succeed in doing this, but the most important thing, see if you can bring about a shift in the way in which you approach the situation and these people. So, the most important thing in such situations is your state of consciousness, rather than whatever it is that they are talking about. They may be talking about this or that, whether it's at work, or they may be gossiping, or they may be whatever, they're engaged in emotional ego stuff.

Use it as an opportunity to stay present. And it's not easy. And you can only, you need to intensify your presence when you are with unconscious people.

By that I mean, when you are sitting alone in a room, or you're walking out in nature, it's, being present is not that difficult. You can, especially nature is conducive to presence. Or being alone in a room, if you discover that you actually like sitting alone in a room, that's a great thing, because that means you become comfortable with yourself.

And there are still, the majority of humans still become very uncomfortable with sitting alone in a room. And you may discover that you actually like being alone, not continuously, you still love people. But you also love being alone, because when you're alone, you can sense the presence that you are, the very simple, but powerful presence.

And you've sensed there's a stillness there. It's lovely. And then of course, then you leave your room, and then you meet other people, you lose yourself, you get to go see the, there's a gravitational pull that the mind has.

And so people know that they, so other people's minds will try to draw you in. I don't, is it, may I ask you before I carry on, is it predominantly, is it more a family situation in your case? Or is it a work situation?

Or which one is it predominantly?

[Speaker 13] (2:12:22 - 2:13:03)
I would say, thank you for asking. It is both, and both family and work occasionally are issues, or not issues, but present themselves as a challenge. What is an ongoing daily challenge is the unconsciousness of the city I'm surrounded in.

So, you know, by Wednesday, that starts to peak, and becomes much more difficult for me to stay out of my head, becomes very noisy.

[Speaker 1] (2:13:03 - 2:13:08)
Oh, you can sense the energy field of the city?

[Speaker 13] (2:13:08 - 2:13:09)
Yes.

[Speaker 1] (2:13:09 - 2:13:10)
Ah, right.

[Speaker 2] (2:13:10 - 2:13:11)
Yes, yes.

[Speaker 13] (2:13:11 - 2:13:25)
Sunday is very pleasant. Wednesday, Thursday, Friday are not. Right.

Right. So, but it's, it's really, you know, that plus the more intense situations of work and family, which occasionally come in.

[Speaker 1] (2:13:26 - 2:14:16)
Yes, yes. I need to ask one more question. Do you find yourself drawn into how when other people are ego-controlled, do you find yourself emotionally, mentally, you become just like them?

Or do you feel you're a little bit of an outsider now that's observing what's going on? Are you a full participant temporarily in the unconscious interactions that are taking place, the drama, whatever it may be? Are you a full participant?

Or are you a reluctant, sometimes a reluctant participant, or you remain there as an almost an outsider observing what's going on? How is it for you?

[Speaker 13] (2:14:18 - 2:14:47)
I, it oscillates. Most of the time, I am an outsider who enjoys engaging. I suspect that my sensitivity to presence and stillness is becoming, is increasing, or the sensitivity to that lack of in myself is increasing.

Does that answer your question?

[Speaker 2] (2:14:48 - 2:14:49)
Yes, yes.

[Speaker 1] (2:14:49 - 3:10:43)
Thank you. That's good. Yeah.

Yeah. Let's talk for a moment about this, the energy field of the city, before we go on to your personal thing. I don't know if you, whether you meditate or not, whether you do some form of meditation.

And often, you say, yes, often people meditate, and then something disturbing things happen. While they meditate, suddenly, there's disturbing noise. This morning, I was sitting, I was sitting in, in my living room.

And it's Wednesday, so they do the gardening on Wednesday with extremely noisy leaf blowers. This is the time of year with a lot of leaf blowers. And so the noise, and I was just so, it was so peaceful, as I was sitting there.

And suddenly, there was this, and often, I immediately knew how to completely transcend it, because I've been, it's second nature to me now. But often, I have to tell people how to deal with disturbing things like that, especially when they're trying to meditate. And then that happens, I always say, incorporate whatever arises during this time when you're trying to meditate.

Everything that arises, make it part of your meditation. In other words, resist nothing that arises. Don't demand that anything that arises should not arise.

In that case, even a disturbing noise, such as a leaf blower, is incorporated into your meditation by deep acceptance of what is. You don't resist. You may be able to practice the same in the city when you feel the energy field.

But I mean, you may be walking there or driving or just being in an apartment or office. Practice surrender to this energy that you feel, then you may be able to transcend that particular energy. If you don't, if you react to it, it still has you in its grip.

In a way, one could say, when you react to toxic energy, you become part of the toxic energy without knowing it. So, the only way you can become free, other than removing yourself and live in the countryside, the only way you can get beyond it is through deep surrender. So, completely, and this can be a spiritual practice, as I said, except in the most extreme cases when there's violence of some kind or extraordinary toxicity, then obviously you remove yourself.

Otherwise, surrender to something that seems unacceptable and yet you surrender, you're totally okay with suddenly the toxic energy of the city, but you no longer even call it toxic. You just, you can sense it and allow yourself to sense that and think, oh, that's what it is. And you might also then recognize it as an expression of human unconsciousness to some extent, but also, yes, it's still a manifestation of life at a particular stage, evolutionary stage, and that's what it is.

You can then, I had that realization many, many years ago when I went through a shift in consciousness. At the time, I lived in London and I had to travel every morning to work on the subway, which is called tube or underground, they call it. It has different lines and one is called, at that time, it was decades ago, I don't know how it is now, one was, the one, the line that I had to catch is called the Northern Line.

The Northern Line was always considered the worst of all tube lines because it had the longest delays and the most totally crammed carriages that always, you can never find a seat. You had to push yourself in and then there were long gaps, no trains. People called it the misery line and I had to catch that line every morning.

After my shift in consciousness, I still was the same. I went in there and I felt completely at peace. On the Northern Line, which before was a source of great unhappiness, felt completely at peace.

I couldn't quite understand why for a long time and later I realized I'm actually not complaining about anything anymore. I'm not complaining about it, it's just it is. My mind wasn't saying anything about it anymore.

And I could still feel that energy, but it was, I allowed myself to feel that and by allowing myself to feel it, there was transcendence of it. So, that is something to practice. And then also often in the middle of, sometimes in London, I would catch a bus too, so I might always sit on the upper level of the double-decker buses, would sit on the upper level and I contemplated the city.

I had the most peaceful meditations contemplating the hustle and bustle of the city, sitting on the upper deck of the bus. Wow, everything was so peaceful. Why was it so peaceful?

Everybody is stressed. Most people in a big city like that is stressed, most people are stressed and yet I felt peace, so peaceful. I was completely okay with everything.

That was, seems, was the reason. So, it's a practice of surrender and through surrender you transcend. Now, going on to people, dealing with people, individual people or small groups of people, family members, in any situation, as much as possible, remember that the most important ingredient of that situation is the state of conscience that you bring to it rather than whatever is being discussed.

And see that it's a little bit like without accepting the way people behave and, but, and recognized by, you can only accept it if you realize that they behave in this way because they cannot, they can't help it. They cannot, they, they behave the way they behave because they're still in the grip of that unconsciousness. Now, you have to be careful that the ego, when you observe people's unconsciousness and recognize its unconsciousness and you recognize that's just their conditioned behavior, it's the ego that makes them, that's a true recognition.

When you have that true recognition, you need to be careful, though, that your ego doesn't come back through, come, return through the back door, as I put it, and suddenly you feel very superior to them. Because any sense of superiority is a conceptual identity again. Yes, it's important to recognize that they are still in the grip of that unconsciousness.

So, it's a little bit like observing children. You wouldn't come, when children do the wrong things or break something, they can't help it. A three-year-old can't, if the three-year-old spills something or breaks something, they can't help it.

That's just how it is. It corresponds to the evolutionary stage as a human being. And so, you wouldn't complain about it.

Well, some parents do, if they're very unconscious, they get angry with a two or three-year-old when they break something. That means you're really unconscious. But, so, able to accept people's behavior and see when they do it.

Be very careful, though, with your reactions. So, stay as present as you can, through breath awareness, or even listen, when you listen to somebody, be really there, listen to them, be there as a conscious presence. Don't let, especially when it's a family surroundings, the pain body can often come in.

The pain body wants a reaction, an emotional reaction from you. Other person's pain body wants you to react emotionally. And when that happens, you can recognize it.

And you may not need to react emotionally, if you stay present. Staying present is the important part. Accepting the way a person behaves, for the time being, is fine.

Unless, if it's in your family surroundings, it may be helpful to talk about certain patterns of behavior that you're not okay with. When you shout at me, when you're tired and you get irritated and you shout at me, that's not okay. Catch the person when he or she is relatively conscious, to point out moments of unconsciousness.

But when it does happen, you just have to, they're like children. People who are still unconscious are like children, in evolutionary terms. So, it's challenging, but you need that in order to deepen your presence.

If your surroundings were ideal for sustaining presence, your presence would never go very deep. If you lived, if you had unlimited money, and you lived in the most wonderful surroundings, and you're being looked after, you can meditate every day, because nobody's making any demands on you. You get the best possible food that is served every day, and clean air and wonderful surroundings.

Now, you might think, then I could really grow spiritually and awaken. Unfortunately, that's not the case. For a little while, you'll feel peaceful, but it wouldn't go very deep.

Your presence wouldn't go very deep, because it doesn't have to go very deep. It doesn't go, nothing happens unless it has to. It's only when you're confronted with a demand, a challenge, an obstacle, then you are forced to go deeper.

Otherwise, you're like a little flower that grows in a greenhouse, very protected conditions. Let's say, a seed that sprouts in a protected environment of a greenhouse, and then it grows very quickly. If you take it outside, it wouldn't even survive, because it was never confronted with the adverse conditions.

It didn't generate enough energy to deal with the adverse conditions in the same applies to presence. Your comfort zone is not conducive to spiritual awakening and deepening in presence. The mind might tell you, there's nothing wrong with comfort zones, enjoy it when it's there.

But don't believe that the comfort zone is the ultimate purpose of your life. In a way, the opposite is true. You don't necessarily need to seek discomfort, although that has been done and is still being done by certain types of spiritual practice, seeking out discomfort.

In India, there are still many people who practice that. In the West, there used to be many people, not anymore. The West is more about seeking comfort zones.

Comfort zone is not conducive to any kind of deepening. When you're not in your comfort zone, either you suffer or your presence deepens. Through resistance, you suffer.

Through judgment, resistance, and on, you suffer. Or your presence deepens, because it has to. You're taken out of your comfort zone, sometimes because of the people that you need to deal with, or you could be taken out of your comfort zone, where you live, or what you have to do, or whatever it may be.

But all these are good things, or you lose things that were important to you, so you're taken out of your comfort zone in that way. Many of these things are regarded as negative, but they're actually exactly what you need to deepen your presence. I had a relative many years ago who suffered from a mental illness.

I would only visit this person once a year for a brief time, because, anyway, this person was very deeply in the grip of a condition called paranoid schizophrenia, and sometimes this person was in a mental home, sometimes at home. And so, when I visited once a year, I could see, first I had to listen to the narratives, which were complete fake fantasies about all the enemies that are surrounding us, and so on. Paranoid schizophrenia, misinterpretations of reality.

And I just, first I had to sit there and listen. I knew already, every time I arrived, I would hear the stories of the dreadful things that's been happening, and I would just sit there. And normally, everybody, sooner or later, would become incorporated into this person's fantasy world.

If you questioned anything she said, you would become one of the enemies. So, I never questioned anything. And whenever I arrived there, I could sense my, in the presence of a very unconscious person, I could sense my presence deepening, becoming much more intense, or just automatically, because there is a, the way in which you experience presence varies.

There can be intense presence, or there can be just background presence. In certain situations, I experienced intense presence, like a dimmer switch, turning on the light on the dimmer switch, but I'm not doing it, it just happens. So, whenever I sat with her, I would become very, very present, and just listen.

And many times, while I was there, she would become virtually normal, and not talk about it anymore. And her condition subsided, and she could converse like the normal person. And the moment I left to go back home, I was told by somebody else who lived with her, she would immediately revert back into her fantasies.

But while I was there, she was, initially, I had to listen to the stories, but as I stayed present, some of that presence transmitted itself to her, it seemed, didn't have a permanent effect, but it had a temporary effect of bringing some light into the unconsciousness. So, but this is a practice that is very important. Difficult people are very important on your spiritual path.

And difficult people means, obviously, ego people, unconscious people. In other words, most people are difficult in one way or another. Some are much more difficult than others.

Some are close to insane. And those then you have to remove yourself. As I said, if you can, if you can't, that's fine, too.

But we deepen through interacting with other humans. And to some extent, you find also that your state of consciousness gets reflected in other humans and the humans that you attract after a while. If you remain present as much as possible, you attract other humans into your life that are also relatively present.

And sometimes there's a healing effect that you can have without wanting to change the situation, but by remaining present in a situation, non-reactive, you can sometimes change the environment without feeling that you are doing it. Because one present person can make a difference to the entire energy of a group of people. Or sometimes the group energy is so deeply unconscious that even that doesn't help.

At least you don't become part of it. And you remain on the periphery, you don't become part of it. So, in the same way, however, if you have a group of people, let's say you have a meeting, you have a committee meeting, sometimes one very unconscious person can draw everybody else into a deep unconsciousness.

So, that's the reverse of what I was just talking about, present. If one person is very unconscious, it sometimes happens that everybody else gets drawn in and their level of consciousness also diminishes. That's not uncommon either.

But you need difficult people to evolve. That's the truth of it. So, and ultimately, even your childhood, when I, many people, when they look back on their childhood and their parents, you can see parents were unconscious, behaved in unconscious ways.

In my case, for example, and they couldn't help it. There's no, I don't blame, just in the grip of their conditioned behavior. My life was not pleasant as a child.

But even that, retrospectively, it all made sense. Retrospectively, I needed to go through that. I remember talking to Oprah, it was actually, I can mention it now because it was a public conversation.

She grew up with a single mother, never saw her father. And her mother did not have the ability to love. She was not given any love whatsoever.

It was just very bad, very bad situation. And I said, when she explained the situation, the details of which I had forgotten, but it was awful. I said, you would not be who you are now if you had had a loving mother.

Because this forced you to go deeper to something that you did not find outside. It forced you to go deeper into yourself. So, that is, may help you to remember, thank you for difficult people.

That is your prayer of gratitude. Oh, by the way, when you awaken spiritually, it doesn't mean this is the end of challenges. They don't stop.

The only difference is, and it's a big difference, you no longer unconsciously transform the challenges of life into unhappiness. The entire psychological self that you think you are, that your identity that is derived from whatever it is that your mind identifies with, your past, what happened to you in your past, what you did, what people did to you, what you achieved, your successes, your failures, your sufferings, victories and defeats from your past, they gradually, a story forms in the mind. And a story is thoughts, certain thoughts, they come together as a bundle.

And so after, as you grow up and you become an adult and you grow, this becomes more developed, this mental image of who you are. And that becomes who you sense yourself to be as a person. That becomes your personality.

And that is the foundation for most people's sense of identity. That is all they know. And that is the unawakened state of consciousness.

So you are confined to this ultimately mind made sense of self that consists of a storyline, a narrative that you think about, and you call it my life, me and my life. Hmm. And that exists in time.

This is where the time dimension becomes very important, because the me and my life is me, the person that I am now, which is conditioned by my past, all the things from the past that make up the person that I am now. And then future becomes important for this me and my life, because you can look to the future as a destination, a source of possible greater fulfillment, because, strange thing is, the sense of self that arises from the past, that is, that consists of a bundle of recurring thought forms plus emotional formations, a mental emotional entity, that entity that you call me and my life, is, a lot of the time, spends its time worrying about me and my life and considers itself problematic. So you carry you as that entity, you as that person, everybody here carries a life situation with him or herself.

You carry a life situation with you, and everybody here has certain, a certain set of problems in their life situation, which, whether they are related to your relationships, whether they're related to your health situation, whether they're related to your financial situation, your work situation, any of these areas, it's rare that you're totally free of perceiving yourself as being kind of almost burdened by problems.

And that many people have a view of themselves, of their identity, as a problem to be solved, unconsciously. They don't say, they don't say, I am a problem to be solved, but there's an underlying current of unspoken thought that says, there's something that is not quite right here. And you've, and then you look at others, especially on Facebook, and you see, they don't have those problems.

So what's wrong with me? What's wrong? And even if you walk in the street, they seem to be okay.

And you could perceive, why am I always, have all got that stuff going on? And then of course you begin to pretend too. You don't know that the others are pretending, but you are pretending.

And then you start taking the selfies for your Facebook post. So this, this mental image that people have, we now have the technology, isn't that great, to amplify this mental image and send it out into the world. And we can polish it up so that it looks great out there.

But the greater it looks on your Facebook page, the worse you feel inside. So the interesting fact is then that everybody carries the burden of their life situation. And whether it's a heavy burden for you at this time, or whether it's a relatively light burden for you at this time, as you sit here, may vary from person to person.

But there is not a single person, unless there's a baby here somewhere, there's not a single person who does not carry this burden of their life situation, whether it's heavy or light at the moment. And it could change. If it's heavy today, it might not be heavy anymore tomorrow, but then it'll be heavy again another time.

So then that's an interesting fact. And that is part of a person's sense of identity, is what I call the life situation. What is me and my story?

And there's always, and that's the strange fact, there's always something missing. There's always a sense, an underlying sense of, I am not enough. I haven't arrived yet.

There's a search ultimately for greater fulfillment, a search for yourself ultimately, for a better version of yourself. Now there's nothing wrong with engaging in activities that help you learn a new skill, acquire new knowledge. And so you gradually, you become a better version of yourself.

You become, let's say, you acquire a better education or whatever it is, a skill, dance, whatever. That's fine. But whatever it is you acquire, on one level, you can improve yourself, no doubt.

But on a deeper level, that sense of dissatisfaction will resurface again and again. And no matter what you achieve or attain, for a little while, sometimes it happens that a person is totally feeling, now I'm fully myself. I have arrived.

This happens, it could happen when you win the lottery. And there's been many things written about lottery winners. Many of them became more unhappy after winning the lottery.

There was a moment of elation, and then there was greater unhappiness. So there's that sense of, the underlying sense of not enough, not enough yet. I'm not enough.

And you never actually arrive. And then you reach retirement age, and you suddenly realize that you've always been waiting to start living. And that's a pity.

Without knowing it, you've always been lived for the next moment or some other future moment, and thought, I'm going to get there. One day, I'm going to make it. Whatever, it's a weird expression.

Make it really, make yourself, I suppose. That's one day, I'm going to make it. And ultimately, several times you think you made it.

But then you realize that your life situation, again, sabotages you. That's what it does. You might have noticed.

You do your best. You do your best intentions, and you should. But no matter how good your intention, how well-focused you are, and how much positive thinking you do, which are all great things, I'm not saying don't do them, do them.

But even there, you do not escape this fact that challenges come one after another. And challenges sometimes come in the form of some form of chaos. It's good to strive for order.

But no matter how good you are in bringing about order in your life, and it's a great thing, you will periodically encounter the eruption of disorder in your life, whether it's an illness, or some kind of loss, or some huge drama in your relationship, or toxic. You might have noticed, by the way, a great source of challenge in your life, one of the greatest, apart from the fact that as you grow older, the body is being consumed. A great source of challenge in your life is human beings.

So if you look at your life situation, you realize, where does a lot of that suffering and happiness, where does it come from? It's other people. And sometimes the very people that make you happy for a few years, suddenly, the very same people make you unhappy.

The person you fall in love with today, five years from now, you hate each other at the divorce court. The worst person you ever met. So everybody carries a life situation, and there's a certain heaviness to a life situation.

And if you are totally trapped in your life situation, you think about it, you talk about it compulsively, either you think about it in your head, or you talk about to others, the more you are trapped in it, the more unsatisfying your life is. That is really the temporal dimension, because you as the person, you as the personality, you that has a life situation, you that is the story of me, me and my story that exists in time. And the wonderful thing is that there is a way out.

There is a dimension of consciousness where you are not trapped on that level. So one could almost say that you can get off that speeding train, but not as a physic, not with your physical body. But there is a possibility of transcending a sense of identity that is exclusively derived from mental, emotional patterns in you, because that's what the person or the personality is.

Now, most humans don't even know that. But the ancient teachers pointed to it using different signposts. Buddha said, life is suffering.

What did I just talk about? I just didn't use those terms. Buddha said, life is suffering.

But he also said, I teach suffering, he said, and the end of suffering, which means, when he said, I teach suffering, he meant, I show you how suffering arises. And when he said, and the end of suffering, what he meant was, I show you how suffering can end. A lovely statement.

I teach suffering and the end of suffering. So the Buddha talks about the possibility of the end of suffering. Jesus talks about the necessity of, on the possibility of what is called salvation.

And in other spiritual traditions, other terms are used, liberation, awakening. So they all pointed to it using different signposts, different terminology. And yet very few humans realized what they were talking about.

So even like Christians, most Christians don't know what salvation is. They might think an emotional high is salvation, or a certain belief. You say, I believe this, which is a story in your head that you don't question.

Thought, in other words, thought forms. There's a story in your head and say, this is how it is. I don't, you don't question.

I believe in this narrative. And then they say, this narrative will save you if you believe in it. I would suggest to you that what Jesus was pointing to was much deeper than that, but there was a beautiful truth hiding there.

I would say hiding because you don't very rarely do you actually hear the depths of the teaching explained to you in churches. So it is possible. There is a possibility of transcendence.

You can internally transcend the limitations of the person, which doesn't mean you're no longer a person. You continue to be a person. You also continue to have a life situation and you continue to be challenged by life.

The difference is, oh, by the way, when you awaken spiritually, it doesn't mean this is the end of challenges. Really? Oh, they keep coming.

They don't stop. The only difference is, and it's a big difference, you no longer unconsciously transform the challenges of life into unhappiness. You no longer transform the challenges of life into an unhappy me, an unhappy sense of self, a dissatisfied person with, in the background, always a sense of dissatisfaction, discontent, irritation, not enough.

But sometimes, of course, you smile. How are you? Great.

I'm just great. Haven't you seen my Facebook page? I'm...

This is the food I'm eating now. Now, as the Buddha said, I show you suffering. I teach suffering.

I show you how suffering arises. Now, how does it ultimately arise? How does the unhappiness, let's use that kind of generic term, unhappiness, which could be all kinds of things.

Unhappiness starts with a slight irritation when you're waiting in line and the mind is not moving, and you have a slight irritation, and you're beginning to be unhappy. And then it builds up into something more, perhaps. Or unhappiness is when you arrive home and your house has gone up in flames.

A little bit more unhappiness. Or unhappiness is when suddenly your spouse leaves you, and you go bankrupt, and you lose your job, and you don't know what's going to happen next month, where you're going to live. Another form of unhappiness.

Many forms of unhappiness can arise. But when you look at the, you need a little bit of awareness to detect, and this is already kind of the beginning of a spiritual awakening, when you develop the ability to know what's going on in your mind. And when you develop, and this is awareness slowly arising, when you develop the ability to know what your mind is doing, what your thoughts are going through your head, then you may detect, where does the unhappiness come from?

Does it come, and you can then divide it into two types of unhappiness. One is completely unrelated to an actual event out there. It's entirely produced by dysfunctional thinking.

A typical example of that would be worry. You wake up in the middle of the night, and you start to worry. Worry means you have to create scenarios in your thoughts about things going wrong.

You create scenarios about things which you might lose, things you might not get, but you need. Something may happen to you, and you play it out in your mind. You worry about problems that you say you have, but while you worry, there's no, worry is never given a solution to anything.

It's just pointless going around in your mind, and you don't even know it. Many people are addicted, there's no awareness there, they are addicted to worrying. Their sense, their personality, to a large part, is a worrying personality.

Take the worrying away, and a huge chunk of their personality is suddenly gone. Of course, they don't want that. They want to hang on to that.

I need to worry. Well, I mean, if I don't worry, I'm not taking responsibility for my life. Everybody worries, don't they?

When I look at movies, they worry. Everybody worries. You have to worry.

Okay, let me worry a little bit more. Now, worry is a very good example of dysfunctional thinking, and it produces an emotion. It's not just in the mind.

You have certain types of thinking, the body reacts, responds to the thinking, and creates an emotion that reflects a type of thinking. The energetic frequency of that thinking, the story that you create in your mind, the body can't tell the difference between an actual, real event out there, and something that only your mind is creating. So when your mind is creating critical situation, your body believes that you are in a critical situation, or that you're lying in bed at three in the morning, and it's very nice and warm and soft, but you're in a critical situation in your mind, and the body believes this is bad.

And then you experience the emotion that you would experience if you were really in a critical situation. And then that becomes, and the emotion fuels even more that type of thinking. So you're trapped in a vicious circle.

And so there are human beings who are burdened with these personalities that continuously produce totally superfluous, unnecessary unhappiness. All unhappiness is ultimately superfluous, but in this particular case, this type of unhappiness has nothing to do at all with any situation that's actually happening. It's created by dysfunctional thinking.
